the end our Government brought in and passed the Harbour Dues Exemption Abolition Bill. In the case of a New-castle collier owner the abolition of the exemption amounted to a loss of £40 a year on each ship, so that on a fleet of 10 ships it meant a trade loss of £400 a year. How did Parliament deal with the case? An average was taken of the amounts saved by the exemptions over three years, and Parliament said, "If you live so long we will allow you that amount of exemption for 10 years, and no longer. Now, that, you may say, was a case of confiscation. These traders were entitled to the exemption all their lives, yet Parliament, in the interest of International trade, thought proper to put an end to the privilege on the basis of a 10 years' compromise. Surely these persons had an infinitely stronger claim than the mere expectancy and probability of an annual renewal of a licence. Then, again, in reference to the harbours of refuge at Bridlington and at Ramsgate a similar course was pursued, and when the privilege of exemption from tolls was abolished, those who enjoyed the privilege were allowed a 10 years' enjoyment before it was brought to an end. Yet another instance is furnished in the case of pilotage dues. Up to 1871 pilots had the right to charge double fees on foreign ships, but when, in 1861, Government put an end to the anomaly, pilots had to submit to an end of these double fees in 10 years, although the right was, undoubtedly, secured to them for their lives. Another case of Parliamentary interference with vested rights is supplied in connection with the town I represent, where Parliament stepped in and abolished a system of 21 years' leases with renewals that had become so much a certainty that 23 years' purchase was given for a 21 years' lease. Lessees who had devoted their capital to the construction of docks, quays, and warehouses, had to face the refusals of leases. Parliament in this case also compromised the matter by allowing a fixed period of possession in lieu of perpetual renewal. I mention these as analogous cases—which are yet not analogous, because the claims of the possessors of these privileges were infinitely stronger than mere expectancy in the case of licence holders—as indicating the lines upon which legislation should proceed, lines such as were laid down in Mr. Bruce's Bill. It would be far better to let things go on for some time longer, waiting until some Government shall come into office and approach this subject in a permanent and statesman-like way.

*(9.40.) Mr. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): As it is not possible for me to vote for the Government proposal, I take this opportunity for a few remarks in explanation on the Amendment, as it involves the main principle of the whole Bill. When it is alleged that the Bill is brought forward in the interests of temperance I should like to know a little more of the circumstances under which the Government have embarked on the enterprise, and who it is that really claims the paternity of the Bill. I have not heard any Member of the Government speak of it as his child at all. If it is really brought forward to promote the cause of temperance a greater mistake was never made. I do not believe it is in the power of this House to strike a fatal blow at the cause of temperance, for I do not believe it is possible for anybody to do that, but it is a question whether a more disastrous blow could be struck at that cause than by this Bill becoming law. I notice that the President of the Local Government Board expressly stated yesterday that the Government have not, at any time, professed that this Bill could be considered in any proper sense as a proposal for the complete settlement of the liquor question. Then why make the proposal at all? I do not know if there exist conditions under which this vexed question can be settled. I do not lay the blame upon the President of the Local Government Board; I know that the blame lies at the door of the leaders of the Temperance Party. If they would make a fair and reasonable offer, the question could be settled without such a Bill as this. Even now, I venture to hope they may consider some alternative, which it rests with them to propose, for if this Bill passes, and remains operative, few of us will live to see any real reform in the way of temperance legislation. It is, I believe, quite possible to re-model the Bill in a way which would, in the lives of most of us, lead to a complete reform, and give to the communities the power of controlling the whole of the public houses of the United Kingdom. It is said the Bill pledges the country to an expenditure of something like £200,000,000. [No, No! I do not care whether it is £200,000,000 or only £20,000,000; that is a question of degree in what I am bound to call the folly we are exhibiting. The real question is, Need we pay the publicans any compensation at all? I venture to think it would be easy to come to terms with the publicans, and get the public houses into our hands within a reasonable time, and without the payment of any compensation at all. Have the publicans, in fact, any sort of right to make such a claim, and have they ever made it? Well, I do not know that publicans have made any claim, other than that their property should not be recklessly confiscated. They say:—"We have been induced by the law to invest large sums in property of this character; and what we ask is, if you alter the law you should at least give us time to make other arrangements." I am not entitled to speak for them, but I think they would be satisfied with the continuance of their licences for 20 years. As the hon. Member for Shields has said, since the last proposal was made we have waited nearly 20 years for reform. May we not reasonably expect that we may have to wait another 20 years for the realisation of a reform now? If there is any force in that argument it is only common wisdom to meet the inevitable, and secure to the community the interest in licences at the end of that period of 20 years. This is a matter the leaders of the Temperance Party would do well to consider—I mean the possibility of an indefinite postponement of any settlement. I know no reason why publicans should not be thus fairly dealt with. I am astounded at the way I hear that body spoken of, not so much by hon. Members in this House, as elsewhere by the more rabid leaders of the Temperance Party. For a series of years publicans have carried on their trade under the conditions imposed upon them by the law, and have invested large capital in the expectation that their licences would be renewed year by year. I would call the attention of the hon. Member for Shields, who spoke of the number of licences refused in one small town, to the fact brought out by statistics put before us that only in the proportion of one house to 2,000 has a licence been refused renewal on the ground that it is not required in the neighbourhood. The chances, then, are 2,000 to one that if a publican has conducted his business properly, he will have his licence renewed.

MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.): In Great Britain?

*MR. KELLY: Yes. From the Returns furnished I find that is about the proportion. Now, what will be the effect of the present clause? The district which I represent would receive about £3,000 a year from the amount proposed to be allocated to London for the purpose proposed, and I need scarcely say that that is not sufficient for the purchase of even one large public house; I say that it would take 40 years to extinguish one quarter of the licensed houses in the district, with the sum of £120,000. It must be within the knowledge of every Member of the Committee that not one London public house in six is the property of the publican, and in not ten instances in a hundred have the publicans 10 years' interest in their occupation. I will venture to say that of the £120,000 which would be expended in extinguishing licences in Camberwell under this clause, £119,000 would go into the pockets of brewers and distillers, who have the deepest interest in this Bill. I do not know what claim they put forward. They have chosen to invest their money in a particular class of property, in order to promote the sale and manufacture of a particular article in which they have no monopoly, and I take it that, if they are sensible men, they will be satisfied with a 20 years' vested interest. I ask the Committee to consider how different the position would be if the Government, instead of bringing in this halting Bill, which will take 160 years to bring about an extinction which could be accomplished in 20 if the Government were not restrained by timidity, had brought in a Bill dealing equitably with the interests of publicans and of the general community. How much better would it be for all but the brewers and distillers. As it is, I am not quite sure that much is going to be done for anybody. I do not know in what final form this Bill may be passed, but, taking it as it stands, will it last for 40 years, or even 10 years? I do not think it will last for five years, and, inasmuch as it will be considered a Bill to secure the perpetuation of the rights of brewers and distillers, I think it will be followed by an Act for a general confiscation of the rights of the publicans. The Bill cannot be said to be likely to do much good, while it is likely to introduce further troubles and obstructions in the way of a final settlement. I am in the unfortunate position that I must vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Rotherham, because I believe the public will gain little or nothing under the Bill, and that while it may be intended to advance the cause of temperance, which we all have at heart, it will deal not a fatal, indeed, but still a most disastrous blow to that cause.

(9.52.) SIR H. SELWIN-IBBETSON (Essex, Epping): I am puzzled by much that has fallen from the hon. Member who has just spoken, puzzled because at one moment he seemed to be blessing the publicans altogether, and at the next moment to be cursing them from his inmost heart. The 20 years he proposes looks as if he does not agree in the views of the Temperance Party on the other side, and the adherence he expressed to the doctrine based upon the uncertainty of tenure by publicans looks as if, on the other hand, he agreed with the assertions made above the Gangway opposite. I have been mixed up, if I may use the expression, with this subject for many years, and one of the things that has astounded me more than anything else in this discussion is the change that has come over Members' minds in regard to this question. I remember when I first introduced a Bill in 1869, at that time beer houses with "off" licences were under the control of the Excise, not of the Magistrates. They were free from all police control, and the Excise were interested in granting the greatest possible number of licences, and my effort was to place them under the Magistrates and the control of the police. Mr. Bruce sent for me just before the time when my Bill was coming on for Second Reading, and put before me the proposals of the Government and four conditions which I felt forced to accept, and which practically gave to a large part of the trade that perpetual tenure which is now so much objected to on the other side. It was pointed out, and very properly argued, that even in regard to whole licences their actual legal position was that of holders of licences from year to year, and that is argued now. But people who use that argument forget the long-standing custom which has over-ridden the actual law—a custom which has been recognised by statesmen on both sides of the House on more than one occasion. In the Bill brought in under the auspices of Mr. Bruce, if Members will refer to the 44th section, I think they will find support for the argument I am trying to put before them. In that section a publican is not legally required to come before the Magistrates to make application for the renewal of his licence, and can only be obliged to appear personally to obtain renewal if he has misconducted himself, and opposition to renewal has, in consequence, been lodged against him. Surely, this is distinctly a point in favour of the position that custom has so far become a fact in regard to these licences that, having practically persuaded men to invest their money in them, it is not considered fair that they should be deprived of their licences, except for misconduct in carrying on their business. In my judgment, this Bill does go far to promote the cause of temperance. By the check to the issue of new licences and transfers the number of licences will be reduced in the near future. The tendency of the Bill, I venture to say, will be to put the trade into good hands. Good conduct will be promoted in the houses which remain, and in that way it will do more to carry out the views advocated by the Temperance Party than they would themselves succeed in doing in the coming generation by carrying out the violent crusade advocated by the advanced section of that Party.

* (9.58.) SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): The right hon. Baronet, than whom no one is better able to speak of the successive changes of the public mind on this question, and no one appreciates the efforts he has made in the cause of temperance, more than I do, has spoken with truth of the change in the public mind upon this great question during his time, and the reason, I think, is not far to seek. When he and I entered the House the liquor interest was enormously over-represented in Parliament, while the people who suffered from that interest were hardly represented at all. The change in the representation is the real cause of the change in the public mind. But, to whatever cause we ascribe it, the change has been immense. I do not congratulate the hon. Member for Camberwell (Mr. Kelly) on his independence, because I think this is a question upon which it is every man's duty to be independent, but I do congratulate him upon having thoroughly studied this subject, though some of his conclusions differ from mine. I agree with him that the passing of the Bill will be a disastrous blow to the aspirations and hopes of the Temperance Party, which have been growing for so many years. More than ever do we know that. Till the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer this evening, up to this time, in the Debates on this question, the downright defence of the publican's absolute vested right in his licence has been chiefly confined to hon. and learned Gentlemen, whose business it has been so often to argue the question before the Courts that they have, perhaps, forgotten its broader aspect. I am glad to say that many of my hon. and learned Friends have now taken a broader view. This evening, however, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has delivered a plain, unadulterated speech against the right of the nation to make reduction without compensation. That speech was nothing less than a blow struck straight at the present right of the Magistrates to take away licences at the annual Licensing Sessions. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer is right, what is the use of the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Grimsby, which has been accepted by the Government, and which provides that "Nothing in this Act shall be construed as altering the existing law affecting the renewal of licences, or giving the holder of any licence any right or privilege other than that which he now enjoys."

The speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is an absolute reply to those who charge us with having calumniated the Government by saying that this is a compensation Bill. It fully justifies the brewers and distillers, in their official organ, terming it an official recognition of compensation. This is the very worst compensation Bill which was ever brought before Parliament. The hon. Member for Cirencester has well illustrated that. Here is a village with six public houses—one of them, doing a business of £300, is bought up by the County Council. It is paid for on the basis of the net profits, which are represented by the difference between the gross receipts and the working expenses, and the profits also constitute the difference in value between a licensed house, and one without a licence. Well, the business of the house which is bought up is absorbed by the remaining five houses, the profits of which are consequently increased; so that if the County Council subsequently tries to buy them up it will have to pay, not merely for the amount of the business which they did at the time the first house was bought, but also they will have to pay over again for the business of the house which was first purchased, because it will have been added to the business of the remaining houses. And, as those houses will have their staff and working machinery in existence, what was gross profit to the extinguished house will be net profit to them, and their value will be raised very much beyond the value of the compensation given to the extinguished house. And so the process would continue with all six houses. I think that argument is absolutely unanswerable. What happens in a single locality will happen all over the country. If the liquor interest is worth £200,000,000, and if we spend £3,000,000 or £4,000,000 in buying up public houses, we shall have more than £200,000,000 still to buy up. It has been truly observed that this is a worse case than the case of the Sibylline books, for we shall not only have to buy up the books which remain, but shall also have to pay the price of all those which are destroyed. My right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian said this was a payment out of public money in a manner most improvident and most ruinous. It is, in fact, an elaborate arrangement for the nation to make a bad bargain; for the worst bargain which can be made is a bargain with several people. When one man has been settled with, No. 2 will step forward to take advantage of the position. Another reason why we have such an intense feeling against the Bill is, that it will open an immense field of jobbery for the benefit of the brewers. I was shocked to hear the other day that six or seven brewers had already obtained seats on one County Council, and we may be sure these Gentlemen have in anticipation the day when they will be able to induce the County Councils to buy up certain public houses, and thus increase the value of the remaining ones. Public houses are already falling into the hands of the large brewing companies. Take the case of Samuel Allsopp & Co. I will just read one sentence from the Report of the gentleman who was making the case for Allsopp's Brewery at a meeting reported in this morning's papers. No power on earth will convince me that Allsopp's brew bad beer. That is not the reason why the firm is not so prosperous as it might be. This is the explanation of the Chairman—

"We have also considered the altered circumstances of the brewery business in regard to the tied trade, and we think it is necessary in the interests of the shareholders that the policy of tying houses, as regards this business but recently commenced, shall be continued and increased."

That means, what many of us knew long ago, that honest brewers who brew good beer, and try to sell it in the open market, can make little or nothing of it on account of the manner in which these houses are in the hands of people who do not appear before the Bench of Magistrates to get the licence. The Secretary of the Local Government Board is an admirable debater, and he rallied us on our feeling against the publicans. The truth is we are now beginning to understand the question of the liquor traffic in a way it has never been understood before. The pamphlet of Mr. James, the President of the Plymouth, Devonport, and Stonehouse Spirit, Wine, and Beer Trade Protection Society, gives us a perfect revelation on this question. It is one of the most striking pamphlets ever written, and any one who reads it will find that there has been existing in our midst a system of white slavery. He gives us striking instances of publicans who are in such a position that, in order to pay their rents and the interest on their mortgages, they have to conduct their houses under circumstances which no honest man or woman could possibly approve, and which, in many cases, are almost indescribable. It is bad enough for a man to have to do forced labour for the profits of others, but it is still worse when that labour consists in ruining innocent homes and in corrupting the morals of their fellows. I will just read one short story which will show what we mean when we say we are voting against the brewer and not against the publican. According to this pamphlet there stood within the limits of the Plymouth garrison a fully-licensed house, belonging to a brewery, and which in five years was let to no fewer than five different persons. Each of the first three on finding out the class of business he had been induced to take, got out as quickly as possible, a sadder and wiser, if not a richer man. The fourth determined somehow to make a living, and established a singing-room, which females of the class likely to visit such places were encouraged to frequent. The house was described as a horrible den of debauchery, and the police becoming aware of the character of the business warned the publican that if he did not alter his conduct the licence would be in jeopardy. The tenant left the house, and was succeeded by another person, but at the annual Licensing Session evidence was given of the disgraceful manner in which the business of the house was conducted, and the Magistrates refused to renew the licence. What was the result? An appeal was made to Quarter Sessions, ostensibly on behalf of the tenant, but really on behalf of the brewers, and the licence was renewed. Now, the owners of this house must have known perfectly well how the business was conducted, but they evidently did.

not care so long as the profits of their trade were increased to a considerable extent. It is the brewers we are really called on to compensate and not the publican. There are many, of whom I am one, who would willingly settle this question, giving the publican some sort of compensation for disturbance, but that would be to pledge the House to thousands and hundreds of thousands, whereas under this Bill we shall be pledged to millions and hundreds of millions. This is not a question of temperance fanatics. The great mass of the people of this country feel strongly. They do not see why monopolists, who have made so much money by their monopoly, should not only be allowed to keep their gains but should be paid their capital value as well. My own belief is that there has been no expression of public opinion in favour of this measure outside the House except from interested people. The right hon. gentleman read across the table a telegram stating that 2,000 people at Bridgeton-cross, in an open-air meeting, carried a resolution in favour of the Government proposals. Now, the open-air meeting was advertised by the Temperance Party. It came on to rain, and the meeting was held in a large hall, where resolutions were carried enthusiastically, and almost unanimously, against the Government proposals. Afterwards, when the weather had cleared up, the people went outside and again passed the same resolutions, but in the interval, while it was raining, some 20 or 30 people made some demonstration in favour of the Government, and that is all the ground upon which these leaders of the people telegraphed up to the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman quoted Liverpool as being in favour of the Bill. It may be so, because Liverpool is the most unhappy of all great cities in being the most publican ridden city probably in the world at this moment. It is a city where, under this odious and hateful system, the property has got into a very few hands—I might almost say into the hands of one man. I do not deny that much of the income obtained from it has been so used as to identify in Liverpool the liquor interest with ideas of magnificence and public spirit, and even of religion. But I feel certain that the public see through this thin veneering of public spirit on the part of these rich monopolists, not because they are temperance fanatics, but because they are citizens with a sense of equity—a sense of what is due to themselves and to their fellow citizens, and they are therefore heartily in sympathy with us in voting against these clauses which will give sanction and permanence to this indefensible privilege.

*(10.30.) MR. SYDNEY GEDGE (Stockport) : This Amendment is a remarkable one ; on its negative side, it goes to the root of the principle of the Bill ; and on its positive side, it devotes £350,000 to the purposes of education, without the recommendation of a Minister of the Crown. The Debate is even more remarkable, for anyone coming into the House accidentally would imagine that we were engaged, if you were not in the Chair, on the Second Reading, for the discussion has wandered over every part of the Bill, and has chiefly turned on what is not in the Bill at all. While the Bill does not in any way what-ever lead to depriving a man of his licence, with or without compensation, the whole Debate has turned upon the propriety of giving the man compensation who has been deprived of his licence. It has been contended that you have no right to compensate a man unless he has a legally vested interest. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian laid down distinctly that a publican—he evidently meant the wider statement, that a man—is not entitled to be compensated by reason of his suffering from a contingency which is existent under the law at the time when he enters upon his occupation. He takes the occupation subject to the risks attendant under the existing law. Therefore, the right hon. Gentleman laid down that he cannot be entitled to compensation. Of course, the right hon. Gentleman will not say that one law should be applied to the publican and brewer, and another to other men in a similar position. Therefore, the right hon. Gentleman's conclusion is based on the general premise that the publican should not be so compensated. But the right hon. Gentleman himself has set a remarkable precedent. In 1870 he took up the case of the Irish tenant for the first time. Now, the Irish tenant was liable under the law, as it stood, to be dispossessed of his holding on six months' notice; he took his tenancy subject to that contingency; and, therefore, on the broad principle laid down by the right hon. Gentleman he could not be entitled to compensation if he were deprived of his holding by legal process. Nevertheless, the right hon. Gentleman, supported by a large number of hon. Members opposite, carried a law under which an Irish tenant thus dispossessed of his holding should receive compensation. Surely that was fatal to the principle he now lays down. Let us take another case—the abolition of purchase in the Army. There was a large number of officers in the Army who bought their commissions with the knowledge that those commissions were really for one year only, because unless the Mutiny Act be renewed every year—and it is quite within the discretion of Parliament to refuse to renew it—the Army would disappear and the commissions would be worthless. The officers bought those commissions, giving larger sums than the legal cost for them, subject to that contingency; but when the right hon. Gentleman put an end to the system of purchase he gave to those officers as compensation the illegal value of their commissions. With these precedents, which are surely on all fours with the present case, how can hon. Members, and least of all the right hon. Gentleman himself, now contend that those who are interested in public houses are not entitled to compensation if their occupation is taken from them through no fault of their own, because they hold only for the year, and the Magistrate has absolute discretion as to renewing. As regards "absolute discretion," that does not mean an arbitrary discretion; the discretion must be used judicially. I will now deal with the three points raised by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton as well as I can. The right hon. Member for Bridgeton has said that under this Bill the County Councils would get nothing for their money, but that they would rather sustain a loss. The hon. Gentleman took the case of a village in which there were six public houses; the County Council bought one of them at which £300 a year was spent, and asking what would be the result to the other five, said the £300 would then be spent in them, and thus the value of the remaining houses would be increased. He further pointed out that the £300 would be spent in the remaining houses, the proprietors of which would not be required to engage extra servants to meet the extra demand; so that in their case the £300 would be a net profit, while it had been only a gross profit in the case of the house purchased. But the right hon. Gentleman protested too much. If the result of putting an end to one house is that the money spent in that house will be spent in the others that remain, what is the use of diminishing public houses at all? To do any good at all in the cause of temperance in that case it would be necessary to do away with every public house in the country. But is that feasible or desirable? I do not think the argument will commend itself to the senses of the House. The next argument of the right hon. Member was that the Bill is an elaborate arrangement for the County Councils, or the country through them, to make a bad bargain, because there are at least two or three persons interested in every public house, and when one has been bought out the others will be able to raise their prices. Well, there is scarcely any property whatever, either in London or out of it, in which several persons are not interested. The County Councils would, of course, engage good business men to carry out the work of purchase for them, and no business man would be guilty of the folly of dealing with any separate owner unconditionally. They would approach them as nearly as possible simultaneously. They would begin with the freeholder, or long leaseholder, and, having got the whip hand, they would be able to deal very shortly with the publican. If a publican takes a house and conducts it badly, the Magistrates do not refuse to renew the licence of the brewer, if he puts in a man to conduct it respectably. But the right hon. Gentleman says he would not compensate the brewer who built the house or valued the property; he would compensate the publican. But is a man who has so conducted his business as to jeopardise the property of another to be compensated? He is just the man that ought not to be compensated, and the suggestion that such a scoundrel should be compensated comes from the right hon. Gentleman himself, and is not to be found in this Bill. He complains that the Quarter Sessions have upset the decisions of the Local Licences Committee. That may be a good reason why we should alter the law with regard to Quarter Sessions; but it is no reason why a publican should not have the value of his property, if it is taken away from him, just as everybody else has under similar circumstances. When I hear these things said about property, I am reminded of what Macaulay wrote of the Puritans' dislike to bull baiting. He said they put an end to bull baiting not because they cared for the bull, but because they hated the Cavaliers who engaged in the sport. So in this instance, it seems to me, that opponents of the Bill are actuated more by hatred of the brewers than by love of the cause of temperance. This Bill is going to give a moderate sum of money year by year to County Councils to enable them to improve the moral aspect of our towns as they are now enabled to effect physical improvements. If the County Councils pull down property, including public houses, for the purpose of affecting street improvements, they have to give full compensation and 10 per cent. added. If they wish to get rid of a publican to improve the moral aspect of the town at present they are powerless. This Bill gives them the power and the money to make a fair bargain with the owner of a licence, and, of course, unless they can make a fair bargain, they will not deal with him. I know of a very strong case which occurred in a village of Scotland where the inhabitants of two towns on either side of it could go to drink on a Sunday. The people asked the Magistrates to get rid of it, but they were unwilling to deprive the owner of his means of living. ["Name."] I shall not give the name. I am giving the instance. The name is immaterial. I say that if these Magistrates could have given the man £100 to start some other kind of business; they would have been able to get rid of the house. You may depend upon it, Sir, that there is a great deal of kindly feeling among people, even with regard to publicans, and they would be very loth to deprive a man of his livelihood without compensation. By the proposal of the Bill you would get rid of a considerable number of public houses which, though not bad enough to come under the censure of the Magistrates, are yet such as could be very well dispensed with. I will not detain the House. [Cries of "Go on."] As I am so earnestly desired, I will say one word more. It has been said by the right hon. Gentleman that if the County Councils included brewers it would be a very shocking thing, as if brewers were beyond the pale of humanity, and that it would only open the way to jobbery. For years the efforts and aspirations of the right hon. Gentleman have been devoted to the cause of Local Government, yet he cannot trust the County Councils because the people, who have a right to return whom they like, may return brewers, and that, therefore, these bodies cannot be trusted to prevent jobbery. They must not have this small sum, because they cannot use it in an honourable and upright manner. I have not the same distrust of County Councils as the right hon. Gentleman, and I have a great deal more faith in them than he has. I hope the House will carry this clause by a large majority.

(10.50.) SIR W. HARCOURT: Mr. Speaker, the hon. Member who has just sat down has observed that this Debate has turned entirely upon the question of compensation. That is so, not merely upon this side, but on that side of the House. Every hon. Member who has defended this Bill has found it necessary to defend the principle of compensation. Even the Chancellor of the Exchequer founded his argument upon the propriety and necessity of compensation; if this measure has nothing to do with compensation, why should the right hon. Gentleman have thought it necessary to take up the cudgels for the principle of compensation? But then there is the great temperance authority, who is also a supporter of this Bill—the hon. Member for South Tyrone—who says that he will support the Bill, because he wishes to see the principle of equitable compensation affirmed. I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian that we need not trouble ourselves very much about the consistency of the hon. Member for South Tyrone. I will refer to some of the tu quoques of the Chancellor of the Exchequer directly. I am bound to say that when I see the Chancellor of the Exchequer rise, except with his Budget, I know that four-fifths of his speech will be founded on that convincing argument the tu quoque, and he has become such a master of that argument that he scarcely employs any other weapon. As to the hon. Member for South Tyrone, my hon. Friend the Member for the Cockermouth Division quoted his speech of two years ago denouncing the wickedness of the Bill of 1888; but that Bill was also, I presume, a Bill for equitable compensation. I am quite sure that he would not deceive his friends and allies by introducing a Bill for any compensation if it was not equitable. Why the hon. Member thought it necessary to oppose so vehemently the Bill of 1888, and to support with equal fervour the Bill of 1890, they both being Bills providing for equitable compensation, I am unable to understand or explain. But that, after all, is not a matter of very great consequence. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has thought fit to make an attack upon the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian and also upon a much more humble individual, myself; and he stated, as other hon. Members opposite up and down the country have stated, that I have made speeches in favour of compensation. But one thing I have remarked, that none of those hon. Members have quoted a single line from any of my speeches in favour of compensation. I have never learned the law as it has been laid down by the present Law Officers of the Crown. I have always understood the law to be—and I took it seven years ago upon the authority of the then Law Officers of the Crown—as it was laid down in the case of “Sharp v. Wakefield,” and I then stated, speaking for the Government of that day, and standing where the Chancellor of the Exchequer stood when he charged me with maintaining the principle of compensation, that no case had been made out for giving compensation on the extinction of licences. There is my answer to the Chancellor of the Exchequer’s tu quoque. As far as I can recollect, I defy the right hon. Gentleman to show that I have ever said anything inconsistent with that statement. I am not going on the present occasion to enter into the details of this Bill, which have been very fully discussed; but I think that it will be of some little interest to speculate and to conjecture as to the real origin of this Bill. I confess that throughout these discussions I have felt a certain sympathy for the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board for having the conduct of this Bill. I confess I do not attribute the origin of this Bill to the right hon. Gentleman. I have always observed a sort of popular fibre about him which has always led me to feel that he is a Liberal accidentally gone astray. Therefore, I do not attribute the origin of this Bill to the right hon. Gentleman. I think it originated in a more ingenious and subtle brain, and I should attribute the origin of it rather to the right hon. Gentleman who sits near him, and who I should describe as an accidental Liberal, who has now returned to his natural fold. But the right hon. Gentleman has entered that fold as a sort of Sinon, and he has landed in the middle of the Tory camp a wooden horse, which his Colleagues will find to be rather a troublesome gift brought to them by the perfidious Greek. This Bill appears to me to be a sort of a thoroughly Liberal Unionist scheme, and what I mean by that is that it is not a Liberal scheme, and not a Tory scheme, but that it is a Liberal Unionist scheme, which pretends to be one thing and actually is another; and I do not know anyone more likely to have invented and perfected a scheme of that kind than the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. No doubt it has been devised for the purpose of aiding the cause of temperance. But it is so devised that, in the opinion of all who have studied the temperance question, it will produce exactly the opposite effect. But if the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer is too modest to assume to himself the whole credit of this plan, I daresay he may have been assisted also by his fertile and ingenious Colleague who generally sits on these Benches—I mean the right hon. Member for Birmingham. My right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham has so many plans I think it possible this may be another. Then, in order to complete the system, there is always the hon. Member for South Tyrone, who is ready to be godfather to this or to any other misbegotten progeny. I think, then, that I have attributed the origin of this Bill to the proper quarter. I think that we should be rather interested to know what that combination has determined in secret conclave to-day as to its future course. We have heard of one meeting which had a disastrous result, and now there has been another meeting to determine what those who were present at the first meeting shall do at the third meeting. That my contention was not altogether unfounded has been proved by the statement to-night that the Government are prepared to amend their Bill, and are going to accept an Amendment, and that Amendment comes from the Gentleman who sits at the end of this Bench—another illustrious genius—my right hon. Friend the Member for Grimsby (Mr. Hencage). He is the only person equal to the task of amending the Bill. It happens that one of the chief questions under discussion in this Bill is whether or not the proposals of the Government will interfere with the jurisdiction of the Magistrates, or, if they do not interfere with it legally, whether they will so operate as to give a claim to licensed houses which, in fact, they do not at present possess. Well, Sir, there were several Amendments to meet that on this Paper. There was an Amendment which I took the liberty of putting down. I will say nothing about that. But there was the Amendment put down by the hon. Baronet opposite, the Member for one of the Divisions of Manchester (Sir W. Houldsworth), who speaks in this House as a representative of the Church of England Temperance Society. That is an Amendment which, if any Amendment were of avail at all, certainly declares that—

“Nothing in this Act, or any agreement made thereunder, shall be deemed to recognise any right or claim of any person to receive compensation.”

Sir W. Harcourt

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, N.E., Darwen): I rise to order. I wish to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman is speaking to the Question?

THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Gentleman is garnishing the subject, but he is not out of order.

SIR W. HARCOURT: It is a subject that requires some garnishing, I think, although the noble Lord does not seem to like the sauce with which I am dressing it. Now, I venture to say that what I am about to observe is perfectly germane to what the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill has said. He referred to the Amendment of my right hon. Friend on this Bench as the Amendment which was to give security against the fears we entertain of the consequences of this Bill. I may say that there was an Amendment in strong, plain, definite terms on this subject put down by the hon. Baronet the Member for Manchester (Sir W. Houldsworth) as showing the arguments of the Church of England Temperance Society, and that Amendment the Government have rejected.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I will tell the right hon. Gentleman why I say they have rejected it. They cannot accept two Amendments on the very same subject; if they accept the Amendment of my right hon. Friend the Member for Grimsby, they cannot accept the Amendment of the hon. Baronet opposite.

*MR. RITCHIE: The Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Grimsby was the first Amendment on the subject on the Paper, and it seemed to the Government fully to carry out the intention of my hon. Friend behind me, of whom the right hon. Gentleman has spoken; but if the Amendment of my hon. Friend will reconcile the right hon. Gentleman to the Bill, I think there will be no difficulty in our accepting it.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am delighted that I am going to rob my right hon. Friend of the honour of amending the Government proposal. I have taken the precaution, as the right hon. Gentleman will see on the Paper, of amending my right hon. Friend's Amendment by striking out his words and putting in the words of the hon. Baronet the Member for Manchester. I am very glad, therefore, to hear that we have got rid of the weak liquor of my right hon. Friend, and that we have made a little better blend of it. So far, so good. Well, now, a great deal has been said upon a matter which is of great importance—upon the operation of this Bill as it will affect the brewer and the publican. That is a very material question. The right hon. Gentleman has expressed an intention of making provision for the publican as distinguished from the brewer; but I think it is a very great pity, if he intends to do that, that he has put down no Amendment on the Paper. Gentlemen opposite complain of the length to which these Debates go; but, surely, if the Government wish to shorten them, they should put upon the Paper those Amendments which they intend to press by argument. I got a letter the other day upon a case, which is not an imaginary case such as the hon. Member who has just sat down has spoken of. There was a woman who kept a small free public house. The owner sold it to the brewer, who gave a considerable sum for it. The whole of the money was divided between the brewer and the owner, and the woman who kept the house was turned out and got no compensation. If the brewer and the owner give no compensation to their tenant, it seems to me that they are the last persons in the world who ought to set up a claim to this compensation. With reference to this Bill, I complain of the conduct of the Government in this respect. They complain that we are wasting time over this Bill. Well, Sir, I am very sorry that we are spending time over it; I would much rather have spent time over other Bills which were mentioned in the Queen's Speech. The hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell), in a lucid interval of indignation against the Government, asked the other day whether it was intended to proceed with Bills not mentioned in the Queen's Speech before Bills which were mentioned. I would much rather we were discussing the Employers' Liability Bill, or a Bill relating to the public health of the Metropolis, or to the dwellings of the working classes, or Friendly Societies. All these were in the Queen's Speech, and yet here we are discussing a Bill sprung upon us in a Supplementary Budget by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Government complain of the opposition we are offering to this Bill. They have received counsel from outside that they should force this Bill through the House by means of the Closure and all other available resources. I am bound to say to the best of their ability they have followed that advice. Night after night and time after time we have seen the leader of the House getting up to move the Closure, and he has been met by the rebuke—the deserved rebuke of the Speaker or the Chairman. ["No, no!"] It is no use to deny it, because it is entered upon the Journals of the House. It has happened on former nights—it has happened to-night. What are the reasons that are given for rushing this Bill through the House? ["Oh!"] Yes, you have not succeeded, and you will not, but it is not for want of trying. The reasons given for forcing on this Bill and endeavouring it to get it out of the way have been most frankly and even cynically avowed. It is said that it is so unpopular that you must get rid of it as soon as possible. That is quite true in regard to its unpopularity. The right hon. Gentleman in charge of this Bill has read us some extracts from a newspaper. I will read an extract from the leading organ of the Liberal Unionist Party in the West of England, the Western Morning News. That organ of the Liberal Unionist Party says:—

"It is becoming daily more evident that the details of the Bill, as it stands, are creating profound dissatisfaction. Liberal Unionists feel that they are especially responsible for the flagrant omissions and imperfections which characterise the Government measure. It is they who sustain the Government in office. It is they who will have the power at any future election to sway the fate of Parties. This sense of responsibility has prompted decided action. The temperance men of Devon and Cornwall are in arms against the measure as now framed. They believe it to be an honest but misguided attempt to deal with the liquor question. So manifest has this become that the executive of the Liberal Unionist Central Organisation for Devon and Cornwall have been impelled to adopt vigorous measures. They have represented to Lord Wolmer, and through him to the Government, that they cannot allow themselves to be made responsible for the Bill in its existing shape. They have urged the grafting into the measure of the modifications and amendments so well set forth by Mr. Powell Williams, Liberal Unionist Member for South Birmingham in a recent letter to the Times. They have pointed out that unless some proposals are adopted, or the Bill be withdrawn, the Liberal Unionists of the West will be so alienated as to endanger the cohesion of the Party."

Now, this is why I say it is extremely interesting to know what were the conclusions come to at the meeting held this afternoon on the subject of this Bill. This Liberal Unionist writer puts it in this way:—

"It is possible that the Government might even force the Bill through Parliament, but they would do so at their peril. The next General Election, and any bye-election which may occur in the interval in the Western Counties would show that, in taking up such a position, they were disastrously misguided."

Well, on account of the unpopularity of this measure, it is thought extremely desirable that the Bill should be got through the House as soon as it possibly can be. I think it is a test measure, because if you can get your majority to swallow it, it is certain you can get them to swallow anything else. But Gentlemen opposite will, of course, consider their own policy and judge of their own interests. We also have to judge of the course we ought to pursue. We are determined to offer to the very end every resistance which the law of Parliament allows us. You are determined to press it on. We are determined to oppose it. You will try on the Closure over and over again, as you have tried already. But in our opinion, in employing such methods to pass such a Bill as this, you will only increase the indignation and disgust with which the country regards this measure and your conduct in forcing it on. We believe, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian has said, and as one of your own supporters has said, that this Bill strikes a fatal blow at the future hopes of temperance. You have heard the views of your own supporters—you have had a Balaam from Stepney, and the Member for North Camberwell (Mr. Kelly) has announced his intention of voting against the Bill. What independent support have you received for your measure? The right hon. Gentleman in charge of this Bill thought it necessary to parade such authorities as he could. I do not think he made much out of his Wesleyan friends. My right hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) and my right hon. Friend the Member for the Brigg Division (Mr. Waddy) have disposed of those Wesleyan allies. You say that this measure is misunderstood. You say that it is condemned only by people who are ignorant of its true character. You may attribute to us that we are actuated by Party motives. You may attribute to the masses of the people who are collected together on this subject that some of them have not studied all the clauses of the Bill. That may be true, but can you pretend, or is there the smallest foundation for saying, that the non-political, the non-partisan advocates of the temperance cause are not overwhelmingly against you? I hold in my hand a letter written by Archdeacon Farrar. He is not an ignorant man. He is not a partisan. He is not a political man. The Under Secretary jeers at Archdeacon Farrar. I do not know what right he has to jeer.

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. LONG, Wilts, Devizes): The right hon. Gentleman accuses me of jeering at Archdeacon Farrar. I did nothing of the kind. The right hon. Gentleman said that Archdeacon Farrar was not a political man, and I did smile at that remark. I certainly did not jeer at Archdeacon Farrar, for he is a man for whom I have always had a most unlimited respect.

SIR W. HARCOURT: All I can say, then, is that if the right hon. Gentleman has an unlimited respect for Archdeacon Farrar he will probably believe the statements in his letter. He begins by saying, "I dislike to meddle with questions which assume a political aspect." The letter is, we may say, prefaced by the declaration that he has never been actuated by political prejudice. What does he say on this subject? He says he adopts the phrase of my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian, that this is a plan for "establishing and endowing" the liquor traffic, and then he says this of it, and I think it as good a definition as I have seen:—

"And this will be done by a side wind. It will be done in an accidental and indirect way, which nevertheless involves a decisive recognition by Parliament of a bad principle, and which will perpetuate on our necks and the necks of our children's children a yoke which neither we nor our fathers were able to bear."

And this, we are told, is a scheme devised to help those who are battling with intemperance. . . . It is all very well for those who support these most deplorable proposals to declare that they leave the principle of compensation untouched for future decision. They may rail at our ignorance and obtuseness, and set it aside as due to the pig-headedness of 'temperance fanatics.' If such language amuses them, let them indulge in it. But let them remember that the supporters of the drink interest and their own most ardent defenders in the Press take exactly the same view of the meaning of these clauses as ourselves."

He then ends in this way :—

"Is this, then, the time at which the nation should cease to make that trade more irresistible by helping to perpetuate the deadly fascination which it exerts over the weak and the miserable? Is this the time at which to pamper still further its bloated and ominous prosperity? Doubtless the Government may use its Parliamentary majority to pass these obnoxious clauses; but history has taught us that there are some victories which are more disastrous than defeats, and some defeats or withdrawals which are safer and more honourable than victories. If these clauses are passed in the teeth of the remonstrances of such multitudes of earnest temperance workers, who in this matter are guided by motives absolutely patriotic and disinterested,"—

—[Ironical Ministerial cheers.]—You deny that the motives of the temperance workers are patriotic and disinterested? ["No!"] What, then, is the meaning of your cheer?

"it may, I think, be safely prophesied that the Conservative hopes of return to power after the dissolution of this Parliament will hang upon a spider's thread."

The Under Secretary says he has a great respect for Archdeacon Farrar, therefore I am sure he will be glad to have heard his sentiments on this matter. Sir, I adopt those sentiments, every word of them. Those are the sentiments and principles which animate the opponents of this Bill. Holding those sentiments, believing them to be well founded, you may depend upon it that to the end we shall, by every means in our power, resist and endeavour to defeat this Bill. We believe, nay, we are confident, that, in doing so, we have the support of the great majority of this nation. We accept the issue you have joined upon this matter. You may overpower us by your majority to-day; but you may depend upon it that in the appeal which must, sooner or later, be made to the judgment of this country, you will receive its final condemnation.

*(11.28.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I confess it is somewhat disappointing to say a word after such a speech as we have heard from the right hon. Gentleman. In the course of that speech the right hon. Gentleman has not advanced one single argument in support of the Amendment before the Committee. His speech is, no doubt, an excellent indication of the kind of opposition which he has twice over told us is going to be presented to the passage of this Bill. By every means in their power the passage of the Bill is going to be opposed by hon. Gentlemen opposite. Well, Sir, if that means that time is to be wasted ["No, no"]—as effectively wasted—by those who support the right hon. Gentleman as it has been wasted by himself during the last half-hour, I think there will be a very large majority of Members who will think that the time for putting on the Closure will very soon arrive. [Cries of "Order!"] Having ventured, with all respect, to remind the House of the character of the speech to which we have just listened, I should like to say a word with reference to the observation he made to the effect that the Chancellor of the Exchequer indulged in nothing but what the right hon. Gentleman called tu quoque. Those who heard and those who read that speech will judge whether the criticism is a just one. I confess I am always amused at the querulous tone in which the right hon. Gentleman speaks of the subject of tu quoque. I feel that when his epitaph comes to be written I should put it in five words "Consistency, thy name is Harcourt." I will tell the right hon. Gentleman why he objects to tu quoque. If he can find out that some Member of the Government is not quite of the same mind that he was two or three years ago, he thinks it quite fair argument to quote some speech against him.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I have not quoted any speech.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I am not referring only to the present occasion. But if any one quotes a speech of the right hon. Gentleman himself, or of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, it is a different matter altogether, and the opinion they expressed a short time ago is altogether an accident. I will ask the House to note the difference between the speech to which they have just listened, and that of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian. Whatever may be said of the utterances of the right hon. Member for Derby, I do not suppose that the followers of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian will suggest that everything he has said on this subject during the last 10 or 15 years is to pass for nothing. There have been made by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, and by Members speaking with his sanction and concurrence, and by advocates of the Party entitled to great respect, utterances, some of which were referred to by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which amount to this—that the trade we propose to deal with by this Bill has been told, over and over again, that their business is being carried on under legal sanction, and such speeches and statements have been made by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, not hastily, not for the purpose of occupying time, but with the view of indicating a definite and distinct policy, statements under the sanction of which has grown up a trade on the strength of which capital has been spent which ought to be respected. I put it as a practical question to hon. Members opposite, who desire to approach the question fairly, and not in the spirit of the speech we have just listened to—Are you prepared to close every public house? Is it within the range of practical politics that any scheme should be entertained for closing all public houses? The right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone) would say it would be absurd to introduce a Bill for that purpose. Such a proposal could be made only by those who are looking forward to some Utopia, and it could not possibly receive legislative sanction. If once you recognise you cannot close all public houses it is absolutely necessary that in any scheme you should abstain from doing injustice to those whose business is taken away, while taking care that you do not raise the cost of acquiring the public houses that remain. Any scheme for reducing the number of licences, subject to those conditions, must approach this question from the standpoint taken by the Government in this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman has repeated the statement that the law of the subject, as now laid down by the Law Advisers of the Crown, is different from the law received from those officers seven years ago, I am utterly unaware of any difference between past and present Law Advisers on this particular question. I have never stated my opinion on this matter in the House before, and I now say most distinctly that the case of "Sharp v. Wakefield" was decided upon special and particular grounds, upon which, if ever that case comes to be argued in the House of Lords, it must be decided in the same way; and I say it is no authority whatever upon the question of what would be the duty of the Magistrates if they called upon a person who was entitled to the renewal of a licence to come before them and thought fit to refuse the renewal of the licence. [Opposition cheers.] Hon. Gentleman may cheer, but I am not giving an expression of opinion simply for the purpose of endeavouring to gain an advantage in argument.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Of course everybody knows the Magistrate must call the applicant before them.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: The right hon. Gentleman forgets that in nine cases out of ten, if not in 99 out of 100, the licences are renewed without the holders or applicants being called upon to appear, and without there being any power in the Magistrates to call them before them. I am dealing with the question as a matter of practical experience. I freely admit, and I have never said anything to the contrary, that the Magistrates, having before them the applicant for a licence, are entitled to exercise a discretion as to whether it should be renewed; and that discretion, if exercised on proper grounds, is absolute. I have not stated anything contrary to that at any time or place; but if the Magistrates decline to renew the licence simply on the ground that there are too many licences in the neighbourhood, they are not exercising a judicial discretion, and they would not be warranted by their position in arriving at such a conclusion. The right hon. Member may shake his head, but I am bound to state my view that if ever that question comes to be examined, the Courts of Law will not support the Magistrates who take that position. I am well aware that there are obiter dicta in "Sharp v. Wakefield" which may be thought to point to a contrary conclusion; but the case was decided with reference to a particular fact, and the decision was not intended to lay down any general principle of any kind. I rose for the purpose of pointing out that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby afforded no argument which ought to induce the Committee to support the Amendment. That speech contained many graceful flowers of oratory, which, however interesting to hear, did not add much to the enlightenment of the Committee. Treating the proposals of the Government as they are entitled to be treated—as a straightforward and honest attempt to deal with this question on a basis of equity and justice—I submit that the Amendment ought to be rejected by a large majority.

(11.40.) Mr. RITCHIE rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 279; Noes 238.—(Div. List, No. 133.)

Question put accordingly, "That the words '(ii.) The sum of three hundred and fifty thousand pounds shall be applied for such extinction of licences in England' stand part of the Clause."

(11.54.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 275; Noes 243.—(Div. List, No. 134.)

It being after Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

Mr. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Is this Bill to be the first Order on Monday?

Mr. GOSCHEN: Yes.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I wish to ask whether, after this extremely significant Division, the right hon. Gentleman intends to persevere with this clause?

Sir W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cocker-mouth): Do the Government intend to proceed with the Bill day after day?

Mr. GOSCHEN: The hon. Baronet will remember the declarations made by the Leader of the House, and to those declarations we, of course, adhere.

MOTION.

POST OFFICE MAIL CONTRACT (EAST COAST OF AFRICA, ZANZIBAR).

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the contract with the British India Steam Navigation Company, dated February 5, 1890, for the conveyance of mails between London and the East Coast of Africa (Zanzibar) be approved."—(Mr. Jackson.)

Mr. T. M. HEALY: Before the House agrees to this, I think we may ask that some explanation should be given.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): This matter was before the House in Committee of Supply. The contract is to provide a subsidy of £16,000 a year for steamers running to Zanzibar. The German Government have given a subsidy of £45,000 to their line of steamers, and considering the great interests of this country in that part of the world, it is very necessary that the steam service should be maintained. The origin of the service was in connection with the suppression of the slave trade, and our commercial interests in that part of the world have vastly increased. The whole matter was fully debated in Committee of Supply, and I hope the House will now sanction the contract, which is, I think, upon commercial terms. The rate of speed is not excessive, but the means of communication so necessary for our interests will be maintained.

Mr. CONYBEARE: I do not wish to impose any formidable obstacle, but I have not seen the contract, and the right hon. Gentleman has not told us what is in it.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): It has been before the House for three weeks.

MR. CONYBEARE: But the Motion appears for the first time to-day.

MR. JACKSON: No; it appeared last Friday.

MR. CONYBEARE: I want to ask, in the first place, whether the contract was accepted with the British India Steam Navigation Company upon open tender?

MR. JACKSON: Yes, Sir.

MR. CONYBEARE: The right hon. Gentleman tells us the rate of speed of these vessels is not great. That is an important consideration, and, unless we have some more satisfactory assurance, I shall consider it my duty to oppose the taking of this matter to-night. The right hon. Gentleman has referred to the necessity of competing with Germany in this matter of steam communication between this country and Zanzibar, but if we have a good service it is desirable that the rate of speed should be something better than obtains in the services in the Eastern seas. The P. and O. steamers are not required to do more than  $12\frac{1}{2}$  knots, and I have had experience of the slow rate in the Brindisi and Bombay service. Yet in the Indian Ocean, as is well known, there is not the stormy weather Atlantic liners have to contend against, and they can do 16 or 17 knots. Then I ask for some information as to the minimum time of steaming fixed in this contract, the length of the contract, and whether the mails will be despatched weekly, fortnightly, or monthly.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): If the contract is sanctioned by this House, will it be binding on the Department, or may it afterwards be over-riden in consequence of the decision of the Solicitor to the Treasury, as was done in a recent instance? I do not think the action of the House in sanctioning a contract ought to be over-riden; it is reducing our proceedings to a mere farce.

(12.33.) DR. TANNER (Cork, Mid): I must protest most strongly against important business of this nature being taken at so late an hour of the night. I may say I was surprised to see the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs. put up to speak on this question, seeing that he was recently appointed a Director of the Peninsular and Oriental Company. People, who are interested in these questions should have nothing to say upon them. I beg to move, in the absence of a satisfactory explanation on the points raised, that the Debate be now adjourned.

(12.37.) MR. JACKSON: I am sorry to think that the hon. Member for Camborne has not had time to read the contract and the statement regarding it, issued by the Treasury some weeks ago. This Motion is not down for the first time to-day. It has been on the Paper since before the Recess, and it was down for last Friday. The minimum speed under the contract is 10 knots an hour. The hon. Member has referred to the fact that Atlantic steamers make high rates of speed, but it is not possible in hot climates to equal the speed of those vessels. Even if we could the cost would be so enormous that I do not think the House would sanction the charge in view of the small saving of time that would be effected. The hon. Member for Mid Cork has spoken of the connection of my right hon. Friend with the Peninsular and Oriental Company. But this company with which the contract is made may be considered a rival to the Peninsular and Oriental Company.

DR. TANNER: I merely said they were hand and glove.

MR. JACKSON: And my reply is that they are rivals in trade. As to the period of the contract, it was made last year, and at the time it was very difficult to decide the permanent policy of the Government with regard to speed and the frequency of the service. The contract is, therefore, made only for two years, and will expire next year. I can assure the hon. Member for the College Division of Glasgow, who has referred to an old grievance with reference to the action of the Treasury in the case of a former contract, that this contract will be adhered to in every particular if the House gives its sanction to it.

Question put, and agreed to.

House adjourned at a quarter before One o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, 16th June, 1890.

THE CENSUS—PETITION.

*LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: My Lords, I have to present a Petition from the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, the prayer of which states that the petitioners are desirous that the connection with different denominations of the people of Scotland should be definitely and authoritatively ascertained, and that this should be done in taking the next Census. I understand that this Petition is presented because in the course of certain recent events, importance has been attached by some people to the argument which may be deduced from there being a majority of those who adhere to one denomination rather than to another. Without expressing any opinion upon the validity or usefulness of that argument, I desire to say, on behalf of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, that their desire is that the exact state of matters, be it what it may, should be ascertained.

FISHERY BOARD (SCOTLAND) BILL.

A Bill to alter the constitution of the Fishery Board for Scotland; and to amend the law in regard to mussel fisheries in Scotland—was presented by the Lord Ker (M. Lothian); read 1st; and to be printed. (No. 121.)

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF CLARENCE AND AVONDALE.

The Marquess of SALISBURY acquainted the House, by the Queen's command—

“That Her Majesty had been graciously pleased to issue Letters Patent, dated the 24th day of May, creating His Royal Highness Prince Albert Christian Edward Duke of Clarence and Avondale, whereby his said Royal Highness obtained a right to sit and vote among their Lordships in Parliament; and Her Majesty recommended it to the House to consider of the place his said Royal Highness should occupy in the House.”

Ordered, That the matter with which the Marquess of Salisbury has acquainted the House, by Her Majesty's command, be referred to the consideration of the Lords Committees for Privileges; and that their Lordships do meet to take the same into consideration To-morrow at half-past Three o'clock, and do report their opinion thereupon to the House.

STANDING ORDERS.

THE EARL OF MORLEY: My Lords, I beg to move the Amendment which stand in my name of Standing Order No. 47. The object of the Amendment is that the noble Lord, who is in charge of any Bill, should ex officio be a Member of the Standing Committee to which that Bill is referred.

Moved, that Standing Order No. XLVII. be amended as follows:

NOTE.—The words underlined are to be omitted, and the words printed in Italics are to be inserted.

The Standing Committees shall consist in all of not more than one hundred and fifty Lords, and each Committee shall not consist of less than fifteen Lords, to be nominated by the Committee of Selection, who The Lord in charge of a Bill committed to a Standing Committee shall be a member of the Committee during the consideration of such Bill. The Committee of Selection shall have power to discharge Lords with their assent from time to time, and to appoint others in substitution for those discharged, and The Committee of Selection shall also have power to add not more than ten Lords to a Standing Committee, in respect of any Bill committed to a Standing Committee, to serve on the Committee during the consideration of such Bill.—(The Earl of Morley.)

On question, agreed to.

THE CENSUS OF 1891.

*THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: My Lords, as the time is now approaching very closely when arrangements must be made for the Census of 1891, I think it desirable to bring under your Lordships' notice a point with reference to the Census which has been raised on more than one previous occasion. I think it desirable, especially under present circumstances, with regard to which I have to say a word or two presently, that there should be in the Census papers for 1889 a column showing the religious persuasion of all the persons whose names are returned. I think that as this matter has been mixed up sometimes with ecclesiastical questions, it may be as well to say that I do not make the Motion after having conferred with the Representatives of any Church, or in the interests of any Church, or against the interests of any Church. I make this Motion as a Member of Parliament, and I regard the subject entirely and solely from a Parliamentary point of view. I may remind your Lordships of what has passed on previous occasions with regard to this matter. Similar Motions were made in 1860, in 1870, and in 1880. In 1860 Sir George Cornewall Lewis moved that a column be inserted in the Census Bill of that year in the sense of that which I now propose. It was opposed by Mr. Baines, speaking on behalf of the Nonconformists, and he used mainly two arguments. He said, in the first place, that the State had no right to ask a man what was his religious belief; and, he stated, in the second place, that any such Return would be unfair and inaccurate, because persons who were not attached to any special form of belief would, if asked, declare themselves members of the Established Church. The Government of the day were not at all convinced by that argument, but they did not press the point. There was a considerable difference of opinion, and Lord Palmerston, in closing the Debate and giving way on the subject, said that while they gave way to the feelings of the opponents of the proposal, they did not much appreciate the force of their arguments. But though, accordingly, no change was made at that time with regard to England, Wales, or Scotland, Mr. Cardwell, the then Chief Secretary for Ireland, assented to the introduction of such a column as that for which I am now asking your Lordships' sanction, and that was carried out in regard to Ireland. In 1870 Mr. Bruce stated, in answer to a question with regard to Scotland, that a religious column would be inserted in the Census Bill of that year for Scotland. The Free Church Assembly and the Established Church Assembly had both at that time petitioned in favour of such a clause being inserted; but some opposition arose afterwards in Scotland, and the clause was withdrawn. In the year 1880 the question was raised again, and after a similar discussion and similar arguments put forward the clause was once more withdrawn. Now, the Motion was resisted, as I have said, by the Nonconformists, and on the general grounds which I have stated. I am bound to say that, speaking merely for myself, I do not appreciate the force of the two arguments which I have mentioned; but, at the same time, I do not wish to regard this question from any narrow and far less from any sectarian point of view. I am perfectly ready to look at the matter as having different bearings, as I think those arguments have, when applied to the different countries. Now, my Lords, I am quite free to admit that in England there are considerable differences in the case as contrasted with Wales, and as contrasted with Scotland. In the first place, in England there are a very large number of religious denominations, of various kinds and of various strength, which differ very often from one another in very minute particulars, and with regard to which it might perhaps be difficult in some cases to make very accurate Returns. There may then be something—I do not think it is much, but still I am quite ready to admit that there may be something—in the statement that in England if persons who are not attached very strongly to any special form of religious denomination were asked this question they might declare themselves to be members of the Established Church. As I have said, there is something in that, but I do not think there is very much. But the strongest point of difference as it appears to me, when it refers to the Census of 1890, is that there is not likely to be, as far as one can see, any very important point raised with regard to the Church of England in a serious manner. My Lords, that is the reason why I think those who are opposed to this Motion may, on the present occasion, fairly say that they think great objections would be made to it in parts of England, and that they are not, as regards England, prepared to assent to it. But when we turn to Wales the case is entirely different. As your Lordships know, the Nonconformists in Wales possess a very large numerical majority—at least I believe they are in a large numerical majority—as compared with the Church of England. I have seen it stated, and I am bound to say it appears to me to be a very strange statement, that the Established Church has in recent years been making considerable advances in Wales. That may or may not be so; all I say is, that I know no reason whatever, and I am very anxious to know whether there is any reason, for making such a statement as that. And, further, I do not see why, if this statement is incorrect, as it may be, the members of other religious denominations should object to any statistical Returns at all being made upon the subject, or how it can otherwise be proved that that statement is incorrect. But, with regard to Wales, your Lordships will remember that a very important announcement has been made by Mr. Gladstone as the head of the Liberal Party. He has announced that it will be part of the Liberal policy put forward at the next General Election to carry out the disestablishment of the Welsh Church. It appears to me, my Lords, that for that very reason Parliament is bound to obtain the best information which it is in its power to get. I am aware it has been argued that the Members of Parliament have the best means of gauging the religious opinions of Wales and also of other parts of the country. I admit that, to a certain extent, that may be so, but Members of Parliament are not elected upon one question, and upon one question only, and even when they are, I have known occasions on which statesmen have been able to argue that when you put the minorities in certain places in contrast with the majorities in other places, it by no means necessarily follows that the conclusion arrived at is the opinion of the majority, or, at all events, that it is more than the opinion of a small majority. My Lords, for that reason it appears to me that, whether this be true or not, it is desirable that you should also have this second form of information, which, I think, is the most reliable form of all, namely the religious opinions of people as stated by themselves. But when we come to Scotland, the case becomes very much stronger indeed. With regard to Scotland, a similar announcement has been made; and it has been declared, as your Lordships all know, that a prominent part of the policy of the Liberal Party will be the disestablishment of the Scottish Church. With regard to that I merely make one remark, in which I am sure that all your Lordships who have any connection or acquaintance with Scotland will entirely agree with me that no question could be put forward which will stir so deeply all the feelings of the people of Scotland as that question of the disestablishment of the Church. Well, that being so, and I believe it to be an undoubted fact, surely, my Lords, we ought to obtain, as far as we can, the very best information we can with regard to the various denominations of the Presbyterian Church. Now, I wish to press the question as regards Scotland most particularly upon your Lordships, because the arguments which I mentioned just now, and which I admit may have some force when applied to England, have no force at all when applied to Scotland. In the first place, every one belongs to some religious denomination. I am quite certain that the numbers of nondescripts in religion, as I may call them, are extremely small in Scotland. In the next place, the divisions between the various religious denominations, the lines of division, are very clearly marked out. You have the Roman Catholics, who include in their number the inhabitants of a small portion of the Highlands, and who also have a considerable number of adherents, mainly of Irish descent, in the large working towns of Scotland. Then you have the Episcopalians, who are also, I believe, a somewhat growing body. But the main body of the Scottish people are Presbyterians, and they are divided between the three forms of the Established Church, the Free Church, and the United Presbyterian Church. I dare say that to many of your Lordships the doctrinal distinctions between those three denominations may not be very clear, but in Scotland they are well known, and the members of those three religious bodies themselves know extremely well to which of those three Churches they belong. And not merely do they know to which of those three Churches they belong, but they have no objection whatever to state their religious beliefs. My Lords, it has been argued that it is an impertinence on the part of the State to ask any man to wrotedown what is his form of religious belief. I am quite certain there will be no objection taken on that score, at all events among a very large majority of the people of Scotland. And, my Lords, you must remember that this matter is not being dealt with now from an exclusively novel point of view. This is not the first time we are asked to undertake to deal with it. We have dealt with it, as I have told your Lordships, in Ireland. It was dealt with in the year 1860. Mr. Cardwell then inserted a clause which I think, if I remember rightly, was proposed by Lord Emly, enforcing a religious Return in regard to Ireland. What were the reasons why that was done? I do not think those reasons are very far to seek. I believe that that proposal was made because statesmen were at that time of opinion that questions connected with the Irish Church were likely to come forward within the ensuing 10 years. I imagine the Return was given in accordance with the wishes of the large proportion of the people of Ireland, and it has been worked upon, and successfully, from that time up to the present. My Lords, I may go even a little further. In 1860 that Return was a Return which everyone was compelled to make; but in the year 1880 it was made an optional Return, and I have the best reasons for knowing from official statements that the Return which was made in 1880 was within the smallest possible fraction as full a Return as was made when a religious Return was a compulsory matter. It was Mr. Forster, I believe, who desired that that Return should be optional instead of being compulsory, and the result was that that Return was willingly complied with. My Lords, I have reason for knowing, also, that it is approved of by ministers of all religious denominations, and that it has been found very useful for various practical purposes. Now, I do not think I need trouble your Lordships with many more remarks. Who is there in Scotland, I should like to know, who objects to it? I have been reading lately, and I dare say most of your Lordships have who are connected with Scotland, what has passed at the meetings of the General Assembly of the Free Church and of the Established Church, in Edinburgh, and I observe that the Established Church approved of such Returns being given, and that the Free Church disapproved of it. I think they resolved to present a Petition to Parliament against it. I have made inquiries in the matter, but I think up to the present time that Petition has not been presented. I was rather anxious to see it for this reason, that I wanted to know what were the grounds which they put forward for objecting to a Return of this kind. In the year 1870, as I told your Lordships just now, they approved of a Return of that description. But what I desire to impress upon your Lordships is with regard to a Return of this kind under the present circumstances, when the question of the disestablishment of the Church in Scotland has become a very important political question, that the desirability or undesirability of such a Return is not a matter to be decided by any Church or by any Churches. It is a matter for Parliament to consider, and if Parliament is of opinion that, in dealing with such a grave question as this, it is necessary and essential to have the very best information which can be obtained, then I hope that Parliament will insist, at all events, for Scotland and Wales, upon such a Return being made. My Lords, holding such opinions, I beg to move the Resolution of which I have given notice.

Moved to resolve—

"That it is desirable that in the Returns of the forthcoming Census information should be obtained as to the religious persuasion of all persons resident in England, Wales, and Scotland, distinguishing in Scotland between the various Presbyterian denominations."—(The Earl of Camperdown.)

*THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, on a recent occasion we were entertained by a member of this House, who sits on the Cross Benches, Lord Wemyss, with a discussion upon the merits of several Bills which are still in the House of Commons. I ventured, and I think some other Members of the House ventured then to point out, that that was an unusual and an irregular proceeding. Fortunately in this House we have a good deal of time, but if the practice of discussing Bills which are still in the other House of Parliament was to obtain, and if the contagion of it was to stretch across that hall I dread to think of the increased power of delay which would result from such a practice. But my noble Friend opposite has gone further than discussing a Bill which is in the other House of Parliament; he has discussed a Bill which is to be introduced into the other House of Parliament, and he wants your Lordships in this House to prescribe the form that it is to take. I feel that on mere Parliamentary grounds alone, on mere grounds of regularity of procedure, I should not be at all performing my duty if I in any way acceded to the design of the noble Lord, or stated an opinion with regard to the matters which he has raised. I am confirmed in that view of my duty by the peculiar compromise of opinion at which he has himself arrived. Many people have thought that it is desirable to have a religious Census everywhere; other people have thought that it is not desirable to extend that principle to the British Isles, but I have never before heard any opinion expressed that it is desirable to have a religious Census in Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, and not in England. What is the ground which the noble Lord puts forward of such a distinction? He says that our religious differences are much more minute in England than those between the various sects in Wales and Scotland. Well, that is news to me. I have always understood that it is one of the privileges of the Northern intellect to be able to distinguish between the various churches of the other side of the Border with a facility which is thoroughly denied to our coarser Southern intellect. Again, the noble Lord seemed to think that there was a peculiar species of timidity and terror, which belonged to the people South of the Tweed, and East of whatever boundary divides us from Wales—that whereas in Scotland people did not mind being asked to what religion they belonged; in England they felt a great terror in doing so, and always called themselves members of the Church of England.

*THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I said that it was only the opponents of this Motion who said so.

*THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: But my noble Friend, by acceding to the omission of England, gives some currency to that argument. Well, I do not accept that opinion of my countrymen at all.

They always seem to me to be very free to express their opinions upon any subject, religious or otherwise, which comes uppermost. And I fear that if we once admit the refusal or inability of people to express their own religious opinions as a ground for not taking a Religious Census, you cannot confine that argument to England alone. Surely, there must be some people in Ireland, for instance, who have some fears of the opinions of their neighbours on matters which affect the community, either in a religious or a political sense. I do not wish to claim for my own countrymen any unusual amount of moral courage, but I really think they express their opinions quite as freely as they do in the Southern and Western districts of Ireland. I do not know what remedy we can adopt. What shall we do if we cannot trust a man to say of what religion he is? Shall we require an attestation from his two senior female relatives in order to ascertain to what religion he belongs? It appears to me that the speech of my noble Friend while sinning in the first instance, and principally sinning against Parliamentary regularity, has also, in the glimpse which it has allowed us to have of the logical condition of his own mind, warned us against forming any premature opinions on this subject. It is a matter to which I hope Parliament will give its attention. There is no doubt that by the House of laymen in England and the Church of Scotland asking for this Religious Census, the position is somewhat altered on this question from what it was in former years, but I would earnestly deprecate any premature decision. I hope we shall not treat it, when the matter is before us, as a Government or Party question, but as one upon which each can give his opinion according to the best of his ability. I hope, however, that we shall not commit the gross irregularity of pronouncing an opinion upon Bills which are not yet before us.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, for many years I have generally agreed more or less with the noble Earl, if not with the noble Marquess, but on this occasion I must say I think that the criticism of the noble Marquess is just. I have been informed that there is a Departmental inquiry now going on with regard to the best mode of carrying this Census into effect; and I think it would be very premature for this House to give its opinion with regard to the Census before the Bill has been introduced, which the noble Marquess has said is to be introduced into the House of Commons. My own opinion is strongly against introducing this clause for the purpose of obtaining a Religious Census. It is a matter which has been discussed for a very long time; it has been answered three times in the negative, and, in my own opinion, is entirely bad. But I am quite sure of one thing, and that is, that it is a great object to make this Census popular, and that anything which creates violent opposition to the Bill in the way proposed would be a very much greater Parliamentary evil than if the Religious Census were left out in dealing with this question, whether you shall include in or leave out of it a particular form of information. There is one point upon which I do not agree with the noble Marquess, and that is, that there should be no difference made between Scotland and England. Supposing the one country desired that this piece of information should be obtained, and the other did not, although I have said my opinion is against the insertion of a clause calling for this particular information, yet if all Scotland were unanimous, which I very much doubt, notwithstanding the assurances of the noble Earl, in the desire to have it, that would place the question in a different position to what it is in England; for I believe the opposition would be still more violent than that which made the objection successful formerly. I do not know whether it was necessary to say even as much as I have said; but I entirely agree in the inexpediency of pressing this Resolution, and the more so because it strikes me that the Resolution of the noble Earl and his speech do not agree, for his speech was in favour of leaving out England, while his Resolution is for including it.

*THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: My Lords, I hope I may be allowed to offer a few remarks upon the suggested advantages and disadvantages of such a proposition as this, as it is naturally supposed that the Church may have a view upon them. It is very often pressed upon the authorities of the Church that they should ask for a Religious Census. It is pressed on the ground of assertions which are constantly made as to the numerical position of the Church in comparison with other bodies, which we Churchmen believe to be entirely incorrect. But I believe that I shall state the real opinion of the authorities of the Church if I say that they have no intention to press for a Religious Census, and that simply upon the grounds put forward by the Nonconformists. It is put forward by Nonconformists that it would interfere with their religious freedom, and it is also argued that an advantage would be derived by the Church from the supposed fact that persons who do not belong to the Church of England would possibly enrol themselves in the ranks of her people. The Church has no desire to take advantage of either position. She has no desire to reap any advantage from what could be regarded as an interference with the religious freedom of the Nonconformists, and certainly she does not wish to swell her lists by including in them people who are not of her religion. My Lords, the Church will, therefore, not press for anything of the kind. On the other hand, the Church will not offer the slightest resistance or objection to whatever may be thought advisable. The Church has knowledge of many facts about her own position, and she would not object in the least if it were proposed to take such a Census, either in England or Wales. With regard to Scotland I have no right, of course, to speak. I feel that this is entirely a matter for the Government to determine, and I was very glad to hear the noble Earl say that he moved the question on purely Parliamentary grounds. The Church, I repeat, will feel no objection to a Religious Census being taken, but will make no movement to press for it.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: My Lords, before the question is put, I wish to say a word or two in reply. After what has been said from the two Front Cross Benches I shall not, of course, ask your Lordships to take a vote on the question; but if the sins of my speech were purely and simply sins with regard to procedure, I can assure the noble Marquess that I am quite ready to accede to everything he has said and to postpone my Motion until this Bill, which I am told is not yet introduced—I do not know when it will be—has been introduced, or rather until such time as the Bill shall come up to this House. But I am afraid that I must have been rather awkward in the language which I used in expressing my own opinions, because the noble Marquess appears to have gathered from my speech that I saw great objections to such a Census being taken in England. My Lords, that is not at all what I intended; and if my words bear that meaning, I am afraid they were not very well chosen words. What I intended to convey to your Lordships was that if there is a strong objection felt in England—which I believe there is—that objection does not, in my opinion, apply to Wales, and still less does it apply to Scotland; and that in Scotland, at all events, the subject might be dealt with, and ought to be dealt with, in exactly the same way in which it has been dealt with in Ireland. I notice that neither of the noble Lords have alluded at all to the question of Ireland. On the question of Ireland I may, I daresay, on a future occasion have to call your Lordships' attention to the matter: but it is a very remarkable thing that when important matters with regard to the Irish Church were coming to the front, Parliament was then of opinion, and very rightly of opinion, that it was desirable that some kind of information should be obtained with regard to the position of that Church. It appears to me that exactly the same remark applies to the Established Church in Scotland and also to the Established Church in Wales. But I need not detain your Lordships any further, and, with your Lordships' permission, I will ask your Lordships' leave to withdraw the Motion.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

CHILDREN'S LIFE INSURANCE BILL—(No. 97.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH: My Lords, the Bill to which I have to ask your Lordships to give a Second Reading this evening is a Bill for amending the law respecting child insurance; and it appears to me that, in order to induce your Lordships to do this, I am bound to show you three things: first of all, that the present law affecting child insurance is unsound in principle and defective in operation; in the next place, that it leads to a very serious amount of evil, no less an evil than that of largely extended infanticide; and, thirdly, that the Amendments of the law which I now propose are likely to be effective in checking those evils as are in themselves just and reasonable. Now, my Lords, in the first place, let us ask ourselves what is the law at present which regulates child insurance in this country. Child insurance in this country is a thing of comparatively recent date. Until 25 years ago it was practically all but impossible that a child's life could be insured in this country. For 100 years previously to that time all life insurance, including that of children, was regulated by the well-known Statute 14 George III. cap. 48, which forbade all insurances being effected on lives unless the insurer could show an insurable pecuniary interest in the life, and it forbade any sum being insured for more than that pecuniary interest. The reason given in the Statute is a very remarkable one; it is in order to prevent wagering and gambling, or, in other words, gambling in human life and speculating on human death. My Lords, that law prevailed for 100 years. Obviously cases have been very few in which a parent could have a pecuniary interest in the life of a child and in which he could thereupon proceed to insure its life under that Act. In 1875, however, the Legislature, with the best possible intentions, in order to encourage thrift in the working classes, passed what is known as the Friendly Societies Act. That Act repealed this salutary provision of the Statute of George III., and, within certain limits, of which I will speak presently, allowed the insurance of child life. Now, my Lords, obviously the principle on which the Parliament of that day allowed this was not, strictly speaking, the principle of life insurance at all. The life of the child was permitted to be insured on this ground, that although the child would produce no pecuniary gain to the parent during its life, the expenses connected with the death of the child might be heavy in respect of nurse, doctor, funeral, and so forth, and the Legislature intended that the parent should be enabled to recoup himself or provide beforehand for those expenses by an insurance on the child's life. In point of fact, my Lords, strictly speaking, children were allowed under this Act, as goods were allowed, to be insured. Under the Act of George III. goods which bring no pecuniary gain to the insurer, but the loss of which may be injurious to him, were permitted to be insured. My Lords, I cannot put the effect of this Act better than by saying that it allowed the lives of children to be insured as perishable—sadly perishable—goods. Now, it is quite clear that a person insuring either animate or inanimate goods is exposed to this temptation, that he may insure for a large sum, and then, in order to obtain that sum, destroy the thing that is insured. And the Parliament of that day were quite alive to this evil. But they thought that they had sufficiently guarded against it by what I may venture to call a very clumsy provision which has proved a very inefficient protection against this evil; that is to say, they fixed a money limit in regard to the amount to be insured. The amount for which the insurance was allowed to be effected was, in the case of a child under five years of age, £6, and of a child between five and 10 years of age £10. Now, my Lords, to pass over the obvious absurdity of saying that a limit of £6 is sufficient to save the life of a child of five years of age, but that, for the same purpose, the limit may be extended to £10 beyond that age—that the limit of £6 is sufficient at five years old, but that a limit of £10 is sufficient in the case of a child which may be only three months older—there is this vital and inherent defect in attempting to provide a safeguard by imposing a money limit, that it can only be done on one impossible condition; that is to say, that you shall so balance the amount of death expenses on the one hand, and the amount of death profit on the other, that they shall be as nearly as possible equalised; because, if it should come to pass that while you have in the amount of death profit a fixed sum, yet that, owing to circumstances either beyond the control of the insurer or largely within his control, as I shall presently show your Lordships may be the case, the amount of death expenses are considerably lowered, while the amount of death profit remains unchanged, immediately there emerges a margin of profit from the death, and with that margin of profit there emerges the temptation and danger of the commission of a crime. That, my Lords, is, I think, the inherent vice of any attempt at protection by imposing a money limit. Before I go on to show you how large a margin of profit does ensue to the insurer under the present law, let me point out that if there be a temptation and danger to life under the existing law, that danger is a hundredfold greater in the case of infant than in the case of adult life. The adult leads his life for the most part independently of the insurer, and to take the adult's life requires the commission of some deed of violence or some act of poisoning which may be traceable after death; but, in the case of infant life, none of these conditions exist. The fragile existence of the child is dependent for its very sustenance during its life, and for its preservation in disease upon the care and is absolutely at the mercy of the person, who, being its parent or its guardian, may have a pecuniary interest in its death. Is there, I would ask, any one of your Lordships who would allow one of your children to be entrusted to a sick nurse, who had a direct pecuniary interest in its death? But that is the case with regard to child insurance. In order to bring about a child's death there is no occasion for the violence which would be required in the case of an adult. It is only necessary that there should be a little neglect, a little exposure, a failure to administer the needful food or medicine, and the little life is quenched. My Lords, we know that the parent or immediate guardian of a child holds that child's life in the hollow of his hand, and it only requires a slight act of negligence, not perceptible to bystanders, for the death profit to be obtained. In the case of infant life insurance, you have, therefore, all the circumstances requisite for producing crime; you have present temptation, you have enormous facility, and you have almost absolute impunity. The wonder would be if crime did not take place under those circumstances. Now, I will show your Lordships what is the margin of profit which will ensue in these cases to act as a temptation to crime. I must now ask your Lordships' attention to figures with regard to these insurances to show the extent of this evil. Child insurance has become a speciality in connection with three or four great Insurance Companies which have expanded it to gigantic dimensions. There are no less than 600,000 children insured at this moment in Great Britain. These Societies are what I may call "Collecting Societies," which undertake the bulk of this kind of business. I desire your Lordships to note that I distinguish between Friendly Societies and these great Insurance Societies which conduct their business by collecting agents all over the country. As I have said, there are but three or four of these great collecting Insurance Societies, and they do about 80 per cent. of the whole of the money value of this child insurance class of business. As to these Insurance Companies, opinions differ very much in regard to them. Opinion with regard to them ranges between the opinions of very competent judges, who are rash and irreverent enough to speak of them as "pests of society," up to the opinions of those Insurance Societies themselves, who assure us that they are the most calumniated persons in the world, and that they are nothing less than bands of enlightened philanthropists who, purely in the interests, and simply for the comfort and well-being of, the working classes, go about persuading them to insure the lives of their children. It is a matter of perfect indifference to my argument which of these views is taken. I am perfectly willing to accept all the Insurance Societies say of themselves, as to their disinterested benevolence and philanthropy, and to acknowledge they could not possibly be better if their Board of Directors consisted of Archbishops, and if all their collecting agents were Bishops, and I suppose, my Lords, that a higher ideal of human perfection you could hardly expect me to put before you. I am quite content to take that view, because what we are concerned with here is not the motives of these Societies, but their methods. Now, I have a word to say about their methods and their results. Those methods, my Lords, are these: They flood and inundate the country with a number of insurance agents who receive a premium of no less than 30 per cent. upon each insurance. Those agents go from street to street, from house to house, from tenement to tenement, urging, persuading, pestering poor people to insure their children. Your Lordships will scarcely believe it, but I am told it is a fact, that in the benevolent zeal and earnestness of these agents to do good, children are sometimes actually insured before they are born, and the sex of the child has afterwards to be put into the policy! From this follows one or two things. In the first place, that these highly competitive agents are not too scrupulous as to the characters of the persons whose children they insure, nor too scrupulous as to evasions of the law in regard to those insurances. Another effect is that this keen competition has reduced, naturally, the amount of the premiums paid on the one hand, and enhanced the amount of the policy monies on the other, to the utmost limits consistent with the modest profits which these benevolent persons allow themselves. I am going to give your Lordships a very short calculation to show the exact amount of profit that may be made on the death of a child whose life has been insured with one of these Insurance Companies. We will suppose that a parent insures a child for 1*l.* a week, and that that weekly payment goes on for six months. At the end of the six months he will have paid 2*s.* 2*d.*, and then, upon the death of the child, he receives £2 10*s.* 6*d.* Well, my Lords, what are you, on the other hand, to deduct from that sum? You are to deduct, of course, all necessary death expenses. Yes, my Lords, but only necessary death expenses. I think we may safely say that a parent who means to profit by a child's death will not incur unnecessary expense upon the death. He is not likely to send for a doctor or a sick nurse, whose aim will be to preserve the life he wants to destroy; and I do not think, when the death takes place, he is likely to go into very deep or expensive mourning for the death of the six months old child whom he has just murdered! Then, my Lords, let us see what the death expenses are likely to be. First, there is the expense of the funeral, and not even necessarily that, because the parent may drink every penny of the insurance money, and then the parish will be compelled to bury the child. But let us see what that expense, if incurred, may be? I have a list here of 12 undertakers in London who announce in their windows that they will conduct the burials of children under five, all expenses included, for sums ranging from £1 to 15s. Deduct that sum, together with the 2s. 2d. premium, from the insurance money £2 10s. 6d., and you have an average balance of something like £1 8s. 4d. profit. Not unfrequently, however, a child is insured in two companies. Nothing is commoner than the double insurance of children; and then for the additional penny a week, the parent gets the whole of the second sum of £2 10s., because although there may be two insurances there can be but one funeral, and the profit, as I have made it out, is simply this: that for the expenditure of 4s. 4d. in the course of six months the parent receives £5 1s., so that a balance or premium emerges on infantile murder of £3 16s. 4d. Of course, in the case of halfpenny premiums, the sum received is the half of that. Now, my Lords, these sums may seem very small to your Lordships, but £2 or £3 is not a small sum to that class which insures for a penny or a halfpenny per week. It is a very considerable sum to a needy man. It means the payment of arrears of rent, getting clothes or tools out of pawn, and far more frequently it means an immediate and near prospect of a big debauch, and the spending of the insurance money in drink. It has given rise to a horrible state of things in our great towns. Parents have been heard more than once to say of a dead or dying child, "Now we shall have a little funeral, and a big drink." My Lords, I state the whole case for the Bill in that one sentence. I want to stop these "little funerals and big drinks." I ask your Lordships to consider what horrible demoralisation to the human mind and heart there must be caused by this system when such a sickening phrase as that can become proverbial. Then, I ask your Lordships to see what protection there is for these child lives? We are told that there is the protection of parental care and affection. I am very far from denying that in the very great majority of cases that is a real protection; but it is not adequate to meet all cases. We are accused of libelling the working classes in this matter, and of representing them as if they were devoid of natural affection. That accusation is absurd. We do not libel the grocer when we pass statutes against false weights and measures; we Bishops do not libel the clergy when we propose measures for enforcing clergy discipline. In every class and profession there is a residuum of evil-disposed persons, and to take legislative precautions against them is no libel upon the rest. I believe that the affection of the poor for their children, and the privations they will go through in order to bring them up decently and put them out in life, their sacrifices for them, their care for them in times of sickness, are very noble traits among them. This beautiful feature in the character of poor working men and women is often exhibited in a way that puts to shame their betters. But there are such people as unnatural, cruel, and drunken parents; and until this residuum improves or disappears, there must, in the present state of the law, as I have shown, be serious danger to child life. My Lords, let me observe to you that though the proportion of these bad and cruel parents may be relatively small compared with the vast number of poor who treat their children with kindness, it may be absolutely very large. If only one in each thousand of these 600,000 children meets with foul play, it is a small figure as represented in decimal fractions, but it means 600 children murdered in England every year. Take, again, other classes of children who are brought into the world every year in this country. There are 54,000 children who are described by the significant phrase "not wanted," illegitimate children. Take the case of the baby-farmer, who takes from the young trusting mother her child in order to hide her shame, and then locks it within her detestable den, where it will rot and starve. When you put all these things together, I ask your Lordships, may not there be very serious danger to child life? Then there is the question of the protection afforded by doctor's certificates. The doctor must certify, of course, that the child has died from natural causes, or there will be an inquest and consequent exposure. My Lords, a doctor's certificate in most of these cases cannot be worth the paper it is written upon. The doctor is obliged to certify that the child has died from natural causes. The child may present all the symptoms of having died from what began from a natural cause, though its death has, in fact, been aggravated by improper food and improper treatment, and the doctor cannot possibly distinguish between the one case and the other. His certificate is, therefore, useless, unless he knows the history of the case. From whom is he to get that history? The only persons who can give it him are the persons who ex hypothesi are engaged in the proceeding of so ill-treating the child as that it shall die. My Lords, I will give you one letter from a medical man before I go further, and I will at once ask your Lordships to take each piece of evidence which I give you merely as sample evidence, for if I were to put all the evidence in my possession before you my speech would last until midnight. I have here a letter from Dr. Barwise, a medical man of Birmingham, who wrote to the public papers about it. He says—

You are to my painful knowledge absolutely within the truth when you state that every year hundreds of parents are guilty of child-murder in this town. Besides the cases brought to light in the Coroners' Courts, there are vast numbers more which are reported to the Coroner, but which, after inquiry, he decides it would be useless to hold inquests upon, and there are also many more where the medical attendant is compelled to grant a certificate, because he could prove nothing against the statement of the parents. The fact is, there are no certain signs whereby starvation can be detected, and the medical man has to rely upon the bare word of the mother that the child is properly and regularly fed. Every thoughtful practitioner must be fully convinced that he has filled up 'marasmus' (wasting disease) to parents who have practically starved their children to death. Frequently the first thing the mother says is—'I suppose you will give me a certificate if any thing happens.' Hardly a day passes without my hearing it, and I generally find that the parent would gain several pounds from some Insurance Office if their child died."

So much, my Lords, for the protection afforded by doctors' certificates. Then, if these people do not escape that mesh there is the chance of a Coroner's Inquest. But, again, there is little chance of the Coroner interfering successfully, because the principal witness must be the medical man—the poor little children are, of course, not competent witnesses—and who else is there to convict in the vast majority of these cases? The Coroner's Juries are generally told by the Coroner, "There is no legal evidence to convict this person." I will now trouble your Lordships with a very important and interesting letter from another medical man on this subject. He says, writing to myself—

"I am perfectly satisfied that there are any number of murders of innocent children for the sake of the insurance money. Unfortunately, it is almost impossible to bring the crime home to the parents, as it is so easy to get rid of an infant by neglect, irregular feeding, and bad food, and, even when ill, neglecting to carry out the doctor's orders. I have seen several cases of this sort when in practice in Devonshire, and was so impressed with the fact that I gave out that I would have an inquest held on any child dying that was insured. In some very bad cases in which inquests were held I was met by the one question, Are you prepared to swear that the child would have lived had it been properly fed? As I could not swear to anything of the kind, but simply express my belief, the verdict was returned as death from natural causes, although everyone knew well that the babies had been as much murdered as if they had had their throats cut. The mothers are too crafty to starve them to death, but give them sour food, causing diarrhoea, expose them to cold, &c., and neglect to give medicine, &c., as ordered."

And then the infant dies. Your Lordships see, therefore, what protection there is afforded by the Coroner's Inquest and Jury. Then, if they do not escape the Inquest, next comes the Court of Assize; and if your Lordships think for a moment how much stronger the evidence is required to be in a Court of Assize, and how difficult it is to obtain a verdict there, you will see how likely these persons are again to escape conviction, that each of the successive meshes lets through a vast number of cases, and that neither the doctor's certificate, the Coroner's Jury, nor the Court of Assizes prove a sufficient check upon infanticide. My Lords, I have gone through the cases of supposed protection to child life, which, it is sometimes said, make infant insurance perfectly safe, and your Lordships will judge of what effect they are; but I shall prove to your Lordships that infanticide really does occur. We who bring forward this Bill are asked, "Can you produce any cases of infanticide?" If, by cases of infanticide, you mean cases of infanticide which have been brought to trial, and in which a conviction has been obtained, and where those convicted have been punished, of course we cannot produce such cases. If we could, there would be no need of this Bill. It is just because there are in the majority of cases no means of securing punishment that it is necessary to alter the law. As the Committee of the House of Commons on Friendly Societies, in their Report the other day, say—

"It is almost impossible to bring to conviction crimes committed in the privacy of the house."

It is necessary, therefore, to bring forward a Bill of this kind. But, my Lords, these convictions do occur, and when they do occur, they let in a very lurid light on child insurance. My Lords, I need scarcely say to you that the evidence which will warrant a Judge and jury in hanging a man for murder, and the evidence which will warrant the passing of an Act to prevent him committing murder, are not exactly of the same character; and I think it is absurd to ask us to give you the same evidence in one case as in the other. But I will give you the opinion of persons who are quite competent, as your Lordships will agree, to judge in this matter. First, I will give you the opinions of Her Majesty's Judges. They are certainly persons who have ample opportunity of forming an opinion. Let us see what they say. Mr. Justice Day stated in a recent case—

"Those pests of society, those deadly Societies which insure children, which seem to be instituted for the destruction of children, for the perpetration of murder."

Here is Mr. Justice Wills—

"It is a melancholy fact that in a great many of these cases—the deaths of young children—the wretched children's lives have been insured. These Insurance Clubs or Societies have their agents all over the Kingdom, persuading people to insure the lives of their children for sums which are a great temptation toward their destruction. I cannot say how strongly I feel on the subject of these Insurance Societies for very small children. Originally, I have no doubt, some of them were started with the motive and for the purpose of inducing people to save, so that, in the event of a calamity happening, they would have the means to meet it; but they have terribly degenerated. How many cases have I tried, from one end of the year to the other, in which the subject of the inquiry was the death of children whose lives had been insured? Oftentimes it would be a much more correct definition of these so-called Insurance Societies to say that they were Death Insurance Societies."

Those are the opinions of Her Majesty's Judges. Now, my Lords, I will give you the opinions, if you will bear with me for a moment or two longer, of a number of Coroners. Here is the opinion of Dr. Macdonald, the Coroner for the North-East of London. He was asked, in giving evidence before the Committee of the House of Commons—

"Are you of opinion that infantile insurance is an incentive to crime? A. I am distinctly of that opinion.—Q. You have also had experience as a Medical Officer. Does the result of your practice run to the same conclusion? A. Yes, as a doctor I saw that the general rule was not to kill the children outright, but to let them die gradually from bad feeding, not having medical attendance, and so on."

Another Coroner, Mr. Troutbeck, of West London, says—

"The practice of insuring infants' lives seems to me to be a custom that is to be condemned on every ground."

Then Mr. Hawkes, the Coroner for Birmingham, says—

"As long as those abominable infantile Insurance Societies exist, so long will mothers come to this Court to tell the story the jury have heard to-day."

Then the Coroner for North and South Wales, Mr. Cuthbertson Howell, says—

"The practice of insuring children is becoming far too common. If insured children are taken ill, they are frequently neglected. Their parents have a direct interest in their death."

One instance more, my Lords. Mr. Carter, the Coroner for the County of Gloucestershire, says—

"The longer I live, the more occasions I have to look with suspicion on deaths of young children that are insured. Insurance encourages a greater interest in their deaths than in their survival. I shall do all I can to put it down."

My Lords, I have given you the evidence of Coroners. I will now pass on to the evidence of clergymen. You will find that two Committees of the Houses of Convocation reported strongly upon this subject, and the last Committee more strongly than the first. I will now give the evidence of Public Registrars, who have great acquaintance with these matters. Take the opinion of Mr. Ludlow, the Chief Registrar General of Friendly Societies, as given before the Committee of the House of Commons. He says—

"I think it perfectly clear that in no case is it the interest of these Societies to increase infant mortality; all Insurance Bodies wish life to be prolonged and not shortened; but I have no doubt that the practice of such societies does tend, and must tend, to increase infant mortality. The mere fact that a collector calls week by week at a poor man's house, or room, rather, to receive  $\frac{1}{4}$ d. premium for each of his children must familiarise those parents with the death of those children."

Then Mr. Ludlow is further questioned by Mr. W. F. Lawrence, who says—

"That is precisely what I wanted to elucidate; it is only presumption; there is no evidence really worth talking of to prove the increase of infant mortality under the system; it is what we may all think likely, but there is no real evidence to go upon. Answer: No; but at the Friendly Society Commission we certainly found that infant mortality was greatest in those towns and localities where these Societies were strongest."

Then Dr. Thomas W. Grimshaw, Registrar General of Ireland, referring to the City of Dublin death-rate amongst children, said it "Was very large, and an extraordinary thing to be observed in connection with it was the number of the children who died not having been seen by medical men, and no exertion having been made to save their lives. The way in which children were allowed to die, so that insurance money might be had for them, was a disgrace to the whole nation."

Let me give your Lordships one more instance, and a very important one. It is the evidence which is afforded by the verdict of a jury last year, if I recollect rightly, in a case of child murder, where the child's life was insured—

"The jury are of opinion that the facilities given by the loose system of life insurance practised by some of the companies is an incentive to wilful murder for the sake of the insurance money."

And they desired the coroner to convey that expression of opinion to the Home Secretary, in the hope that the Government might initiate some legislation to remedy the evil. My Lords, I have now given you a large amount of evidence from our Judges, coroners, medical men, clergymen, and insurance registrars; and now let me give you the last expression of opinion with which I shall trouble the House, and to me one that has moved my own mind very much. When it was known that I was introducing this Bill into your Lordships' House I received a letter from the head of a shoe factory in my own diocese, from one of those men who, as we say in Northamptonshire, "has risen from the shoemakers' bench" to the control of a considerable factory. He writes to me to say—

"My Lord, I am delighted to hear that you intend introducing a Bill into the House of Lords to stay the lives of infants from being insured, as this is getting a crying evil in our villages. Agents are coming round daily persuading mothers to ensure the lives of their children. I feel persuaded that once the question is taken up in Parliament, it will stay a great amount of evil."

May I add one instance more which affects my own mind greatly? The wife of a respectable artisan in Peterborough, who had lately lost her child in the infirmary, said to the Sunday school teacher of her child—

"Ah! Miss, my poor child was not insured; my husband and I lived in Sheffield 11 years, and we saw so much of the wickedness in the way of child insurance that we agreed that no child of ours should ever be insured."

And when she was told I was bringing in this Bill she said, "Thank God! he does not know the good he will do." This, my Lords, is evidence from the working classes, whom we, the promoters of this Bill, are accused of libelling. The evidence I have given your Lordships' House is simply sample evidence, and it can be multiplied to any extent. Now, against all this, what is there to be said? We are told there is statistical evidence against it, and I must really ask your Lordships' attention for a moment to this extraordinary example of statistics. This is not a very amusing subject, but I think this will amuse your Lordships. We are told that it is impossible that there can be this amount of child murder, because the statistics show that the percentage of mortality among the insured children is considerably lower than the general death rate all over England, to the extent of no less than 8 to 15 in favour of the children insured in these Societies. Well, my Lords, if this precious piece of statistics were worth anything, as I can assure your Lordships it is not, it would certainly prove the most extraordinary physiological fact conceivable; it would prove that so invigorating is the process of insurance in the case of an unconscious child six months old, that it lives longer than an uninsured child. So that, my Lords, it would come to this, if these statistics are correct, that these Insurance Societies are a kind of health resort for sick children, and that when a doctor has tried every other remedy and feels himself compelled to say "I can do no more," he need only add "Try insurance; and if that does not save his life, nothing else will." But these extraordinary statistics are easily disposed of in a moment. The Registrar General's Returns are, of course, credited with the number of deaths of all children born alive in this country, but the Insurance Societies are not credited with the deaths of those children who die before they have been insured. Of course, the rate of mortality diminishes day by day from their birth. Another most important thing to be remembered is that a very large amount of child insurances in these Societies fall through; that is to say, their parents fail to keep up the payment of premiums on the policies, and they become what are called "lapses." In that case they go off the books of the Societies, and I suppose the benevolence of the Societies does not induce them afterwards to endeavour to trace out the parents for the purpose of giving them any benefit from the premiums paid. If those lapses amount, as I am told they do, to nearly one-third of the whole number of such policies taken out, your Lordships will clearly see that the area in the one case from which the percentage is taken, and the area in the other are not equal, and, therefore, these statistics are worth nothing. My Lords, I have gone as rapidly as I could through the very largely-extended case which I have to put before your Lordships consistently with doing anything like justice to it or making it plain to the House; and I have, in the last instance, to put before your Lordships what the remedies are which I propose in my Bill for these terrible evils. The Bill is really very simple and very brief. It contains in the 1st clause a provision which extends the protected life of a child to 14 for boys, and 16 for girls. That, as most of the other provisions are, is in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Committee of the House of Commons. It brings down, also, the absurd inequality between the death

expenses and the death profits by lowering the amounts for which children's lives can be insured. Then follows in Clause 2 a provision upon which I confess I lay very much stress, though it has been strongly objected to, and it is the provision that the money shall not go to the parent or person insuring, but to the undertaker. This follows the analogy of the sick club, where the money does not go to the parent, but to the doctor attending the sick child. There can be no profit to the parent under this clause. But there are some objections put forward to this provision. The first is, that there may be collusion between the undertaker and the parent. Against that we provide by heavy penalties to be inflicted for any such collusion, and I should hope and trust that if there were any such attempts those penalties would be rigorously inflicted, and I should then hope that the sight of a collusive undertaker and parent on the treadmill would have a very good effect in preventing those collusions for the future. But the principal objections which we have to meet, we may say, are two: one is, that it would prevent the parent providing for the medical attendance upon the child, as the money must all go to the undertaker. But the services of a doctor can be obtained for the payment of a penny a week by another insurance. There is nothing to prevent the parent doing that with no gain to accrue at the child's death. But, my Lords, if that is not thought to be enough I am perfectly willing to put a clause into the Bill which will provide for payment of the doctor's attendance out of the insurance money, as well as the undertaker's fees. Then, the last objection is, that you would greatly enrich the undertakers by this measure, because the parent who has insured his child for £5 cannot put it to any other purpose which may be desired, but is obliged to give it all up to the undertaker. Well, my Lords, I would rather that undertakers should be enriched than that children should be murdered—if you are obliged to do it. But you are not in the least obliged to do it. That objection could only apply to the death-profit on insurances now effected. It could only apply in case the operation of the Act is retrospective, because as soon as new insurances had to be effected under this Act parents would not be so simple as to insure for a larger sum than was needed to provide for the funeral expenses, in order simply to enrich the undertaker. Therefore, the whole of these objections disappear, and would be at once met by doing what I am perfectly willing to do in Committee, that is to say, cutting out of the 9th clause the latter part, and leaving it simply that this Act shall not affect contracts which have been entered into until after the date of its passing, thus making it entirely prospective. I can only say that I shall be perfectly prepared to consider any Amendments upon this clause which may be proposed in Committee, which will not interfere with the object and intention of this Bill, which is simply to prevent the possibility of a death-profit being made by the insurer. My Lords, if we cannot prevent this evil by this Bill of mine, or by some other Bill which your Lordships' wisdom may devise, then there is one other alternative, and to that we shall have to come. That is, the absolute prohibition of infant insurance altogether; because I am quite certain of this, that when the conscience of the English people is once fairly roused as regards the iniquity and cruelty now going on in connection with child insurance, they will come to one resolution at any rate, that do it as you may by legislation, settle it as you choose in your wisdom, one thing they will not have, one thing you must prevent, and that is a system by which parents all over England are making money by the deaths of their children. That is what the object of the Bill is. My Lords, the other provisions in this Bill are mainly provisions which are recommended in the Report of the Friendly Societies Committee, to which I have already alluded. Let me say a word or two in conclusion, perfectly respectfully, of the Report of that Committee of the House of Commons. That Committee, unfortunately I think, imposed upon itself a very severe limit as to taking evidence upon this subject. It excluded all evidence that was not sworn evidence, and the consequence was that a number of letters and published statements, which I have now read to your Lordships, were excluded from the consideration of the Committee on the ground that the writers were not there to swear to them. I have no doubt the Committee had good reason for what they did; but the result, unfortunately, was the exclusion of a large amount of evidence, and the consequence was a very guarded and cautious Report. But the Report, nevertheless, states that there is considerable danger to infant life under the present state of the law, and makes a number of recommendations to prevent this danger which are followed in the provisions inserted in this Bill. And now, my Lords, I have only to entreat you to pardon me for dealing at so great a length with this subject, which, I think, however, I could not possibly have compressed into smaller limits than I have set myself in dealing with it. Believe me, I have shut out very much that I could have given in the way of evidence, much that I might have said, in deference to the convenience of your Lordships; but I trust I have said enough to induce the House to consent to the Second Reading of this Bill. If your Lordships should be of opinion that the evidence before you is insufficient, and that the really well-conducted Friendly Societies should be heard before a Committee of this House the Bill is passed, I have no other objection except that it will delay this measure. I have and can have no other desire than that the best interests of the working classes should be fairly, truly, and properly considered in framing such a measure as this. But, however it may be dealt with, I am perfectly persuaded that your Lordships will not let this matter drop, that Parliament will not let this matter drop, and that the country will not let the matter drop, once the facts of the case are fairly brought before them. My Lords, I can assure you that I have not overstated my case; on the contrary, I have been careful to understate it, because I know that exaggeration has no weight with the judicial temper of this House. I have seen myself described in the papers, by my opponents, as the very pathetic prelate who is to persuade your Lordships to pass this measure. The only pathos which I have brought before your Lordships to-night is that of very sad and terrible facts. I would not attempt to induce your Lordships to pass this Bill by any persuasion of mine. If I do induce you to pass it, it will only have been by the unimpeachable evidence of its necessity which I have adduced. If what I have said is believed by your Lordships to be really true, I feel sure that I have an advocate in the heart of every one who is now listening to me, that will plead for these poor little ones much more effectively than I can plead for them. There is not a parent present who is gladdened by the sight of his little ones, who has known the joy of looking into their faces, or who has known the sorrow of looking with ineffable anguish on the still, immovable face of a little one, whom all his wealth, all that care, skill, and affection could do has failed to snatch from death—there is not a parent here who will refuse to listen to me when I plead for these little ones who have, through all their lives, never, perhaps, known a kind word or look, but have only known that last act of cruel mercy which has terminated their lives. I feel sure that your Lordships will do all in your power to interpose the strong arm of the law to defend these little helpless, hapless children from the misery which now haunts their lives, and from the greed and cruelty which too often untimely end them. My Lords, I have the honour of moving the Second Reading of the Bill.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>."
—(The Lord Bishop of Peterborough.)

*EARL BEAUCHAMP: My Lords, I have to appeal to your Lordships' indulgence, speaking under circumstances of some personal difficulty to myself, but as I had the honour of being responsible in this House for the Act of 1875, I should be failing in my duty if I did not follow the right rev. Prelate through a portion of the remarks that he has addressed to your Lordships' House. I am conscious of the enormous difficulty of attempting to mitigate in any way the effect of the impassioned appeal which the right rev. Prelate has addressed to your Lordships. He has told you that he has appealed to facts. There is one fact, and one fact only, in his speech. He told us he would produce evidence, and what he produced as evidence was only opinion. Is the evidence of opinion sufficient evidence for legislation, on a matter of this kind? Eloquence is a great gift, but I should besorrry indeed, if I possessed such eloquence as is possessed by the right rev. Prelate, to use it in the manner he has used it to-night. He began by telling us that the legislation on this matter began in the year 1875. My Lords, that is not quite consistent with my recollection of the facts. The Act of 1875 was, in respect of the burial of infants, only a consolidating measure, and kept alive the Act which was passed in the year 1854. The Bill of 1854, dealing with Friendly Societies, was introduced into the House of Commons by Mr. Sotheron Eastcourt, than whom it will be admitted no more humane man ever sat in Parliament. It dealt with the necessity of such provisions as those which the right rev. Prelate introduces in his Bill. Lord Palmerston, who was then Home Secretary, said that his feelings on the subject of infant insurance were of a most painful kind; but he did not dissent from evidence being given and facts ascertained, and the measure was referred to a Select Committee of the House of Commons. On that Committee sat my noble Friend Lord Norton and also Lord Ossington, who was certainly an ornament to both Houses of Parliament. The members of that Committee went carefully into the matter, and they took evidence of a most searching kind, and it is to that evidence which I wish to call your Lordships' attention. They called before them, to give evidence, persons who were most qualified to give an opinion upon the subject, and that opinion was tested by cross-examination. Some of the gentlemen occupying the highest positions, who had expressed strong opinions a priori, when their evidence came to be tested by cross-examination were compelled to recede from the positions they had taken up. If I had had any notice that the right rev. Prelate would have framed such a bill of indictment against the working classes I should have been better prepared to answer it; but—

*THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH: Would the noble Lord pardon me for a moment. I have framed no bill of indictment against the working classes. I expressly said that I desired to pay every tribute to their affection and kindness for their children, and that the measure was necessary only for the small number in proportion to them of bad and cruel parents.

*EARL BEAUCHAMP: My Lords, I do not think a few honeyed words are a sufficient apology for the eloquent attack which he has made upon the working classes. I am afraid that in answering that attack I shall have to trouble your Lordships at greater length than I should wish with the evidence given before that Committee; but I think that is the best way of meeting such a general attack upon these poor people. If I had had any idea that the right rev. Prelate would have made the speech he has addressed to your Lordships' House, I should have been better prepared to deal with it; but I shall, at all events, present to you evidence upon this subject which is complete in itself, and which cannot be impeached, from one of the most valuable Reports, in my opinion, which have ever been made to Parliament. The right rev. Prelate<sup>1</sup> has told your Lordships that the present state of the law presents a large incentive to infanticide. He laughed to scorn the only real test which can be applied in the matter—the test of statistics—and he was very jocose on the idea that infants who are insured should enjoy a more lengthened vitality than infants whose lives are uninsured. I do not read the statistics in the same way as the right rev. Prelate. I read them in this way, as showing that parents who insure the lives of their children are for the most part persons of thrifty and self-denying character, and that they take care to surround their children with home comforts, home care, and home independence, and that that accounts for the great advantage which vital statistics show the children who are insured possess over those who are uninsured. My Lords, the right rev. Prelate told you that by paying 1d. a month, I think, they would obtain a considerable sum.

*THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH: If the noble Earl will pardon me again, what I said was, by paying 1d. a week for six months they would be able to obtain a certain amount of death profit.

*EARL BEAUCHAMP: It does not affect my argument. The right rev. Prelate told us that by a payment of 1d. a week for six months, which would amount to 2s. 2d., £2 10s. could be secured at death; and he then went on to describe the vast organisation of these Insurance Societies, their employing unworthy collectors, who were going about all over the country persuading poor working people to make this payment of 2s. 2d., by which at the end of six months they were to insure the payment of £2 10s. I would venture to ask, did any of your Lordships ever hear of an Insurance Society which was capable of working business on those terms with anything like profit to itself? How can an Insurance Society, by receiving 1d. a week for six months, gain a profit by paying £2 10s. at the end of that period? My Lords, the thing is monstrous, and your Lordships will see it is one of those statements which are made on à priori convictions, but will not stand the test of evidence and facts. I cannot understand how the right rev. Prelate has persuaded himself that it would produce any profit to an Insurance Society to conduct their business in such a manner as that. If that were done I am quite sure that Insurance Societies would always be in difficulties, they would be in a state of perpetual collapse. But I think in the very nature of things it is clear that an Insurance Society usually conducts its affairs with some kind of idea for its own profit, which certainly would be lacking to the shareholders if such a system of doing business prevailed as that which was described by the right rev. Prelate. Now, my Lords, the right rev. Prelate described how dangerous it would be to hand over the care of a sickly child to a sick-nurse before whom a temptation was laid that she should receive the amount of the death insurance. But the right rev. Prelate seemed to forget that in these cases the sick-nurse is the mother of the child, and I do not believe that there are many mothers in England—at all events, I am slow to believe it, and I should require very strong evidence to induce me to believe it—who could be driven by so miserable a bribe as that to terminate the lives—to murder their own offspring. We know that parental affection is one of the most powerful instincts, one of the holiest gifts which Almighty God has implanted in the human heart. Some few cases, I do not deny, there may be; but they are, I think, very exceptional—where people have forgotten their natural affections. But to say that parents will deliberately seek a profit will insure and destroy the lives of their children in order to gain this miserable reward, is to make a statement which I, for one, without evidence, cannot accept. My Lords, I will not follow the right rev. Prelate through his arguments. The single—only—fact which he told us in his speech was that there were in London 12 undertakers who had announcements in their windows that they undertook to conduct an infant's funeral at an entire cost of from 15s. to £1 10s. That was really the only fact which the right rev. Prelate produced in support of his argument. The rest of his evidence consisted solely of opinions the value of which I will proceed now to show your Lordships. If I trespass somewhat upon the attention of the House by reading a portion of this Report, I think you will see the importance of it, and probably your Lordships would rather have the arguments stated in the calm and measured language of this Report than in my own. It states—

"The subject of child mortality alleged to be induced by the temptation of funeral money having been referred to in the House by several Members, and having occasioned great uneasiness in the various Burial Societies throughout the Kingdom, received particular attention from your Committee. Four Judges, two Governors of Prisons, two Coroners, a Chief of Police, a Chaplain of a prison, a Registrar of Births and Deaths, and a solicitor who had been engaged in a prosecution for child murder, gave evidence before your Committee. Letters also from Inspectors of Factories were produced before them."

I desire to call your Lordships' attention to the fact that this was evidence not given merely as a matter of opinion, but tested by a cross-examination.

"The substance of their evidence was as follows:—Mr. Justice Wightman did not remember to have tried more than one case of child murder, namely, that of Honnor Gibbons and Bridget Garrety, for the murder of a child of the former, nine months old, the inducement being a sum of £4 receivable from a Burial Society. Those prisoners were convicted."

*THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH: Would the noble Earl state what is the date of the Report?

*EARL BEAUCHAMP: The date is 1854. I am, only sorry the right rev. Prelate was not aware of this Report before he made his speech—

"Mr. Baron Alderson did not remember to have tried any case of child murder. The depositions of such a charge having been laid before him, he noticed that crime in addressing the Grand Jury at Liverpool last December, and the Grand Jury thereupon made a presentment to the effect that the interference of the Legislature was called for to put a stop to the system of money payments by Burial Societies. The prisoners, however, so charged having been tried before Mr. Baron Martin were acquitted, and that Judge informed the Committee that there were no grounds at all for connecting the alleged crime with the receipt of funeral money. Mr. Baron Martin also informed the Committee that no other case of child murder had ever been brought before him for trial where the motive of burial money was alleged. Chief Baron Pollock gave the Committee information respecting a well-known trial for murder at Chelmsford in 1850, when a woman named May was found guilty of poisoning her husband and attempting to poison a grown-up son; and one at Lewes in 1849. In those cases the burial money was proved, or appeared to him to have been a temptation, though it was of so small an amount as between 20s. and 40s. The Governor of Chester Gaol recollected four prisoners since 1841 committed to his custody on a charge of child murder, two of whom were acquitted and two convicted."

Earl Beauchamp

One of these cases was the case which was referred to by Mr. Justice Wightman. Then—

"The Governor of Kirkdals Prison, in an experience of 10½ years, has had no prisoner in his custody convicted of the charge of child murder."

*THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH: Exactly so.

*EARL BEAUCHAMP: He says—

"One prisoner named, Betty Eccles, was found guilty and executed for the murder of three children in 1843, immediately before he became Governor of the gaol.

The Coroner of Stockport, in an experience of 13 years, has held three inquests in cases of alleged child murder. One proved to be an accidental death, in one the parties were acquitted, and the third was the case of Gibbons, already referred to by Mr. Justice Wightman.

The Coroner of Salford, in an experience of 22 years, has held only one inquest in a case of child murder alleged to have reference to a Burial Society, and that was the case which was tried before Mr. Baron Martin last December, when the parties were acquitted, and the evidence showed that they neither expected nor received the sum insured.

The Chief of Police at Stockport, during 15 years, part of which time he was connected with the police at Manchester, and during the last nine months at Stockport, has never had a case of child murder brought under his notice.

The Registrar of Births and Deaths, in a district at Manchester containing a population of 44,000, remembers no case of child murder and does not believe that burial money has been a temptation at all to infanticide. The Rev. W. Kelly, Chaplain, of Preston Gaol, who has published a pamphlet on this subject, said that he was not directly cognisant of any case of child murder for the sake of burial money, but that it is his opinion that the tendency of Burial Clubs is to induce neglect of an ailing child. Your Committee draw from the evidence adduced before them this conclusion: that the instances of child murder, where the motive of the criminal has been to obtain money from a Burial Society, have been so few as by no means to impose upon Parliament an obligation for the sake of public morality to legislate specially with a view to the prevention of the crime. Your Committee refer to the evidence to show that no sufficient grounds exist for the general suspicion which seems to have been entertained on this subject; they believe that suspicion to have been almost entirely founded upon a few cases brought to trial exaggerated by the horror with which the idea of a crime so heinous would naturally be regarded."

My Lords, I will not take up more of the time of the House by reading further extracts from the Report; but it deals with the proposal of the right rev. Prelate, that the money should pass directly to the undertaker. It also deals with other provisions, but I will not read more. What is really material is that the Committee, consisting as I have told you of most eminent men who went most carefully and thoroughly into the subject, arrived at the conviction that no ground existed for the general suspicion which they mention as being entertained upon the subject. With the sufferings of children, everyone must sympathise; but we must remember that it is very easy for a practised novelist to pile up the agony in a story of the description your Lordships are familiar with. We know ourselves that the very sympathy which we all feel with the sufferings of childhood does make us most anxious to do everything that lies in our power to diminish and to mitigate those sufferings; but while we are anxious to mitigate the sufferings of the children, do not let us do any injustice to other people. Do not let us in our righteous desire to diminish the amount of human misery strike a blow at the independence of the working classes, at their honest desire to keep themselves from the necessity of applying for assistance from the public rates, and to keep alive and maintain that home-life which is one of the noblest characteristics of the working classes. I now leave myself in your Lordships' hands. Feeling that I am responsible in some degree for the legislation of 1875, I thought it my duty to lay before your Lordships some of the grounds on which that legislation was founded, fortified by the Report of a Committee of eminent men, whose finding was that the suspicions entertained in this matter were groundless, and that there was not sufficient foundation for them when the evidence came to be tested.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I cannot help saying that the noble Earl who has just addressed the House has a little understated the matter, because the opinions which he says are stated by the Report he ought to have said were expressed by the Committee which made it 36 years ago. I do not think it is quite right to say that the matter does not require investigation at the present time. As to myself, I can give personal testimony in reference to some of the cases referred to by my noble Friend in his speech; and with regard to the cases which were tried before Mr. Justice Wightman, of Gibbons and Garretty, that learned Judge expressed to me—I was a very young member of the Bar at the time—that he was anxious the Legislature should in some way prevent the temptation which, in his view, on that occasion had proved to be a fearful temptation in the circumstances of that particular class of persons; that is, the temptation of getting the money falling due upon the death of the child. I cannot help thinking, on the other hand, after what has been said in the course of this Debate, that it would be not a little rash to legislate without some further investigation. I think there should be some further inquiry made before we proceed to legislation. The right rev. Prelate might, therefore, do well to consent that after the Bill has been read a second time it should go to a Select Committee, before which the different views might be properly represented, and before which evidence might be taken, which, I think, would be more applicable to the present condition of things, which it is the opinion of a great many people, as I am told, does produce evil. That evidence would be properly weighed before the Committee. For my own part, I should very much like to hear the views of two learned Judges, whose opinions have been read to us to-night, with the facts upon which those views were founded. Then I should like, also, to hear something more of the statements made by the various Coroners whose names have been mentioned, because, to my mind, the fact that people were acquitted, or that there was a failure to bring them to justice under circumstances of very suspicious death, is by no means conclusive to show that this legislation is or is not required. There may be circumstances which, in the opinion of the Coroner, would not amount to evidence of the commission or concealment of a crime, though the opinion may be entertained that you should proceed by removing the temptation. That I consider to be the object of the right rev. Prelate, and that I think your Lordships will be glad to accede to. As I understand, the right rev. Prelate is not averse to the course I have suggested. I think that would remove the objections which the noble Earl has expressed against your Lordships being induced to legislate in a hurry or without sufficient foundation..

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, I also very heartily support the Second Reading of this Bill, because I confess that an impression has been produced by the operation of this system of infant insurance which seems to show, in my opinion, that the legislation enacted in 1875 needs to be carried somewhat further. I would point out to the noble Earl also that the measure which the right rev. Prelate has brought forward is a further step in this matter taken upon the lines of the Act of 1875. Whether it goes too far or not, of course, may be a question. The Act of 1875 recognised that it was inexpedient to permit the insurance of the lives of young children at a profit, so to speak, beyond the expenses to which the parents may be put in case of their death. That is quite a clear proposition, because it fixes a strict limit as to the amount of insurance, and it provides for necessary certificates to be given. I need not trouble your Lordships with the machinery proposed by the Act; but it is provided also that, in cases of double insurances, if one Society has paid the other Society will not pay more than any balance there may be up to the statutory amount, and it is provided that the money is to be paid only on the certificates being forthcoming that the child has not come improperly to its end. Therefore, the scheme of the Legislature was to limit the amount to a sum which, while providing for the payment of expenses, would not afford a temptation to the parents or persons having the care of the child, and to safeguard the life of the child by requiring a medical certificate. Well now, my Lords, the suggestion is that the existing safeguards have proved insufficient, and that they have been placed too high. But I would venture to point out that the Legislature has not fixed any conditions for all time. At the present time, whatever may have been the case when the former legislation took place, it appears that these little funerals can be conducted so cheaply that even with the medical and other expenses the present maximum is fixed too high. That is obviously a case in which the Legislature can intervene if that fact is established. It is also certainly open to consideration whether the other safeguards are sufficient. But, my Lords, I am very glad that my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack has made the suggestion he has of referring this Bill to a Select Committee. And for this reason: I think your Lordships will be somewhat sensitive about initiating legislation which concerns exclusively the working classes, who I know are not directly represented in your Lordships' House, in a manner which may affect their position considerably, without giving them an opportunity of expressing their views, so that your Lordships may be in possession of those views and receive guidance from them before initiating this legislation. For example, you have the question of amount to deal with. That, I am sure, is a matter upon which you would like to hear what the Friendly Societies who largely represent the interests of the working classes have to say with regard to whether or not the present limit is to stand. As to the rest of the machinery proposed by the Bill, I have seen considerable objection taken to the money being paid to the undertaker. This difficulty arises. If you provide that the money is to be paid to the undertaker the parent says, "I do not get it, and no one else can get it, and I have no means of doing anything." You obviously give the undertaker the entire control of the insurance money, and you might then have the undertaker, who is certain of receiving his money from the Insurance Company, doing less than justice to those who were concerned in causing the death of the child. I do not propose to deal with this matter further on the present occasion. I have only to express my satisfaction with the proposal made to refer the Bill to a Select Committee. Your Lordships will remember that though you have to pass this Bill it must be taken elsewhere, and if you deal rashly or injudiciously with the interests of the working classes in this matter you will create a vast amount of opposition to the Bill elsewhere, and you will not facilitate its enactment by its passage through this House. But if your Lordships pass the measure through this House after the working classes have themselves had an opportunity of putting forward their views as to the machinery of the Bill, although there may be some little delay at the moment, you will, in the end, accomplish your object more speedily. In saying that I support the proposal of my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, I would add that I think it is not made as such proposals sometimes are with the view of delaying legislation, but really, as I think will turn out to be the case, of expediting it as much as possible.

My Lords, I merely rise to say how entirely and readily I concur in the suggestion of the noble and learned Lord opposite, and I will take the opportunity of adding merely one or two words with regard to the criticisms of the noble Earl. The noble Earl seemed to think I must have been drawing upon my imagination when I stated that the payment of 1d. a week for six months would obtain a payment of £2 10s. I may say that I took the statement from the published tables of the Prudential Society. It is, therefore, no imagination; it is a simple matter of fact. Then the noble Earl asked whether these Insurance Societies would be likely to conduct their business at a loss. Well, I do not suppose for a moment that they would, and their tables, no doubt, are compiled on a profit basis. But I think the fallacy of the noble Earl's argument is that he assumes that every insurance case is one of child murder. In that case, of course, the loss to the Insurance Companies would be enormous. But if the proportion be as low as I have put it, namely, one in 1,000, that loss is amply covered by the gains on the other cases. Then, with regard to the lapses of policies, in the large number of cases where children's names having been put on the books of the Insurance Company the parents have not kept up the premiums. It appears that those lapses amount to one-third of the whole number of insurances, so that the society can very well afford to pay in these murder cases, and write them off as bad debts. I do not suppose they would amount to a very large proportion among the four societies, as against the profit made upon the 600,000 child insurances during the year. Then, with regard to the statement that I have produced nothing but statements of opinion, I would submit that, on the contrary, that is exactly what the noble Earl did in his speech: he read to the House nothing but opinions 36 years old. My contention is, that it is within the last 25 years—and I go further, within the last 20 or 15 years—that this immense and dangerous development of child-insurance has taken place. It is perfectly clear that the noble Earl's authorities are out of date, and altogether out of Court in the case. I will not detain your Lordships longer in replying to the noble Earl. I am quite sure he is as anxious as I can be for the protection of child-life; and I have only now to say again, as I said in my speech, that I have not the slightest wish to unduly hurry legislation on this matter, even if it were in my power to do so. I fully and entirely agree with the noble and learned Lord who has just sat down, that any appearance of a desire on the part of this House to hurry legislation of this kind would probably have a most injurious effect upon its prospects in another place. Therefore, I quite thankfully accede to the suggestion which the noble Earl on the Woolsack has made.

*EARL BEAUCHAMP: Perhaps I may be allowed to add a few words in explanation. This evidence, to which I have referred, was, of course, taken in the year 1854, but your Lordships will understand that the practice of insuring children's lives had been going on antecedently to that time, and these suspicions, which were largely prevalent, were then carefully examined into by Members of the House of Commons, who were very competent to inquire into the matter, and were decided to be groundless, not upon opinions given in conversation or in leading articles, but upon evidence given before and tested by that Committee of the House of Commons.

Question agreed to.

Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly.

*THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH: I beg your Lordships now further to allow the Bill to be referred to a Select Committee, to take evidence and to report thereon to your Lordships' House.

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.

QUESTIONS—OBSERVATIONS.

*VISCOUNT GALWAY, in rising to ask Her Majesty's Government whether the scheme of the Charity Commissioners for the management of Christ's Hospital has the sanction and approval of the present Governors, and whether the 148th clause of the scheme will allow the Charity Commissioners to alter the scheme without obtaining the sanction of Parliament, said: My Lords, I do not desire to enter into the merits or demerits of the case before your Lordships, but simply to ascertain whether the scheme proposed has the consent and approbation of the Governors of Christ's Hospital; and with regard to the second part of the question it seems to me that either the 148th clause is a redundancy if the Commissioners in bringing in another scheme are obliged to lay it on the Table of your Lordships' House—or under it they might effect a great change without the knowledge of Parliament. I beg to ask the question which stands in my name.

*THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): My Lords, the scheme to which my noble Friend refers is one which has been a long time maturing; I may almost say for the last 12 years. When it first emanated from the Charity Commission it was considered very carefully by the Education Department, and passed on, as there was an opportunity of taking the opinion of the Judicial Committee. I understand that Committee considered all objections made, sitting for 11 days, and eventually passed the scheme with one exception. The new scheme rectified in that respect is now before Parliament, and, so far, has passed without opposition in the House of Commons on the part of anyone, except as to a point of detail regarding which a Division was taken the other night—quite a small part of it. With regard to the attitude of the Governors when the scheme was before the Judicial Committee it was opposed by many of the Governors and the Corporation of the City of London, but they have determined now not to oppose the scheme, and, so far as I know, opposition will not be carried into either House of Parliament. At least, I have no knowledge on the subject if that is intended. With regard to the second matter which has been called attention to by my noble Friend, under the 148th clause power is reserved for ordinary alterations to be made when the Governors call upon the Charity Commission to make amendments for the better working of the scheme; not with the view to make it a different scheme, but with a view to make it a scheme which, under the management of the Governors, can be made operative. If the Charity Commissioners should make alterations, there is an appeal to the Court of Chancery provided for. If there should be on the initiation of the Charity Commission a change of scheme it will have to go through all the steps which the scheme itself has gone through.

EDUCATION OF BLIND AND DEAF-MUTE CHILDREN (SCOTLAND) BILL.

(NO. 101.) COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order.)

Clause 2.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR SCOTLAND (The MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN): My Lords, in this clause when the Bill was read the date of the commencement of operation of the Act was not inserted. I beg now to move the insertion of that date, 1st January, 1891.

Amendment proposed, Clause 2, page 1, line 9, after ("the") insert ("first"), and after ("of") insert ("January one thousand eight hundred and ninety-one").—(The Lord Ker [M. Lothian].)

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 4.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: The Amendments proposed in the clause are simply to give better effect to it than it would have as it now stands. It has been pointed out to me by the Board of Commissioners for Public Works Loans that there would have been some difficulty in carrying out this clause without these Amendments.

Amendments proposed,

In Clause 4, page 2, line 19, after ("district") insert ("and school boards shall have the same power of borrowing, and the Public Works Loan Commissioners of lending, for the purposes of contributing towards or of establishing, building, or enlarging such a school, as is conferred by section forty-five of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, with respect to providing or enlarging a school house"); line 20, leave out from ("provided") to ("1875") in line 23 both inclusive.—(The Lord Ker [M. Lothian].)

Amendments agreed to.

Report of Amendments thereof to be received to-morrow; and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 123.)

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS (SCOTLAND)

BILL—(No. 119.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: My Lords, this Bill is intended to remedy difficulties which have arisen in certain burghs which have adopted a certain number of clauses of the General Police and Improvements (Scotland) Act, 1862. A burgh may adopt either the whole of the Act or certain clauses of it, and it has happened in some cases that only certain clauses of the Act have been adopted. Owing to this, persons who are comprehended in a new Police Burgh, but who are not in the old burgh, have not received the power of voting, although they are liable to taxation, and to remedy that is the main purpose of this Bill. My Lords, Clause 2 effects that object. Clause 3 merely fixes the first election in any burgh which falls under this Act at the same time as those in other burghs which have adopted the General Police Act. Clause 4 refers to matters of detail. Those are the whole of the clauses of the Bill, and I beg now to move that it be read a second time.

Bill read 2<sup>d</sup> (according to Order), and referred to the Standing Committee on General Bills.

House adjourned at twenty minutes before

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 16th June, 1890.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDER (No. 6) BILL.—(By Order.)

*(3.10.) MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to move—

"That the Order [June 2nd] that the Bill be committed be read, and discharged, and that the Bill be committed to a Select Committee of Nine Members, Five to be nominated by the House and Four by the Committee of Selection. That all Petitions against the Bill presented Three clear days before the Meeting of the Committee be referred to the Committee; that the Petitioners praying to be heard by themselves, their Counsel, or Agents, be heard against the Bill, and Counsel heard in support of the Bill. That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records. That Three be the quorum."

I have also to move a corresponding Motion in relation to the Pier and Harbour Provisional Order (No. 4) Bill for legalising certain dues and charges in reference to the Scilly Islands. In making these Motions, I am asking the House to sanction some further inquiry into the circumstances and proposals of these Bills, before the assent of Parliament is given to them. I do not ask the House to refuse them altogether, but only to refer them to a Select Committee, and the reasons which induce me to do so are these: in the first place, the circumstances are exceptional, and not of the ordinary nature of the Provisional Order Bills, such as are passed every day without discussion; and secondly, if I may be permitted to refer to the Motion which I moved upon the Second Reading of the Pier and Harbour Bill—

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): No.

*MR. CHANNING: If the Government dissent, of course I will not, but I think it would expedite business if I were allowed to do so. I will confine myself, then, to the first Bill, and the reason why I desire that it should be referred to a Select Committee is that it sets aside the principles of legislation which was sanctioned in 1888, and again last year, without an adequate cause. As the President of the Local Government Board objects to my mentioning the second Bill, I will defer my observations in regard to it, until I can bring them more regularly before the President of the Board of Trade.

*MR. RITCHIE: I only interposed because it is out of order to discuss another Bill now.

*MR. CHANNING: This Provisional Order Bill has grown out of the 49th section of the Local Government Board Act of 1888, which was passed with the view of giving a separate constitution to the Scilly Islands, and which provides for the performance within the islands of the duties of a County Council. The spirit and letter of the Local Government Act of 1888 provide that the persons elected to the County Council shall have the right of discharging the duty of electing their own Chairman, and the object of Section 49 of the Local Government Act, and of similar clauses in the Scotch Act of last year, was to provide the same machinery, rights, privileges, and powers for outlying county electors. It is obvious that the Scilly Islands could not be included, so far as local government is concerned, with the County Government of Cornwall, and, therefore, it was necessary to secure a separate and distinct Government for these islands. At the same time, I maintain that the Local Government Act never contemplated what this Bill does, namely, the conversion of the Scilly Islands into a Crown Colony with a permanent Chairman. Shetland and Orkney occupy a similar position to the Scilly Islands. They have been given a County Council, but they have a right to choose their own Chairman, and to arrange their own affairs exactly like any other county in England and Scotland. It has not been suggested in regard to those islands that any single individual shall have conferred upon him the rights of a statutory chieftain. The Duke of Sutherland possesses an infinitely stronger claim from his territorial rights in Sutherlandshire than Mr. Dorrien Smith possesses in Scilly, but a suggestion to make the Duke of Sutherland the statutory Chairman of the County of Sutherland would have been scouted. All I ask for is inquiry. In the preamble of the present Bill, at page 4, the lease by which Mr. Dorrien Smith holds the Scilly Islands is referred to, and the rights, "powers," "franchises," and "jurisdictions," which have been handed over to him by the Duchy of Cornwall, and they are specially reserved for Mr. Dorrien Smith under Clause 31 of the schedule. I do not know what the terms of that lease are, and, therefore, I ask for inquiry, in order that we may ascertain whether in any way they confer a right upon Mr. Dorrien Smith to control the electors in the management of their ordinary business, and whether they contravene the rights and privileges which the Act of 1888 confers upon county electors. I shall be told, of course, that the people of the Scilly Islands have not petitioned against this Bill. That is perfectly true; but I venture to think that the House may draw from that very fact some ground for an inquiry into the matter. Certainly the fact is established that the Bill contravenes, without assigning a reason, one of the principles of the Act of 1888. There are one or two matters connected with the history of this proposal which it is desirable that I should mention. When the proposal for giving a County Council to the Scilly Islands was first discussed, the suggestion of Mr. Dorrien Smith was that the Council should not be elected by ballot, but by open Vestry; but the Local Government Board very properly insisted that the elections in the islands should be conducted on the same principle as those upon the mainland, namely, by ballot. I think it may be inferred that the proposal to make Mr. Dorrien Smith permanent Chairman was meant as a solatium. It is no secret that in the original draft of the Bill Mr. Dorrien Smith desired to have himself called "lord paramount" of the island, and it was only when it was pointed out that that was a title which would be in conflict with the rights of the Duchy of Cornwall that the claim was withdrawn. This shows, to some extent, how these questions have grown up, and I think I have shown, at all events, a prima facie case for referring the Bill to a Select Committee. It will be said that the inhabitants have not protested against the Bill. Their position is peculiar. Mr. Dorrien Smith is proprietor of the islands, under the Duchy, and his power is absolutely paramount. The people are afraid to oppose his wishes in any respect whatever; but I think the House of Commons, has a right to go into the matter and ascertain what his rights are. In regard to the second Bill, there are one or two questions I would like to put if the right hon. Gentleman would prefer to answer them now; but, if not, I will defer them.

*MR. CHANNING: They refer to the Pier and Harbour Bill.

*MR. SPEAKER: As they are not connected with the subject-matter of the Bill now before the House they had better be deferred.

*MR. CHANNING: Then I will conclude by moving the Motion which stands on the Paper in my name.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Order [2nd June] that the Bill be committed, be read, and discharged, and that the Bill be committed to a Select Committee of Nine Members, Five to be nominated by the House and Four by the Committee of Selection; that all Petitions against the Bill presented Three clear days before the meeting of the Committee be referred to the Committee; that the Petitioners praying to be heard by themselves, their Counsel, or Agents, be heard against the Bill, and Counsel heard in support of the Bill; that the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records; that Three be the quorum."—(Mr. Channing.)

*(3.18.) THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. LONG, Wilts, Devizes): I should have no wish to complain of the action of the hon. Member in making this Motion, if he could show that there has been any serious departure from the provisions of the Local Government Act. But I must remind the hon. Member and the House that provisions are contained in that Act for dealing with the special requirements of any district in which it might be necessary to set up a County Council; and an examination into the circumstances of the Scilly Islands showed the framers of the measure that such special powers would be necessary when the time should arrive for establishing a County Council there. It is to meet an anomalous condition of things that such a course has been taken. I cannot help expressing my regret that the hon. Gentleman in moving the Motion, actuated only, as he told the House, by honest and sincere motives for the interests of good Local Government, should have made statements in reference to Mr. Dorrien Smith which, I think, he will find very few people to endorse.

*MR. CHANNING: Will the hon. Gentleman pardon me? I did not say a single word that could reflect upon the action of Mr. Dorrien Smith. I most fully recognised his efforts to improve the condition of the people of the islands.

*MR. LONG: The hon. Gentleman said that representations had been made to him which induced him to believe that the people of the islands were in a state of fear, and that they were unable to represent freely their own case. I leave the House to judge for itself whether that does not imply that the government of Mr. Dorrien Smith is of such a nature as to frighten the people of the Scilly Islands. I must, therefore, repeat my regret that the hon. Gentleman was not able to make the Motion without indulging in an imputation of such a nature against Mr. Dorrien Smith. Section 49 of the Local Government Act says that Provisional Orders shall be, as far as possible, in consonance with the principles of the Act, and that is what the present Order is. Anybody who knows the Scilly Islands and has made himself acquainted with the condition of things there will be aware that it is simply ridiculous to say that the position of the Duke of Sutherland in the County of Sutherland can be compared with the position of Mr. Dorrien Smith in the Scilly Islands. The present Provisional Order has passed through all its forms. The hon. Gentleman says that the fact of there having been no Petition against it ought not to weigh on account of the peculiar position occupied by the inhabitants. Now, every provision contained in this Order was laid most carefully before the people of the islands, and every opportunity has been afforded for the presentation of Petitions, and no objection has been raised except by the hon. Gentleman opposite. The hon. Gentleman has not given any ground for departing from the invariable rule in connection with Provisional Order Bills, and the point he has raised could be as well dealt with on the Second Reading as in Committee.

The rights of the county electors in the Island of Scilly will not be in any way interfered with. Mr. Dorrien Smith is practically the Governor of the islands, and anyone who has taken the trouble to visit them must be satisfied that he has done his best for the interests of the inhabitants and that his rule has been a most beneficent one.

(3.30.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I gladly recognise the able manner in which the hon. Member for East Northampton (Mr. Channing) has dealt with this matter; but in regard to the remarks which have fallen from the Secretary to the Local Government Board, I think it is desirable to make it quite clear to the House that there are sufficient grounds for our opposition to the Bill in its present form. The hon. Gentleman has complained of the way in which the hon. Member for East Northampton dealt with the matter as far as Mr. Dorrien Smith is concerned; but, after the ample tribute which has been paid to the beneficent action of Mr. Dorrien Smith and his family in connection with these islands, I think it is unfair to take my hon. Friend to task for his reference to the condition of the people of the Scilly Islands, which is undoubtedly an important factor in the case. The hon. Gentleman twits my hon. Friend with having no support from the people, and he says that, being fully cognisant of what was going on, they had an ample opportunity of petitioning. He added that, as they have not done so, it is a proof that they are in favour of the Bill, or that they do not care sufficiently about it to oppose it. I must say that the absence of opposition affords proof, to some extent, that the liberties of the people of these islands are scarcely worth fighting for; but I have had letters from different persons living in Scilly which state that the inhabitants are in a state of fear, and believe that any action on their part would result in their being forced to relinquish their holdings and being turned out of the islands. All I can say is, that if the inhabitants are so timorous and so wanting in pluck it will only serve them right if they suffer in future. They will only have themselves to thank, and nobody else. But, so far as the proposal to establish Mr. Dorrien Smith as the permanent Chairman is concerned, that is a matter altogether apart from local feeling. It is a distinct departure from a fundamental principle recognised in the Local Government Act, and I failed to find in the speech of the Secretary to the Local Government Board a single justification for this extraordinary departure from the settled policy of the Local Government Act. The only reason assigned by the hon. Gentleman is that Mr. Dorrien Smith is the Governor of the island—an autocrat on whom the welfare, liberties, and prosperity of these people depend. That, I think, is a strong reason why we should not increase and extend the power of this gentleman by constituting him Chairman of the Council and the future controller of their destinies for all time to come.

(3.45.) MR. BOLITHO (Cornwall, St. Ives): Last autumn the Local Government Board sent down an experienced gentleman to inquire into all the circumstances of the case. That gentleman took evidence, and the present Bill is the outcome of his inquiry. No doubt there are anomalies in the case, but the Scilly Islands themselves are an anomaly. For my part, I hold that the Government have been wise in placing a clause in this Bill as an incentive and stimulant to the temporary owner of the property to reside amongst the islanders and give them the benefit of his influence and advice. If any man deserves encouragement and support in connection with the Scilly Islands it is Mr. Dorrien Smith. When he came into this inheritance he found the people in a deplorable and impoverished condition. He has encouraged their industry, especially in the growth of flowers, and they are now frugal, industrious, contented, and prosperous. They are not afraid of speaking their own minds, and I know from experience, that if they felt dissatisfaction, neither Mr. Dorrien Smith nor anybody else would prevent them from expressing it.

(3.50.) The House divided:—Ayes 105; Noes 179.—(Div. List, No. 135.)

*MR. CHANNING: I have a similar Motion on the Paper in regard to another Bill; but, after the Division which has just taken place, I do not propose to proceed with it. I should like, however, to hear from the President of the Board of Trade why the dues on exported shell fish and flowers are not regulated and controlled by the Provisional Order for which the right hon. Gentleman is responsible, and why these dues are left to the absolute discretion of Mr. Dorrien Smith?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): It is impossible in the schedule attached to a Provisional Order to schedule every article, but I believe that in this case the schedule has received the approval of the fishermen themselves. If the hon. Gentleman requires further information, and will put a question upon the Paper, I shall be happy to answer it.

REGISTRARS' FEES (MIDDLESEX).

Address for—

"Return showing for each of years 1888 and 1889, the Fees received by the Registrars of Middlesex, the number of transactions, the expenses of the office, and the net amount paid to the surviving Registrar and to the Queen's Remembrancer (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper) No. 242, of Session 1888."—(Sir John Lubbock.)

EAST INDIA (ACCOUNTS.)

Address for—

"Detailed Particulars respecting the under-mentioned Items in the Home Accounts of the Government of India, of which no particulars appear in Parliamentary Paper No. 171, 9th May 1890:—

The Persons to whom payments were made, the Amounts paid in each instance, and the reason for making such payments of Compassionate Allowances, £2,457 14s. 6d. (page 9);

Like information respecting Compassionate and Miscellaneous Pensions, £4,987 7s. 6d., and Gratuities, £585 (page 11);

Like information respecting Gratuities granted on retirement to members of the Uncovenanted Services of India, £2,067 2s. 1d. (page 11); and

The circumstances under which the following Charges were incurred: 'Cost of Stores lost in transit in India,' £7,808 4s. 1d. (page 13)."—(Mr. Bradlaugh.)

WHITGIFT HOSPITAL (CROYDON).

Copy ordered—

"Of the Correspondence which has passed between the Charity Commissioners and the Governors of the Whitgift Hospital, Croydon, on the subject of the disallowance by the Commissioners of the amount expended by the Trustees in the restoration of the tomb of Archbishop Whitgift (the founder of the Hospital), in the Parish Church, Croydon."—(Mr. Spencer Balfour.)

QUESTIONS.

COMMERCIAL TREATIES.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Treaties of Commerce concluded in 1862 and 1865 with Belgium and the German Zollverein preclude the conclusion of any preferential commercial arrangement for mutual advantage between the United Kingdom and Her Majesty's Colonial or Indian possessions, and if these foreign restrictions upon domestic commerce are extended by the most favoured nation agreement to every other foreign State; and in such case if, having regard to the well-known Report of the Privy Council of Canada

"that trade should be as free as practicable between the various portions of the Empire, having regard solely to their own interests, and unfettered by any obligation to treat others with equal favour,"

as also to repeated expressions of opinion to like effect in the Dominion Parliament, and in Australasia, an undertaking can be given that advantage shall be taken of the opportunity afforded by the forthcoming expiration upon due notice of several foreign Treaties of Commerce to denounce and determine such inter-British commercial disability?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I am not prepared to admit that the Treaties to which the hon. Member refers would have, in all cases, the effect suggested in the first part of his question, but he will find the clauses referred to in the Paper presented to the House of Commons, dated 17th April, 1888. (C 5369.) This Paper also includes a Memorandum by Sir E. Hertslet, on the subject. No doubt this important matter will be considered when new Commercial Treaties are about to be concluded with foreign States.

THE NEW CODE.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether, having regard to the limited accommodation afforded by the training colleges in the past, and the admitted excellence and efficiency of large numbers of certificated teachers who have been trained outside those institutions, he will amend the nomenclature and cancel the distinctions of Article 73 of the New Code?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): I have already had regard to the limited accommodation afforded by the training colleges in the past by undertaking that the change shall not be retrospective, and I have recognised the admitted excellence of that large number of certificated teachers who may not enter a training college, by not allowing the distinction, even in the future, to affect the principal teachers, and I am further willing, so far as the difficulty is one of nomenclature, to amend the terms of the Article, and, to that extent, meet the views of the right hon. Gentleman.

MAGISTRATES' CLERKS.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the following remarks by the Lord Chief Justice in delivering judgment: in the recent case of "Dixon v. Wells":—

"A practice seems to have risen up of Magistrates' clerks hearing complaints and taking summonses to any Magistrates to be signed, they being ignorant of the case and not knowing whether there is a prima facie case or not. A looser practice and more likely to lead to injustice I cannot conceive. . . . It may often happen that summonses are issued without any case whatever. I cannot regard a summons so issued in direct defiance of the Act as a summons issued under it."

And whether, especially in the interest of poor persons who cannot pay for professional assistance, he will issue a Home Office Circular to Magistrates' clerks drawing their attention to the matter, and to the observations thereupon of the Lord Chief Justice?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I have seen a report of the case in question. I have consulted the best authority within my reach, and I am advised that there is no reason to suppose the law is not well known which makes the issue of a summons an act of judicial discretion, depending on the nature of the information or complaint, laid before a Justice, and incapable of being delegated to his clerk or anybody else; and that it would not be desirable to issue any Circular which either limited this discretion or suggested any other rules than those which follow from Jervis's Act.

INDIGENT EMIGRANTS TO AMERICA.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I had intended to ask the President of the Board of Trade if his attention has been called to the rejection by America of certain indigent emigrants recently conveyed to New York by the Cunard Steamship Company, and to that line being required by the United States' Authorities to bring them back to Liverpool; and if he can state the nationality of these persons who are unfit for America, and, in the event of their being foreigners, if their repatriation can be effected, having regard to there being less space in the United Kingdom than in America for superfluous foreign workers? At the request of the right hon. Gentleman, I will postpone the question.

ARMOUR PIERCING PROJECTILES.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if the armour-piercing projectiles, which to the amount of £13,080 were last year purchased from foreigners, could have been obtained from Sheffield; if the braid and cloth ordered from abroad, to the extent of £6,367, were unobtainable at Bradford, Huddersfield, or Limerick; and if the wood for £20,654 worth of butts and fore-ends could have been purchased, if not at home, at least within the Empire?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): Special negotiations were entered into with a Sheffield firm for the armour-piercing projectiles, but their terms were too high. Trial orders for braid and cloth are in the hands of English manufacturers, but no progress has been made during the last 11 months, so that we cannot at present get these goods in England. As regards butts and fore-ends of rifles, I regret that at present no walnut has been found of suitable quality, except that which is grown on the Continent of Europe.

In reply to a further question by Mr. HOWARD VINCENT,

*MR. E. STANHOPE said: The difference in price of the armour-piercing projectiles obtained from foreigners was £14 each. An attempt was made to secure a reduction of price from English firms, but no satisfactory arrangement was made.

THE LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.

MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that the London County Council dispute the right of ratepayers or electors to inspect Minutes of proceedings of Committees of the Council, notwithstanding "The Municipal Corporations Act, 1882," Section 233, which gave the right to burgesses to inspect "the Minutes of proceedings of the Council," which was made applicable to County Councils by "The Local Government Act, 1888," on the alleged ground that proceedings of Committees of the Council are not "proceedings of the Council" within the meaning of the Act; whether he is aware that the bulk, or nearly all of the proceedings of the Council, are by Committees of that body, and that such Committees may consist of the whole or parts of the Council; and whether the Local Government Board recognise the above construction of the statute to be correct; and, if so, whether it was intended by the Local Government Act that the ratepayers should have no right to inspect Minutes of proceedings and acts done by the Council by delegation to Committees of the whole or part of their body?

*MR. RITCHIE: I was not aware that the question as to the right of ratepayers or electors to inspect the Minutes of proceedings of Committees of the London County Council had been raised prior to the notice which was given of the question by the hon. Member. I am aware that a large proportion of the proceedings of the County Council are by Committees of that body, but I am informed that all proceedings of Committees which are important are reported to the Council, and that the Minutes containing those Reports are open to the inspection of county electors in London. The view which the County Council have adopted is that the proceedings of Committees of the Council are not proceedings of the Council within the meaning of Section 233 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, which is applied to County Councils by the Local Government Act, and I am advised that this construction of the statute is correct. The County Council in this matter are in the same position as a Municipal Corporation.

THE ZAMBESI.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what was defined to be the eastern boundary of the British sphere of influence south of Zambesi when that sphere of influence was formerly proclaimed: and whether Ngamiland was included in such sphere of influence?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): I understand that my hon. Friend chiefly wishes for information respecting the western boundary. The eastern boundary was the Portuguese Province of Sofala. That on the northwest was, as was stated in the answer of the 13th to Mr. Baumann, only roughly indicated. The question of Ngamiland is under discussion and no opinion can be given.

HIGH COMMISSIONER FOR SOUTH AFRICA.

MR. HANBURY: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies what has been the salary of the High Commissioner for South Africa at various times since the creation of that office; what proportion of it has been paid by the Imperial Government and Cape Colony respectively; and what is the proportion of such payments, and the total salary, at the present time?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): When the High Commissionership was first created the Governor of the Cape, who has always held the appointment, was merely High Commissioner for the tribes on the Eastern frontier. He received £1,000 a year from Cape funds, in addition to £5,000 a year also from Cape funds as Governor. Sir Bartle Frere, who in 1877 was first appointed High Commissioner for South Africa, also received £1,000 a year from Cape funds, as did Sir Hercules Robinson. In 1889 a Cape Act was passed, No. 38 of 1889, increasing the High Commissioner's salary from colonial funds to £3,000 a year. Sir Bartle Frere was paid £1,500

a year as a personal allowance from Imperial funds. Sir Hercules Robinson received and Sir Henry Loch receives £1,000 from the same source. These Imperial allowances were granted in each case upon personal grounds, and do not necessarily attach to the office. The total salary being £9,000, the proportion of the Imperial payments to the total salary at the present time is 1 to 4 if the salary of the High Commissionership is meant, or 1 to 9 if the total emoluments of Sir Henry Loch are meant.

MR. HANBURY: I understand that the result is this, the Colonial Government pays £3,000, and the Imperial Government £1,000.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: Yes, Sir.

SCARCITY OF SMALL SILVER CHANGE.

MR. HERMON-HODGE (Lancashire, Accrington): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been called to the increasing difficulty of getting small silver change, such as sixpences, in London; and whether he is aware that, owing to their bulk, and the difficulty of distinguishing between them, the new 4s. and 5s. pieces are most unpopular, so much so that in some clubs the cashiers rapidly accumulate sums of from £20 to £25 in these coins, of which they cannot get rid?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I am glad that my hon. Friend has asked this question. Yes, Sir, I have heard of the alleged increasing difficulty of getting small silver change, such as sixpences, in London; but I have repeatedly stated in this House that the Government have no means of increasing the amount in circulation. There are at this moment in the Bank of England 3,760,000 shillings and 3,000,000 sixpences ready for circulation. Any bank can obtain them. Clubs, shopkeepers, or individuals have only to ask their bankers to supply them, and they, in their turn, can set them into circulation. With regard to the second question, namely, the crowns and double florins, I am not aware that they are most unpopular, except, possibly, in clubs. On the contrary, large demands continue to be made for them; £70,000 worth were asked for lately within a very few days. If it is said that the cashiers of the clubs cannot get rid of these pieces, but accumulate them to the amount of £20 to £25, I presume that if they keep a good balance at their bankers, and send them these coins, asking the bank to give them shillings and sixpences in exchange, the banks would not be unwilling to oblige such valuable customers.

ADMIRALTY SURVEYS—CASE OF PATRICK LAMB.

MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether his attention has been drawn to the circumstances narrated in the "Admiralty Surveys Report for 1889," under which last year, at personal loss to himself, Patrick Lamb indicated to the Admiralty Surveyors a rock suspected, but theretofore not located, about 20 miles from Cape St. Mary, Newfoundland; and whether, in view of the statement in the Report that "The importance of the knowledge of its existence will be at once seen when it is remembered that many mail steamers pass this way on their course to the St. Lawrence, and that, though in ordinary weather the largest ship would cross it in safety, the heavy seas of an Atlantic gale, in such an exposed position, would infallibly cause her to strike, with, in all probability, immediate foundering as the result,"

Patrick Lamb has received, or will receive, some reward or distinction for his conduct?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): Patrick Lamb has received a reward of £20 from the officer in charge of the survey, in accordance with the invariable practice whenever information is received that leads to the discovery of dangerous rocks, which would otherwise not have been noted on the charts. Many rocks have been noted on the charts in this manner. Each such case is considered on its merits, and in this instance the reward granted was thought to be adequate.

IRELAND—INCOME TAX.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will agree to the Return as to Income Tax (Ireland), which stands on the Paper for to-day?

MR. GOSCHEN: I have made inquiry, and find that the information cannot be obtained. It is not possible, therefore, to give the Return.

SUPPLY OF NEWSPAPERS, &c., TO WORKHOUSES.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Boards of Guardians in Ireland are empowered, as similar Bodies are in England, to defray out of the rates the cost of supplying the inmates of workhouses with newspapers, periodicals, and books; whether he is aware that the President of the Local Government Board in England has directed that the Inspectors of the Local Government Board shall be instructed, in connection with their visits to workhouses, to give this subject their special attention, and to report to the Board as to the views and practice of the Guardians with respect to such supply; whether he will give, if he can do so legally, similar directions to Local Government Board Inspectors in Ireland; and whether, if the law in Ireland is in this respect different from the law in England, the Government will introduce a measure for the assimilation of the law in Ireland to the law in England on this subject?

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I have also to ask whether any expense incurred by Poor Law Guardians in Ireland for the purpose of supplying reading matter to the inmates of workhouses is disallowed by the Auditors of the Local Government Board; and, if this is the case, whether he will take steps to have the Rules of the Local Government Board altered in this particular?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I have ascertained that there is no enactment expressly empowering Boards of Guardians in Ireland to provide the inmates of workhouses with newspapers, periodicals, and books. When such expenditure is incurred, it is a matter for the Auditor to determine if such shall be allowed. The Local Government Board believe that literature of this nature is usually supplied by private contribution. Inquiries will be made, and there is every desire that the practice in Ireland should be on all fours with that in England.

POST OFFICE AT MANOO.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has considered the Petition presented to him by the inhabitants of Manoo, in the County of Fermanagh, praying for the establishment of a Post Office in their district?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): I have considered the Petition referred to by the hon. Member, and I should have been glad to comply with it, but I find that the cost involved in the establishment of a Post Office at Manoo would be out of all proportion to the revenue from the six letters a day to be benefited. Under the circumstances, I regret that a Post Office cannot be opened at Manoo. There are three Post Offices Kish, Edeney, and Lisnaritck, within three miles from Manoo.

LIGHT RAILWAYS IN DONEGAL.

MR. DALTON (Donegal, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he can now state the cause of the delay in granting the sum of £116,000, recommended, so strongly by the Light Railway Commissioners, and approved of unanimously by the Grand Jury of the County Donegal at the last Spring Assizes, in favour of the Stranorlar and Glenties line; and whether it is a fact that no objection to the proposed line has been received from any quarter? I also wish to ask whether the Government have yet decided on the route for the North-West Donegal Railway line to Falcarragh; and, if not, will he direct a sworn inquiry to be held at Milford or Ramelton, in order that the inhabitants of these towns might produce evidence in favour of the proposed line from Letterkenny via Ramelton, Milford, Carrigart, Creeslough, and Dunfanaghy?

MR. LEA (Londonderry): I beg also to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Treasury have decided to give the Donegal and Killybeg Light Railway Company a free grant under "The Light Railways (Ireland) Act, 1889," for the construction of their railway; and, if so, whether a similar grant will at the same time be made to the line from Stranorlar to Glenties, in the same County of Donegal, opening up the congested district of the Barony of Boyleagh; whether the last-mentioned line was recommended by the Commissioners appointed under the said Act; and if, under the circumstances, the Treasury will give at least equal facilities to the Glenties line as to the Killybeg line?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I can understand the desire of hon. Members and their constituents to know whether light railway schemes affecting their districts are likely to be aided under the Act of last Session. I would point out, however, that the Treasury and the Irish Government are engaged in negotiations and deliberations under quite novel and somewhat difficult circumstances. The fact is, there are more schemes than money, and, therefore, it is necessary that we should proceed very cautiously, in order to select the best schemes, and those which will best meet the requirements of the districts as a whole.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): We have vainly endeavoured to extract some idea as to what month in the coming year it will be possible to get an answer to this important question. The Government have now had nine months to consider the matter; how soon next year may we expect an answer?

MR. JACKSON: I hope within the limit of the time mentioned by the hon. and learned Gentleman to be in a position to give a favourable answer. I am afraid that the answer I have given must cover the other questions upon the same subject which stand on the Paper. Various schemes have been under consideration in regard to West Donegal, but none has yet been authorised.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is it true that there is a considerable amount of friction between the Irish Office and the Treasury on the subject; that the Irish Office take one view and the Treasury another?

MR. JACKSON: I do not like to suggest that that question is in the nature of a fishing inquiry, but there is no ground for it.

CORK LUNATIC ASYLUM.

MR. M. HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the recent Report of the Government Inspectors with reference to the Cork Lunatic Asylum, and to the discussion thereon at the meeting of the Board of Governors on the 10th instant; whether it is the fact, as stated by one of the Governors, that the Asylum was built to accommodate only 500 inmates, and that the number of inmates is now 1,000; whether the Inspectors reported that the Asylum had reached the utmost limit to which it should be allowed to grow, and that every effort should be made to decrease the number of inmates; and whether the Government propose to take any action either as to this portion of the Report, or as to the complaints made in the Report as to want of cleanliness and proper sanitary arrangements in the establishment?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is a fact that the Cork Asylum was originally built to accommodate only 500 patients. But since then, from time to time, very considerable structural additions have been made, though not to an extent sufficient for the accommodation of the present number of inmates which at the beginning of this month was 1,038. The Inspectors did express an opinion to the effect indicated in the third paragraph. The Inspectors' Report is under the consideration of the Government.

IRISH COURT RULES.

MR. HOZIER (Lancashire, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether the jurisdiction exercised by the English Courts under the Judicature Rules of 1875 over defendants domiciled in Scotland or Ireland was taken away in 1883; whether a similar jurisdiction is still exercised by the Irish Courts under the Irish Judicature Rules of 1877 over Scotchmen and Englishmen; and whether, if so, Her Majesty's Government will take steps to have the Irish Court Rules assimilated to the English Rules as regards jurisdiction over persons domiciled outside of the ordinary jurisdiction of the Courts?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): The power of the English Courts to order service of a writ on a defendant resident in Scotland or Ireland would appear to have been abridged in one particular class of cases only by the Rules of 1883, namely, in actions for the breach of contract, which, according to the terms thereof, ought to be performed in England. No similar restriction was made by the Rules of the Irish Court, but by the 33rd section of the Irish Judicature Act it is enacted that whenever application is to be made for leave to serve a defendant resident out of the jurisdiction

"the Court or Judge to whom such application shall be made shall have regard to the amount or value of the claim or property affected, and to the comparative cost and inconvenience of proceedings in Ireland or in the place of the defendant's residence, &c., and no such leave is to be granted without an affidavit giving the necessary information on those points."

I am informed that the Irish Rules are at present under revision by the Judges of the Supreme Court, who have the whole question of the Rules of Court for that country under their consideration.

EVICTIIONS AT FALCARRAGH.

MR. DALTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has sanctioned the employment of the Forces of the Crown for the eviction of 46 families on the Stewart and Swineys estates, in the Falcarragh district of the County Donegal; whether any of the evictions have yet been carried out; whether he can state the total number of persons who will be rendered homeless by the eviction of these 46 families; whether this district is one comprised within the congested districts proposed to be dealt with by a Bill now before the House; whether any of these people have been the recipients within the past year of relief in the shape of seed potatoes; and whether, under all the circumstances of the case, and in view of the fact that eviction at this time of the year will deprive these families of the crops now in the ground, and thereby deprive them of their only means of subsistence during the coming winter, the Government propose to take any steps to avert the danger of famine to these people during the coming winter?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: With respect to the inquiries in paragraphs one and four, I beg to refer to my reply on these points to the question put on the subject by the hon. Member for South Donegal on the 9th inst. Up to June 14, 25 of these evictions had, I understand, been concluded, and it was expected that five more would have been carried out that day. The Report before me does not show the number of persons comprised in each family to be evicted. I am informed that none of these people have been recipients during the past year of relief in the shape of seed potatoes, neither are there any crops planted on the farms from which they have been evicted, nor is there any reason to expect famine as suggested in the question.

In answer to a further question by Mr. DALTON,

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said: Protection has been applied for and granted in respect of the execution of eviction decrees in the case of certain tenants on the Olphert estate, where the Plan of Campaign is in operation. I am informed that these tenants have not been the recipients of relief for their families, or of seed to crop their land in the last 12 months.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Is it true that an old woman of 80, who was unable to make her way outside, was treated with brutal violence?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no Report that confirms that statement, but I shall be glad to inquire.

LADY BURNETT SCHOOL, BANCHORY.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to a scheme for the future administration of the Lady Burnett School, Banchory, sanctioned 24th February, part of which is to provide additional accommodation; whether he is aware that there is a public school within half a mile, with accommodation for 340, with an attendance of only 160; whether the School Board of Banchory has been consulted by the Department before this expenditure for additional accommodation was sanctioned; whether, with one exception, the whole members of the Banchory School Board are opposed to the extension of the Lady Burnett School as unnecessary and wasteful; and whether, in the circumstances, any steps will be taken to remedy the evil complained of?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I am acquainted with the scheme for the administration of the Lady Burnett School. The additional accommodation for which the scheme makes provision, consists of a class-room, the necessity for which was repeatedly urged by Her Majesty's Inspector, not in order to increase the attendance, but in order to provide for the satisfactory teaching of the numbers actually attending. The endowment was under private Trustees, and the Department could only approve of a scheme with their assent, and on their initiative. The School Board had no control whatever over the funds of the endowment, nor any share in the management of the school. The objection of the School Board was known to my Lords only after the scheme had been approved. My Lords do not think that the additional accommodation ought in any way to interfere with the public school, but they are now in correspondence with a view to restricting the attendance at the Lady Burnett School to girls and boys under a certain standard, so as to prevent such interference.

THE LOSS OF THE NESTA.

MR. NEVILLE (Liverpool, Exchange): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether it is a fact that the captain, officers, and the crew of the Nesta, which was run into and sunk by H.M.S. Surprise, obtained, as their proportion of the amount paid by the Admiralty £162 in respect of their claims of £1,083 17s. 10d. for lost effects; and whether the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty can allow some further compensation to these men?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The total sum paid by the Admiralty by way of compensation for the loss of the Nesta was £8,250, or the maximum amount claimable under the "Merchant Shipping Act of 1862." This sum was paid to the owners, and they distributed it as they thought right. No further compensation can be paid in this case, as I think ample compensation has already been paid.

ARMY PENSIONS—CASE OF MICHAEL STANLEY.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been drawn to the case of an old soldier, named Michael Stanley, who, having served in the Crimea in 1854, and afterwards in India during the Mutiny, in the 3rd European Light Cavalry, was afterwards sent to British North America and Jamaica, where he contracted fever and ague, from the effects of which he is still suffering; whether he is aware that Stanley is deaf and unable to work, and has spent most of his time during the last few years in the workhouse; and whether he has applied to the War Office for his deferred pension, and has been refused; and, if so, on what grounds?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Stanley did not fulfil the conditions entitling a soldier to a deferred pension, but his case is being referred to the Chelsea Commissioners in order to ascertain if anything can be done for him.

THE LAND COMMISSION.

MR. M. HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the delay which takes place in the offices of the Land Commission; if he is aware that a letter addressed to the Secretary is hardly ever answered under three weeks or a month; that copies of fair rent and other orders and of valuers' and Sub-Commissioners' Reports cannot be obtained without prolonged delays; that the Land Commission have now a printed form of circular in which they apprise persons requiring such copies that, owing to press of business, a long delay must elapse before they will be ready; and whether some additional clerical assistance could be provided?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners report that no delay which can be avoided occurs in their offices, and that the statements in the second paragraph of the question appear to be made under some misapprehension. They state that, as a rule, copies of documents are furnished within a few days after applied for, and that only in exceptional circumstances have any delays occurred. At times as many as 1,000 requisitions are received within a few days, in which case the circular referred to is issued. It does not state that "a long time must elapse," but that a little time may, before the application can be complied with. Any exceptional influx of business of this nature is met by the clerical staff working overtime, and I am not aware that there is any necessity for the course suggested in the last paragraph.

MR. M. HEALY: Have the Land Commission made application for additional clerical assistance?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think not. I do not gather from the Report that they deem the staff inadequate.

POLICE DOCTORS.

MR. ROCHE (Galway, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the office of doctor to the police at Kilconnell, New Inn, and Woodlawn Police Stations (County Galway), held until his death by the dispensary doctor (Dr. Deely), has now been divided, Dr. Rutherford being appointed to Kilconnell, Dr. O'Farrell to New Inn, and Dr. Leonard to Woodlawn; why Dr. M'Merney, who succeeded Dr. Daly as dispensary doctor, and who applied to be appointed police doctor, got neither of the three stations, though he lives within two miles of each of the three, whereas Dr. Rutherford lives at Ballinasloe, eight miles from Kilconnell, Dr. O'Farrell at Loughrea, 10 miles from New Inn, and Dr. Leonard at Athenry, 18 miles from Woodlawn; whether there is any question as to Dr. M'Merney's qualifications and capacity to discharge the duties of police doctor; whether he is aware that frequent complaints have been made recently as to the irregularity of the visits of Dr. Rutherford, who holds the appointment of visiting physician to Ballinasloe Lunatic Asylum, that Dr. O'Farrell is the son of a local Crown prosecutor, and has never previously held any public appointment, and that Dr. Leonard is over 70 years of age; and why the ordinary practice of appointing the dispensary doctor police doctor, till recently a rule of the force, has been departed from in this case?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that the facts are as stated in the first three paragraphs, except that Dr. Leonard resides at a distance of only 12 miles by train from the place mentioned. The public service will not be served by discussing the qualifications of individual candidates. No complaints have been received as to the appointment of Dr. Leonard, who is not over 70, but only 61 years of age. Dr. O'Farrell, for the last two and a half years, has been a Constabulary Medical Attendant. The rules referred to in the last paragraph were abolished in 1883, and no such rule is now in existence.

MR. M. HEALY: Will not the right hon. Gentleman interfere, and see that a doctor living on the spot is appointed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not see why I should interfere with the Constabulary Authorities in the exercise of their discretion.

MR. M. HEALY: Was not Dr. M'Merney passed over because he is a Nationalist?

[No reply.]

ISSUE OF SUMMONSES AT CORK.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is true, as reported in the Cork papers, that summonses were last week issued at the prosecution of District Inspector Ball, Fermoy (County Cork), against Patrick Keefe, Thomas Kent, William Kent, George Mulcahy, John Fuohy, Patrick Walsh, John Donovan, and James Donovan; if he can state whether these prosecutions are brought with the approval or sanction of the Irish Law Officers; and whether he is aware that of the above-named defendants two of them, namely, Thomas and William Kent, are at present confined in Cork Gaol for offences arising out of the alleged boycotting of a farm in connection with which these summonses are now issued?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that the legal proceedings referred to are still pending. It would therefore not be proper for me to make a statement on the subject.

MR. FLYNN: Why did the police institute these prosecutions instead of the owner of the farm who was entitled to do so?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no information on that subject. If the hon. Gentleman will put a question on the Paper I will ascertain.

LICENSING REGISTERS.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the clerks of Licensing Magistrates are compelled by law to keep a register of the names of the owners of the freehold of licensed premises, and of the persons to whom licences have been granted; and, if so, whether he will cause a Return to be prepared of the owners and occupiers of licensed premises in each city, municipal borough, and Petty Sessional Division respectively, in England and Wales?

MR. MATTHEWS: I suppose the hon. Member to refer to the register provided for by Section 36 of the Licensing Act of 1872. That register does not necessarily show the name of the freeholder. A Return such as the hon. Member suggests could be obtained only by applying to all the clerks to Licensing Justices throughout the Kingdom would take a long time to obtain and present, and would, in my opinion, be of doubtful utility.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): Might I call the attention of the Home Secretary to the fact that Clause 6 of the Bill we are now discussing turns upon the compensation to owners, and Amendments have been put down dealing with the case of the occupier? How can the House fairly discuss this question as between owner and occupier unless the Government furnish us with the information which is in their hands as to owners and occupiers? On a recent occasion I asked the First Lord of the Treasury this question, and showed him the very Return we are now asking for in connection with Sunderland.

MR. MATTHEWS: I have pointed out to the hon. Member that the Return could only be made with great difficulty. If, however, it is possible to get the information in time for the discussion it shall be done.

MR. STOREY: I shall be very glad to show the right hon. Gentleman a copy of the register kept by all clerks to the Licensing Justices.

IRISH PUBLIC WORKS.

MR. FOLEY (Galway, Connemara): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether any money, and, if so, how much, has been expended in Ireland up to the present time in pursuance of the policy of the Government, announced by the Member for South Paddington, when Chancellor of the Exchequer and Leader of the House in 1886, and of the Report of the Royal Commission on Irish Public Works which was made the same year; and whether the Treasury are committed to any expenditure in pursuance of the recommendations of the Royal Commission; and, if so, to what extent and on what works, and when are the works likely to be commenced, and if the construction of the line from Galway to Clifden is included in any such expenditure?

MR. JACKSON: It would not be possible for me to give a precise answer to the first part of the hon. Member's question. Such information could only be given after very careful inquiry, in answer to specific heads of inquiry. I presume, however, that the hon. Member desires to know whether a railway from Galway to Clifden is to be made. I am not able to answer this question at present, beyond saying that such a line is within the list of those scheduled by the Government, and I hope it may be found possible to make satisfactory arrangements for the making and working of such a line.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I do appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to give some exact answer to the question. These questions are put down day after day, and we are unable to extract any answer from the Government. Surely it is possible to say how many millions of money have been spent upon public works since that celebrated declaration of policy.

DR. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): Has a single shilling been spent on works?

MR. JACKSON: It is not possible for me to give any accurate information on such short notice on a question of this kind. There might be a difference of opinion as to whether certain expenses are in pursuance of the policy of the Government announced in 1886. I am perfectly willing to give any information that I can if the hon. Member will put his question in a form which can be answered.

DR. KENNY: Has any money at all been expended? That is a specific question.

MR. JACKSON: Yes; I certainly can say that some money has been expended in connection with the preparation of certain schemes for drainage in Ireland. The Bills were introduced last Session, but the Government were unable to pass them.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): Has there not been an expenditure on the drainage of the Suck?

MR. JACKSON: A Bill has been passed authorising the expenditure of a contribution of £50,000.

DEDUCTIONS FROM MINERS' WAGES.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that at some coal mines in Yorkshire the deductions made from the coal getter's wage, under "The Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887," Section 14, Subsection 2, are often in excess of the amount actually paid to the checkweigher; and whether he will instruct the Inspector of Mines to inquire and report as to the disposal of any surplus?

MR. MATTHEWS: So far as any information has reached me, I gather that at the request of the men employed at certain collieries in Yorkshire, the owners have been in the habit of making certain deductions from the wages of the men, which have been handed over to the treasurer of the men for the purpose of paying the expenses of the checkweigher as authorised by the Coal Mines Regulation Act. With regard to any surplus moneys arising out of such transactions, that is a matter to be dealt with by mutual arrangement between the owners and the men, and is not one in which I have any power to interfere.

NEW TIPPERARY.

MR. DILLON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether a body of people, who had assembled in New Tipperary on Wednesday last, and had lighted a bonfire to express their joy at Mr. O'Brien's marriage, were charged and batoned by the police, who extinguished the fire and carried off a flag which the people had set up; and, if so, on what grounds they acted? I should also like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, on the occasion of this charge, when the police batoned these people, they struck two women; whether, on the flagstaff having been thrown down into the fire, a woman who was endeavouring to extinguish it was struck by a policeman; whether it is true that a policeman presented a revolver in the face of a man who was standing inside his own hall-door; and whether the flagstaff, having been re-erected by the Nationalists, has been again cut down by the police?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: With regard to the various supplementary questions,

I shall be glad to give the hon. Member any information if he will put them on the Paper. I may say, however, that I gather that the flagstaff the hon. Member alluded to was not in the same place as the bonfire, but in another part of the town. With regard to the question on the Paper, I am informed that fires were lighted in the public streets and caused obstruction. It is not the case that people were charged and batoned; as a matter of fact, no batons were drawn by the police.

MR. SEXTON: Did the Local Body of Town Commissioners raise any objection to the celebration?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know that they did, but I imagine the police in the ordinary discharge of their duty would not wait for such a representation.

MR. DILLON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that is the common practice to light bonfires at night in country towns in Ireland, and can there be any obstruction of the streets when the entire population of the town, without exception, are parties to the lighting of the fire?

MR. PARNELL (Cork): Does the right hon. Gentleman approve of brutal treatment merely for the purpose of putting out a bonfire?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot regard as brutal the putting out of lighted bonfires in the public streets. Of course, if the entire population are engaged in having an evening round the bonfire, it cannot be said they were incommoded by it. But there may have been persons in the town who were not parties to what was going on.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): Were not the bonfires lighted after dark, when all traffic was ended?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know what the practice may be in country towns in Ireland, but certainly the practice in England is to light bonfires after dark. But traffic in England is not ended after dark.

MR. DILLON: Has the right hon. Gentleman ever been in an Irish country town?

MR. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): Was not the reason for the police putting the bonfire out that it was lit in honour of Mr. O'Brien's marriage?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; I think not.

CATHOLIC CHAPLAINS IN SCOTCH POOR HOUSES.

MR. J. WILSON (Lanark, Govan): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether it is lawful for Parochial Boards in Scotland (should they deem it expedient) to appoint a Roman Catholic chaplain in poorhouses in Scotland, and to allow him a suitable remuneration, or whether it is illegal to appoint as chaplain any person other than a clergyman of the Established Church?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: There is no statutory provision on this subject; but I am not prepared to say that it would be illegal for a Parochial Board to remunerate a Roman Catholic clergyman for his attendance on inmates of that persuasion in cases where the number of such inmates is considerable.

POLICE SHADOWING IN IRELAND.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, on the 23rd ultimo, two policemen named respectively Gurry and Linane, followed Mr. John Cullinane, Mr. R. Frewen, and Mr. B. Gill into the shop of Mr. J. A. Carew, of Tipperary; that when they retired into an inner room they were again followed by the policemen; also when they proceeded upstairs to the private drawing room, on the invitation of the proprietor, the policemen followed, and burst in the door which had been closed against them, and remained in the room for the time of 25 minutes against the protests of the proprietor of the house, using insulting language; and by what authority do the police follow these gentlemen, and had they any warrant for breaking open the door of the house?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The two policemen referred to entered the house because Cullinane is a man who is actively engaged in organising boycotting and other illegal practices in the district. The shop referred to is a public house. The police did not enter into any private room, but that part of the house which is open to the public. They did not burst in any door, neither was any insulting language used by them.

MR. DILLON: On what ground does the right hon. Gentleman state that Mr. Cullinane is actively engaged in organising boycotting in that district?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: He is not only engaged in illegal practices, but I believe he is the paid agent for these purposes of an Organisation with which the hon. Member is connected.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: What reason has the right hon. Gentleman for stating that Mr. Cullinane is the paid agent of an organisation engaged in boycotting?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Reasons which I believe to be adequate.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: Will the right hon. Gentleman state them to the House?

[No answer was given.]

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I will now ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether complaints have reached him that on the 7th inst. when Mr. Gill, Mr. John Kelly, Mr. O. B. Dalton, and Mr. Cullinane stood on the street of Tipperary to ask Mr. Ronan, Chairman of the Town Commissioners, how his sick child was, two policemen named Gurry and Linane stood between them and remained there in spite of those gentlemen's protests; that when they went into the shop of Mr. Ronan to pursue their inquiries, the police tried to force their way in against the protest of Mr. Ronan's relative, Mr. Kernick, to whom they said, "How dare you talk to us, you puppy;" and subsequently they followed, using such language as, "We are in nice company now," "Don't mind that class," "Go on Jack, we know you," "Get on Gill, we know your character;" and if he can state how long it is intended that these gentlemen shall be thus followed by the police?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that the constables mentioned were following Mr. Cullinane in consequence of the active part he is taking in organising boycotting and other illegal practices in the districts. The police state that they did not interfere with the conversation, nor is it the case that they attempted to enter the house, as alleged. They also state that no protest was made to them by any of Mr. Ronan's relatives, and that the language attributed to them is without the slightest foundation.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Cannot the constabulary be instructed to keep away 10 yards or so, which would prevent their hearing the conversation?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is no desire to make the following by the police unnecessarily disagreeable—quite the contrary; but if conversation, organising, and boycotting are permitted in the public streets, the following would be rendered useless.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Are we to understand that the instructions to the constabulary are that they are to keep within earshot?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I should think that depends on the character of each case.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: When the right hon. Gentleman stated that the police did not interfere with the conversation of gentlemen in Tipperary, did he mean that with a policeman stationed on his right hand and another on his left a gentleman's conversation is not interfered with?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think I made the statement suggested by the hon. Gentleman. I said that no unnecessary interference was intended.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is it left to the discretion of the policemen to decide whether they shall remain within earshot of those whom they are following?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I should think not; I imagine that those who give the constabulary instructions would take notice of the particular circumstances of each case.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: Will the right hon. Gentleman reply to the last part of my question?

MR. CONDON (Tipperary, E.): Were specific instructions given to the Police Authorities to shadow my wife and another lady in Cashel, and to detail men to walk side by side with them?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I only lay down general lines of policy in the matter. With regard to the last paragraph of the question on the Paper, of course these gentlemen would not be followed if they gave any indication whatever that they proposed to abstain from boycotting.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: If affidavits are sworn to the effect that the language stated in the question was used by the police, will the right hon. Gentleman take notice of it?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will take notice of any matter to which my attention is called.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I will ask whether the right hon. Gentleman has been advised by the Irish Law Officers of the Crown that the police are legally entitled to follow about persons against whom they have no warrants, and against whom no proceedings whatever have been taken?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I apprehend that the manner in which the police are carrying out their duties is perfectly legal.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: That is not what I asked. Has the right hon. Gentleman been advised by the Law Officers of the Crown that this course is legal?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the right hon. Gentleman means to ask whether I have, in a formal manner, obtained the opinion of the Law Officers, I must remind him that it is contrary to the universal practice to make public the confidential reports of the Law Officers. But if he means to ask whether I have taken pains to satisfy myself that the course pursued by the police in Ireland is legal, I have so satisfied myself.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: That was not my question. I am aware that it is not customary to give the House the confidential opinions of the Law Officers of the Crown, but it is customary to tell the House whether the Law Officers have been consulted.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Does the right hon. Gentleman mean to ask whether I have had a case stated for the opinion of the Irish Law Officers?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: Yes; that is my question.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not had the opinion of the Law Officers on a case stated, and it is not usual to have a case stated unless there is some doubt as to the legality. I have taken pains to convince myself that there is no doubt, and, therefore, I have not made a formal request to have a case stated.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): Will the right hon. Gentleman lay the instructions issued to the police on the Table of the House?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Of course, as the right hon. Gentleman well knows, it depends on the facts of each particular case what course is pursued, and I apprehend that there is no general regulation covering the peculiarities of each case.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say he had given such instructions?

MR. T. M. HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman stated he had himself given general instructions. I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman will state what those instructions are?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am responsible for the general course pursued by the constabulary in Ireland, and I have no desire in any way to minimise that responsibility; but I am, naturally, not consulted as to the particular course to be taken by particular constables in proceedings with regard to particular individuals.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman add to his general instructions a direction to the effect that the constables are to keep out of earshot. That is a most vital question?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir. I am desirous of limiting as far as possible this method of dealing with crime, and I shall be most glad——

MR. DILLON: You have no right to call it crime.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: And I shall most gladly take advantage of any presumption that may arise in favour of any individual who is shadowed; but, having in view the terrible suffering produced by wholesale boycotting, I cannot undertake altogether to dispense with it.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): I will ask whether Mr. M'Crae, of Dundee, has been shadowed from Newbridge to Clongorey, and whether the right hon. Gentleman has any reason to suspect Mr. M'Crae of crime?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have never heard of Mr. M'Crae. It may argue myself unknown.

MR. GILL (Louth, S.): Will the right hon. Gentleman state to the House in what manner this shadowing operates to prevent boycotting?

MR. DILLON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will order the police in Ireland to discontinue the system of shadowing individuals? In asking this let me express a hope that as the right hon. Gentleman admits himself having directed this system, he will, after the

Mr. A. J. Balfour

Debate that has taken place, order it to be discontinued?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know that I can do more than repeat the answer I have just given. No individuals are "shadowed" in Ireland unless they are known to be actively engaged in promoting boycotting and intimidation, or other crime. I am desirous, as far as possible, of limiting this method of dealing with crime, and will most gladly take advantage of any presumption that may arise in favour of any individuals so shadowed; but, having in view the terrible suffering produced by wholesale boycotting, I cannot undertake altogether to dispense with it.

MR. DILLON: Then I say it is a brutal and abominable outrage, and if there is bloodshed it will rest on your head.

MR. PARNELL: The right hon. Gentleman said he would gladly take advantage of any presumption in favour of the people who are shadowed. Will he also take advantage of the English presumption that every person accused of crime is innocent until he is proved to be guilty?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Will the hon. Gentleman undertake that these people will not repeat the crime?

MR. DILLON: The right hon. Gentleman has no right to charge us with having committed crime.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. DILLON continued to address the House, but the uproar was so great that what he said did not reach the Reporters' Gallery. He was, however, understood to say:—The right hon. Gentleman has accused men of crime who are as innocent as the right hon. Gentleman himself is of crime. I ask him whether he will stand up and apologise to me for what he has said?

MR. J. O'CONNOR: The right hon. Gentleman ought to apologise.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. DILLON: He must apologise to me.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is committing a breach of order which, in his excitement, possibly he has not noticed. But I am bound to point out to the House that when I rise it is customary for hon. Members to resume their seats. I was only going to observe that this series of questions are taking rather an argumentative form, and are really becoming a sort of Debate which gives rise to great excitement.

MR. GILL: Balfour should not tell lies.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If I am at all responsible for producing the condition of heat in which the House finds itself by the character of my answers I greatly regret it, and I will substitute for the word "crime" the words "boycotting" and "intimidation." I have no doubt as to the description that should be applied to those offences; but as the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down does not consider those offences to be crimes, I will substitute the words themselves.

SIR G. TREVELYAN: With regard to this new method of shadowing, which the right Gentleman says is for the purpose of preventing intimidation, I will ask him whether he proposes to apply it to the land agents who are suspected of putting pressure on tenants under threat of eviction to agree to buy under the Ashbourne Act.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I should be glad to stop intimidation in Ireland by whomsoever or on whomsoever. With regard to the statement that "shadowing" is a new practice, I understand that it was largely indulged in by the right hon. Gentleman himself when he was Chief Secretary.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): Will the right hon. Gentleman be good enough to lay on the Table an account of the cases in which the practice was indulged in by his predecessors?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will consider it.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: As the right hon. Gentleman has withdrawn the word "crime," perhaps he will find it consistent with good taste to apologise for the insult offered.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I did not withdraw the word "crime." I stated that the offences against which this practice was used were largely boycotting and intimidation. I consider these to be serious crimes, but I was unwilling to beg the question by the use of a particular term.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lenark, N.W.): I may ask whether, in view of the extraordinary excitement manifested by the Front Opposition Bench on this matter, the right hon. Gentleman or the Home Secretary can state whether this shadowing was not indulged in after the disturbances in London two years ago; and whether, on that occasion, the Front Opposition Bench gave tongue at all?

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I rise to order. The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Gill) has several times accused the right hon. Gentleman of telling lies.

*MR. SPEAKER: I am not aware of such observations made across the floor of the House, but if they were made, I should consider them as being highly un-Parliamentary; and, in the interests of order, if any further information is desired I appeal to the House that it may be asked for in the form of regular questions, so that conduct which is improper and unbecoming may be avoided.

THE EARL OF CAVAN (Somerset, S.): As shadowing has been customary in the case of deputations sent over to Ireland from England will the right hon. Gentleman take care that in the case of the other deputations, against the members of which no offences are alleged, there shall be no renewal of this practice?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the noble Lord is mistaken in supposing that the deputations have been shadowed. I rather think too much importance has been attached to their proceedings.

MR. DILLON subsequently rose and said: I apologise to you, Mr. Speaker, and express my regret for not resuming my seat. I was labouring under very great irritation at the time.

THE IRISH CONSTABULARY FORCE.

MR. PARNELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what steps he proposes to take upon the definite and categorical charges of misconduct, violence, and cruelty advanced against members of the Irish Constabulary Force on duty at Cashel, on Tuesday the 27th ultimo and succeeding days, by the Cashel Town Commissioners, in a Report of that body, an abstract of which was forwarded on Friday last to him? I may say that I have received a telegram from the Town Clerk of Cashel saying he can produce persons to give evidence who took no part in the meeting, and also adding he is authorised to state that the Commissioners whose names are not appended to the Report were from home when the signatures were affixed, or they would have signed it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not seen the Report of the Cashel Town Commissioners to which the hon. Gentleman refers; but I am obliged to his courtesy for sending me an abstract of it. I do not know that it is necessary for me to give any answer to his question beyond that which I gave in answer to a similar question put by him on Thursday last. But I would point out to him that in two, at least, cases of alleged violence on the part of the police the name of the constable incriminated appears to be known. Under these circumstances, it is open to the persons aggrieved either to bring an action or to prosecute. My right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General has before him papers relating to the alleged action of the Member for East Tipperary, and is considering whether there is evidence requiring him to institute proceedings against him. It is possible, therefore, that there may be legal inquiry bearing upon the Report of the Town Commissioners, on which they will be able to give evidence upon oath.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is it not the case that when such an action was brought the Court of Appeal reversed the decision of the Exchequer Division and changed the venue to the North of Ireland?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: In connection with this disturbance, has any person been treated in hospital or infirmary either in Tipperary or Cashel?

MR. SEXTON: Have not 16 or 17 specific charges of misconduct been made against the police by the Commissioner of the town? I should like to draw attention to the facts of one charge, namely, that strange policemen, who were imported, had their numbers removed from their uniforms so as to prevent identification. Does not this show collusion between individual constables and the Government?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that some eight constables imported from Waterford did have their numbers removed. In boroughs the police are numbered. I cannot say I think the proceeding was wise.

Mr. Parnell

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman take care that his views are communicated to the officer responsible for the act?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: He will see my answer in the Press. As to the question of the hon. Member for South, Tyrone, I will make inquiries. So far as my knowledge goes, nobody has had to remain in hospital.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the police officers in Ireland, like himself, affect not to read the newspapers?

MR. CLANCY: If actions are brought against the police will the Government defray the cost of the defence?

MR. M. HEALY: And will the right hon. Gentleman undertake that the Bench trying the case shall not be packed with his Removables?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I imagine the cases would go before a Jury, and not before Resident Magistrates.

MR. CLANCY: But do the Government intend to bear the cost of defending the police?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot answer that question without notice. Probably, if the prosecutions were successful, the Government would not. The ordinary course will be pursued.

MR. PARNELL: Will the Government undertake not to pay the cost of defending the police?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I can only repeat that the ordinary course will be pursued.

IRELAND—CENTRAL CONSTABULARY BARRACKS, BELFAST.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury when the money for the erection of Central Police Barracks in Belfast was voted; when the agreement with the Corporation of Belfast for the site was completed; and whether the work of erection has yet begun; and, if not, what is the cause of the delay?

*MR. JACKSON: Funds are provided in the Estimates for the current year; but have not yet been voted. The agreement for the acquisition of the site has not yet been completed, and as possession cannot be obtained till the 30th November next, the works cannot be begun.

WOOLWICH ARSENAL.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge): I wish to ask the Secretary of State for War whether a pattern maker named Barton, till recently employed in the Woolwich Arsenal, was discharged on the 3rd June, at one day's notice, on the ground of alleged slackness of work, without any extra pay or other compensation; how long had the man been employed in the Arsenal; did he, in the course of his work, receive severe injuries, which caused the loss of two fingers of his left hand, some 13 months ago; is it not the practice that when men have to be discharged for slackness of work at the Arsenal those who have met with accidents are by preference retained; whether, after his accident, a foreman sent for him and requested him to sign papers debarring him from receiving compensation for his injuries, and on the man asking what compensation he would receive that information was refused; what time was allowed him for deliberation or consultation with his friends as to whether he would be well advised in signing for or against compensation; did the fact that this man took the chair at a meeting in support of Mr. Martin Edmunds, the Liberal candidate for Woolwich, and formed a Union of Arsenal Labourers, constitute an offence in the eyes of the Arsenal Authorities; and whether he will now consider Barton's case, with a view to his reinstatement or compensation for the injuries he has received?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The pattern-maker, named Barton, was discharged as stated with other men, after a service of one year and eight months. Thirteen months ago he lost the little finger of his left hand. There is no rule as to the retention of men who have met with accidents. Barton was discharged in a necessary reduction as one of the men with shortest service, and therefore least claim to be retained. At the time of his accident he was, according to custom, called upon to decide whether he would continue on his then rating or accept a reduced rating and have his case put forward for compensation. He was given the remainder of the day for decision. As to this, I may perhaps explain that if a man continues able to earn his full wages the Treasury will not regard it as a case for compensation. The fact of the man taking the chair at a political meeting was not even known to the authorities in the Arsenal. It is not considered that Barton has any claim on the Department.

MEETINGS OF POST OFFICE
EMPLOYÉES.

MR. CONYBEARE: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the invitation of a Member of Parliament by Post Office employés to assist them in their deliberations at a meeting otherwise legitimate will constitute a breach of the Rules of the Service?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): As I have stated more than once, one of the conditions on which I relaxed the Rule respecting meetings concerning official questions outside the Post Office buildings, was that they should be confined to Post Office servants, and to those Post Office servants only, who were directly interested in the matter or matters to be discussed. I must leave it to the hon. Member's own intelligence to decide for himself whether it would be in accordance with this condition to invite a Member of Parliament to attend.

MR. CONYBEARE: As the right hon. Gentlemen's answer precludes hon. Members from attending these meetings, I beg to ask whether he proposes to take any action against some two or three hundred Post Office officials, whom I had the honour of addressing at the Southwark Radical Club last night?

*MR. RAIKES: I must ask for notice of that question.

MR. CONYBEARE: Is the right hon. Gentleman able to state what hon. Member or Members it was, and when he alleges that they at any meetings incited Post Office employés to contravene the Rules of the Service?

MR. RAIKES: I do not remember making any such statement. I said that I hoped I might rely on the co-operation of hon. Members not to do such a thing.

IRELAND—CHARGES AGAINST THE POLICE.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether civil processes for damages have been issued by Mr.

Thomas Barry, P.L.G., against District Inspector Ball and Sergeant R.I.C., Curraheha, Fermoy, in which the defendants are charged with assaulting and wounding the plaintiff; and whether, since plaintiff announced his intention of proceeding by civil bill for the assault, he has been served with a summons for having obstructed the police?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As legal proceedings are pending it would not be proper for me to enter into details of the case, though I may say that the Report I have received does not agree with the allegation in the question.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is this man to be kept in gaol in order to prevent him proceeding with his case?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No doubt every facility would be given him.

MR. CLANCY: Is this one of the cases in which the Government will defend the police?

MR. T. M. HEALY: The point is this. This person was assaulted by the police, and he took proceedings in order to vindicate himself. The police retaliated by prosecuting him. Now, I ask what are the dates of the respective proceedings?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. and learned Member knows he can easily ascertain the dates for himself.

MR. FLYNN: Has this man been served with a summons under the Crimes Act?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot say. I will ascertain.

IRISH DISTRICT LUNATIC ASYLUMS.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a copy of the correspondence between the Grand Jury of the County of Cork and the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland on the subject of the nomination by the Grand Jury of representatives on the Board of the District Lunatic Asylum?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is no object to be gained by such a course. The Grand Jury were entitled to 11 representatives. They submitted 20 names to the Lord Lieutenant from among which their representatives might be selected.

Mr. Flynn

THE CHARGE AGAINST SERGEANT LORD.

MR. P. J. O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in the Report furnished to him in the case of charges of forgery and fraud made by John Maher, of Lorrha, against Sergeant Lord, of that station, the fact is stated that some time after Maher had made his complaint to the Inspector General of Constabulary he was waited on by Mr. Doolan, J.P., with an offer of the money that Lord had previously refused to pay him; and whether, in view of this presumptive evidence that the amount claimed was due, and that Sergeant Lord was guilty of fraud on the Police Authorities by returning as a voucher a forged receipt for the money that had not been paid, the Government will direct the Attorney General to consider the case with a view to the vindication of justice?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Police Authorities are making inquiry into this matter.

THE POSTMEN'S MEETING AT CLERKENWELL.

MR. CONYBEARE: I beg to ask the Postmaster General if all the postmen who attended the meeting on Clerkenwell Green are to be required to give a written declaration that they will abstain from attending similar meetings, as considerable doubt exists on this subject?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL: The postmen in question will be required to promise that they will not again act in defiance of Official Regulations; but it may, perhaps, be well again to point out to the hon. Member that these relate only to meetings for the discussion of official matters, and that postmen are as free as any other persons to attend public meetings, where questions of public interest are discussed, outside the hours of official duty.

MR. C. GRAHAM: Does the right hon. Gentleman consider that a meeting of postmen to discuss the subject of their wages comes under the Regulations as to discussing official questions?

*MR. RAIKES: Certainly, Sir. I do.

IRISH NATIONAL SCHOOLS.

MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will give the names of the local managers of the two national schools in Clare to which Michael O'Brien's children were refused admission, namely, Armagh, 8528, National School, and Mullagh, 3928; and the name of the manager of Coore National School to which O'Brien is referred as being conveniently situated?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Commissioners of National Education report that the Rev. J. Cahir, P.P., is the manager of each of the three National Schools mentioned.

*MR. JORDAN: Is it not a fact that since the question was raised five children—two of them children of a policeman—have been admitted to the Armagh school?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no information on that point.

HOLDERS OF TOWN PARKS IN IRELAND.

MR. M'CARTAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will introduce into the Land Purchase (Ireland) Bill a provision to give relief to the holders of town parks in Ireland, so as to enable them to have fair rents fixed in respect of their holdings?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As the hon. Member is aware, the Land Purchase (Ireland) Bill does not deal with the question of fair rents, nor can I extend its scope by introducing any such questions into it. Adequate relief seems to be given to the holders of town parks by permitting them to purchase under the Act.

MR. M'CARTAN: Are we to take it the holders of town parks are to expect no further reliefs from the Government?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I should think that a relief which enabled them to become owners of the holding at a reduction of 20 per cent. on the rental is not an inconsiderable measure of relief.

CENTRAL TELEGRAPH OFFICE.

MR. M'CARTAN: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he will state the maximum number of hours duty and overtime performed by a telegraph clerk in the Central Telegraph Office for the seven days ending 8th instant; whether clerks on duty for five days from 5 p.m. to 2 a.m. are brought on overtime on the sixth day and also on Sundays; whether clerks, after performing duty from 8 p.m. to 7 a.m., are placed on overtime from 11 a.m. to 3 p.m. and in some cases to even a later hour; whether these clerks are again on duty at 8 p.m., thus performing 15 hours out of the 24 hours; whether there is less work performed in June than in July or August; and whether he will consider the desirability of taking, without delay, as many probationers from the Telegraph School as will give substantial relief to the overworked clerks?

*MR. RAIKES: In reply to the first question of the hon. Member, I have to state that the maximum number of hours of duty and overtime combined performed by a telegraphist in the Central Telegraph Office during the seven days ended the 8th instant was 81½. A part of this was, I understand, performed under a private arrangement as substitute for two other telegraphists. The answer to the next three questions is in the affirmative. But, except as regards the Sunday duty—which comes round once in four or five weeks—the performance of the overtime is quite voluntary. Practically, there is not much difference between the amount of work performed in June as compared with the other two months mentioned by the hon. Member. A statement of the comparative number of telegrams in each month will be found in the Appendix to the Reports of the Postmaster General, which are laid before Parliament. I do not myself think it desirable that a telegraphist who has been on duty for 11 hours should resume work at so short an interval as four hours. This was one of the points very fairly urged by the deputation of telegraphists whom I received a short time ago, and I shall be very glad if I can take measures to mitigate what I certainly regard as a hardship.

PRISON WARDERS.

MR. CONYBEARE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the warders in English prisons are required during the hours when they are off duty to appear in uniform outside the prison walls?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Prison Directors that there is an Order requiring the warders in English Convict Prisons when off duty to appear in uniform outside the prison walls. No General Order has been made by the Prison Commissioners on the subject applicable to local prisons. I am not aware that the practice entails any hardship on the men.

MR. CONYBEARE: Is the Rule universally enforced?

MR. MATTHEWS: So far as I am aware it is.

MR. CONYBEARE: I will now ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will consent to receive evidence from warders in Irish prisons showing that the Rule which requires them always to be in uniform even when off duty does entail hardship upon them; and whether, if particular facts are laid before him, he will indemnify any warders who may give such evidence against dismissal or other punishment?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The General Prisons Board report that they entertain no doubt whatever that the present arrangement is not attended with any hardship.

MR. CONYBEARE: I can give the right hon. Gentleman evidence that it does entail hardship. If the facts are laid before him, will he indemnify warders who may give evidence and guarantee them against the brutal ill-treatment of the Prisons Board? I must press this question.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member can lay his facts before the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. CONYBEARE: But I am asking facilities for bringing the facts forward.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member must be aware there is nothing to prevent his laying his facts before the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. CONYBEARE: I will repeat my question another day.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: Is it not a fact that the rule was not enforced until a suit of clothes was taken into prison to Mr. W. O'Brien?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know whether that statement of the date is accurate.

Mr. Conybeare

MR. P. O'BRIEN: I was in prison at the time, and I know it to be the fact.

CLERKS IN THE CUSTOMS.

MR. P. M'DONALD (Sligo, N.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether an examination for clerkships in the Customs has been held since 1877; and when it is expected the next examination for that Department will be held in Ireland?

*MR. GOSCHEN: Examinations for outport clerkships, the only special examinations for clerkships, that are held for the Customs Service, were held in August, 1880, and in April, 1886. Fresh appointments to such offices are not at present required, and it is not probable that any examination will be held for some time.

ALLEGED POLICE "SHADOWING" AT ARKLOW.

MR. P. J. O'BRIEN (Tipperary, N.) (for Mr. J. REDMOND, Wexford, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that at the fair of Arklow on the 10th instant, two respectable men, named Peter M'Carthy and Henry Birthwistle, were shadowed by Constable Johnson throughout the whole day, and the constable on one occasion shoved against them and endeavoured to provoke an assault; whether John Millen, who was offering mats for sale, was also shadowed, and afterwards arrested; and whether he will state the crime of which these men were suspected?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Peter M'Carthy and John Millen were closely watched by the police at Arklow fair on the occasion mentioned. Both of them had previously been convicted of intimidation, and there was ground for supposing that they were at the fair for the purpose of boycotting. Millen was arrested under the Pedlars Act for hawking without a licence, a charge to which he pleaded guilty. It does not appear that Henry Birthwistle was watched, except for a few minutes when he was in company with M'Carthy.

MR. SEXTON: May I ask what is the rank of the officer in Ireland who is allowed to dictate the degree of shadowing that is to be practised by the police?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I should like notice of that question. It will be some superior officer.

MR. GILL: As this is a matter of importance, I should like to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman will state to the House in what manner this method of shadowing operates to prevent boycotting in Ireland, because it is not the fact—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That is a matter of argument.

MR. SEXTON: Having given instructions on this matter, has the right hon. Gentleman not informed himself of the rank and responsibility of the officer who dictates this shadowing?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think I am bound to keep in my mind the names of all the officers who give instructions in this matter. Perhaps the hon. Member will put a question on the subject on the Paper.

THE CASE OF JOHN MURPHY.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in reference to the case of John Murphy, an emergency man, charged at last Conna Petty Sessions (County Cork) with "discharging a revolver on the public road," whether the mitigated penalty of £2 10s. and costs imposed on him by Colonel Longbourne, R.M., was reduced still further by the authorities; and, if so, by whom it was reduced, and for what reason; are the authorities aware that this man was convicted of sheep stealing; and will inquiries be made in future before granting licences to carry revolvers or other firearms?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The proceedings in this case were at the suit of the Excise Authorities. I understand that a recommendation for a remission of the penalty has been made to them, but I am not aware of the result. It is not a fact that Murphy was convicted of sheep stealing. He was accused of that offence, but the charge was dismissed.

MARRIAGES IN MALTA.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is understood that mixed marriages that have taken place in Malta otherwise than in accordance with the rites of the Roman Catholic Church will, by the intended project of law, be declared valid only in cases where the ceremony has been performed by a clergyman of the Church of England; and whether the intention is to declare all such marriages in the past valid, whether the ceremony has been conducted by Church of England ministers or by ministers of other bodies?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: As regards the validation of past marriages in Malta, it is not intended to make any distinction between marriages celebrated by clergymen of the Church of England and those celebrated by ministers of other religious denominations.

EVICCTIONS ON THE OLPHERT ESTATE.

MR. DALTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the presence of the forces of the Crown have been applied for at the evictions of the remaining tenants on the Olphert estate, in the Falcarragh district; and whether he is aware that these tenants, like the tenants on the Swiney and Stewart estates, have been recipients of relief during the past 12 months of seed to crop their lands and of food for their families, and that when rendered homeless they will have no escape from starvation except the workhouse of the Dunfanaghy Union, of which the evicting landlord, Mr. Olphert, is chairman?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Protection has been applied for and granted in respect of the execution of eviction decrees in the case of certain tenants on the Olphert estate, where the Plan of Campaign is in operation. I am informed that these tenants have not been the recipients of relief for their families or of seed to crop their land in the last 12 months.

NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES.

MR. FLYNN (for Dr. TANNER): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the modus vivendi agreed upon by the French and British Governments will be enforced by the latter in the face of the refusal of the Newfoundland Legislature and people to sanction the arrangement?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The objections of the Newfoundland Legislature seem to be mainly founded on a mistaken notion that the modus vivendi tends to impair their rights, or to admit claims on the part of France hitherto not acknowledged. This is not the case, as all rights on both sides are expressly reserved. Some understanding as to the mode of procedure for this reason is absolutely necessary, and Her Majesty's Government must act upon that which has been arranged with the French Government. But Her Majesty's naval officers will endeavour to carry it into effect with all possible regard for the interests of the colony and of the individuals who may be affected. I may add that from recent telegraphic correspondence it would seem that the Joint Committee of both Houses of the Colonial Legislature, while protesting against the French claim to erect any lobster factory, were prepared to admit in practice the main provisions of the modus vivendi in deference to the wishes of Her Majesty's Government.

CATHOLIC PRISONERS IN DERRY GAOL.

MR. CONYBEARE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state for each of the months since September last the number of Catholic prisoners confined in Derry Gaol and the terms for which they have been imprisoned; whether any Catholic clergyman has, during that period, been permitted to visit such prisoners; has any Catholic service been conducted in the prison chapel during that period; and whether he still refuses to sanction the appointment by the Bishop of the Diocese to the prison chaplaincy of such clergyman as the Bishop may see fit to nominate?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I received notice of this question too late to obtain information. Perhaps the hon. Member will put the question down for tomorrow.

DERRY GAOL.

MR. HARRISON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether an official from the English Prison Department visited Derry Gaol in the autumn of 1889 with a view to professionally examining into its sanitary condition; if so, whether he is prepared to lay this officials' Report upon the Table of the House?

Sir J. Ferguson

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the hon. Member will put the question down for this day week, I shall be able to say whether or not I can lay the Report on the Table.

SCOTCH CROFTERS.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I beg to ask whether the Government are prepared to extend to crofters in Scotland the same facilities for becoming owners of their holdings as are proposed to be conferred on the tenants in Ireland under the Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill presently before the House?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The Government are not prepared to extend to crofters in Scotland similar provisions to those contained in the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Bill.

OFFENCES UNDER 38 AND 39 VIC., CAP. 86.

MR. CALDWELL: I beg to ask the Attorney General whether each of the sub-sections of Section 7 of the Act 38 and 39 Vic., cap. 86, constitute a separate offence under that section and are cumulative in their application, or whether each of said sub-sections are merely different modes which, singly or together, constitute the offence set forth in said section, liable to a penalty not exceeding £20 or three months' imprisonment?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): The question is one of abstract law; but, in my opinion, the sub-section constitutes a separate offence, for which a prosecution could be instituted.

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS BILL.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is the intention of the Treasury to contribute to industrial schools in the same manner and to the same extent as heretofore?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The passing of the Industrial Schools Bill now before Parliament may involve some re-adjustment of the rate of payment to these schools, but no such re-adjustment will be made without full notice to this House.

OFFENDERS AGAINST THE VACCINATION ACTS.

MR. CHANNING: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that William Cheney, of Rushden, who was sent to Northampton Gaol on 29th May for seven days in default of a fine for non-compliance with the Vaccination Acts, was compelled to work three hours a day on the treadmill in company with men convicted for thefts, to pick two pounds of oakum daily, and to use a plank bed, and was given as prison food black bread and water and skilly only; whether he is aware that Cheney was suffering from a weak leg owing to rheumatic fever, and that the oakum given him to pick tore his fingers, and was ordered to be removed by the head warder as unfit for punishment work; whether this scale of punishment and diet is permissible under the present law; whether he is aware that, in some similar cases, compensation has been recovered from Governors of gaols when an action for damages has been brought; and whether, if the treatment specified is legal, he will take steps, either by legislation or by representation to Prison Authorities, to mitigate the prison treatment of prisoners under the Vaccination Acts?

MR. MATTHEWS: W. Cheney was sentenced by the Magistrate to seven days' imprisonment with hard labour in default of payment of a fine and costs; and, under the warrant of commitment, he received the scale of punishment and the diet which are prescribed by the Prison Statutes and Rules. I am, however, advised that the Magistrate exceeded his powers in awarding hard labour under the Vaccination Acts, and I have requested the Treasury Solicitor to consider the matter of Cheney's complaint.

MR. CHANNING: Will the question of compensation be considered?

MR. PICTON: Since this is not the first case in which a misunderstanding has arisen about prisoners under the Vaccination Acts, will the right hon. Gentleman take steps to inform Magistrates all over the country that they cannot inflict hard labour in such cases.

VOL. CCCXLV. [THIRD SERIES.]

MR. MATTHEWS: I really think that the knowledge that the Vaccination Acts do not authorise hard labour is very general.

LOCAL TAXATION BILL.

MR. SUMMERS: I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is true, as stated in some newspapers, that the Government have expressed their willingness to appoint a Select Committee next year to inquire into the subject of compensation; and whether the Government will consider the advisability of withdrawing those clauses in the Local Taxation Bill which provides that payments may be made by the County Councils for the extinction of licences, and postpone the consideration of the subject until after the Select Committee has reported?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: A large section of the Government's supporters are desirous that a Committee should carefully examine the licensing question, and notably some proposals of the noble Lord the Member for Paddington. The Government are perfectly willing, if the House should desire it, to appoint a Committee for this purpose, and, as far as they are concerned, they will afford facilities for the inquiry. It is, however, quite impossible for the Government to postpone the consideration of the clauses referred to until the Report of such a Committee is issued. I can only say, in regard to the Bill before the House, that it does not refer to the question of compensation in the sense which I attach to the word. It rather gives power to Local Authorities, if they wish, and not otherwise, to enter into negotiations for the purchase of licences, and it does not—I say it with all respect to those who differ from me—touch the principle of compensation.

MR. MONRO'S RESIGNATION.

MR. CAUSTON: I beg to ask the Home Secretary if he will state, for the convenience of hon. Members, whether the Police Bill, which has been circulated among Members to-day, is in the same form as when it was submitted to the Chief Commissioner of Police?

MR. MATTHEWS: I do not think it is right for the hon. Member to inquire into all the different stages through which a Bill has passed; and, therefore, the only reply I can make is to decline to answer his question. I hope hon. Members will not think this is a laughing matter. It may, no doubt, be necessary for me, when the discussion to which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby referred comes on, to make a statement to the House, and to give information, as I am always happy to do, in reply to questions which may be legitimately asked, in regard to certain points and certain matters contained in the draft Bill which was first sent confidentially to the Chief Commissioner for his consideration. I do not think a question on this subject, put in a general form and without notice, ought to be answered.

SIR W. HARCOURT: If the rule which the right hon. Gentleman has just laid down is to be a general rule, I would ask him to consider whether in the letter which he read the other day in this House he did not use that Bill for the purpose of laying the blame on Mr. Monro, the Chief Commissioner, in reference to that Bill. [An hon. MEMBER: Order, order!] Who is calling me to order? The right hon. Gentleman the Minister for Agriculture has not yet been appointed Speaker of this House. [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. CHAPLIN: I never opened my mouth.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I would submit to the Home Secretary that an answer to the question which has been put to him is due to Mr. Monro.

MR. MATTHEWS: The answer which I gave to the House I certainly did not imagine to be unfavourable to Mr. Monro, inasmuch as I read entirely Mr. Monro's own letter. I hope I may, without committing an indiscretion, say that the Bill submitted to Mr. Monro was at least as favourable to the police as the Bill now on the Table of the House.

THE INDIAN COUNCILS BILL.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I would ask the First Lord of the Treasury—and if he is unable to answer now I would ask him to consider it with a view to giving an answer to-morrow—whether he can fix a date for taking the Indian Councils Bill, especially as I understand it was one of the matters the Prime Minister referred to the other day as of primary importance?

MR. J. MACLEAN: Would the Government consider the expediency of putting down this Bill as the first Order of the Day on a particular date, instead of relegating it to the fag-end of the evening, when provisions of importance cannot be adequately discussed?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have already said that I am fully aware of the importance of the measure to which the hon. Members refer. I fully realise its very great importance, but at the present moment it is impossible for me to name a date. I will include this subject in the statement I shall have to make to-morrow.

PUBLIC WORKS LOANS IN IRELAND.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Board of Works in Ireland, when applied to for a loan under the Public Works Loans (Tramways) (Ireland) Act by the Mitchelstown and Fermoy Railway Company, on 24th August, 1889, replied, under date of 27th August, 1889, asking for the nature of the security proposed; and whether, after having been informed of the nature of the said security, they wrote under date 10th September, 1889, saying they were precluded by a Treasury Minute from making such advances?

MR. JACKSON: I am informed that the reply of the Board of Works, dated 14th September, stated that "the Treasury have decided to make no further loans on security of shares."

MR. CLANCY: Are we distinctly to understand that up to the present date no grant has been sanctioned for any railway scheme in Donegal under the Light Railways Act of last year?

MR. JACKSON: If the hon. Member's question means whether any formal assent of the Treasury has been given, my answer is in the negative.

MR. CLANCY: Are the West Donegal Railway Company justified in announcing to the public that on the 26th of June next, at a special meeting of the Company, the confirmation will be proposed of an agreement between them and the Treasury for the construction of a light railway from Donegal to Killybeg?

MR. JACKSON: There is nothing inconsistent in that announcement with what I have stated. I think the railway company are taking a very sanguine view in assuming that the negotiations will be successful.

MR. CLANCY: Is this the Barton—Price scheme?

MR. JACKSON: I think my answer is in the affirmative.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he can now say whether the Government intend to ask the House to pass the Land Purchase Bill this year; and what proposal, if any, they will make in regard to the business of the House?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have every reason to believe that I shall be in a position to-morrow to make a statement to the House relative to the present condition of public business, and to give notice of proposals for the further facilitation of that business. In that statement will be included the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Bill, and therefore I must ask the hon. Gentleman to defer his question till to-morrow.

SIR W. HARCOURT: What day will be fixed for the discussion of the question of the condition of the Metropolitan Police? The right hon. Gentleman promised to fix a day, and I submit that that day cannot be too early. Further, I would ask whether the correspondence will be laid upon the Table at once with reference to the resignation of Mr. Monro? Of course, the correspondence read by the Home Secretary will be laid, but I refer to further correspondence.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It would be more convenient that I should answer the question to-morrow in connection with the other statement that I may have to make.

MR. CAINE: I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is intended to take the Local Taxation Bill from day to day throughout this week?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I hope so, Sir.

MR. BUCHANAN: May I ask when the Government Bill relating to police superannuation in Scotland will be introduced, and whether it will be in the hands of hon. Members before the clause in the Local Taxation Bill comes on for consideration?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It is in course of preparation, but I am not able to state the exact day on which it will be introduced.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

LOCAL TAXATION (CUSTOMS AND EXCISE) DUTIES BILL.—(No. 244.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

Clause 1.

*(5.56.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): With reference to the question which just now was asked by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, I have to say that if it should meet with the assent of the House, and not otherwise, the Government think there would be an advantage, after we have finished Clause 1, in postponing Clauses 2, 3, and 4. Clause 2 deals with Scotland; Clause 3 with Ireland; and Clause 4 with superannuation. Then Clause 5 deals with the extinction of licences in England. It seems to me, therefore, that it will be an advantage if we proceed to further consider the matter as it has been set out in Clause 5. I understand it is desired that the Bill for the superannuation of the police in Scotland should be in the hands of Members before Clause 2 is discussed. As I have already said, the proposed arrangement will only be made with the concurrence of the House generally.

(5.57.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): If the right hon. Gentleman got up to propose the postponement of all the clauses it would be a very reasonable proposal, especially after the announcement we have heard about the Committee, because, whatever the First Lord of the Treasury may say, we know, and everybody knows, that no Gentleman on those Benches ever argued this Bill except upon the principle of compensation. To say, therefore, that compensation has nothing to do with the Bill is absurd. Therefore, if the whole subject of compensation is one which demands a Committee, the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman ought to have been to postpone this clause and Clause 5. If, instead of that, the Government intend to force on this Bill, they ought to take it in its regular course.

*(5.58.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): Under these circumstances, we shall adopt the recommendation of the right hon. Gentleman and take the Bill in its regular course.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): If I understand the recommendation of my right hon. Friend near me, it is not that we should proceed with the Bill as it stands, but that, in consequence of the intimation given by Her Majesty's Government as to inquiring into compensation at a future date, we should postpone the legislation as to compensation until we have inquired. That is the recommendation we should be inclined to make.

*(5.59.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman and his friends as to whether there is not a marked difference between a general inquiry into the licensing question, including the question of compensation, and the proposals in this Bill. If nothing is to be done in the way of diminishing the temptation to intemperance until we have inquired into this great licensing question and the House has come to an agreement upon it, then I think the right hon. Gentleman and his friends will assume a great responsibility in postponing for so long a period a reform in which we desire to make some advance.

(6.0.) MR. CAINE (Barrow-in-Furness): I move to report Progress. The whole of the circumstances surrounding this Bill appear to be entirely changed. We now have information that the Government intend to bring forward proposals—

*(6.0.) MR. W. H. SMITH: What I stated was in answer to a question. Intimation had come from various quarters of the House that it was desirable that an inquiry should take place, and I said that the Government would be willing if the House wished it. We do not want it.

(6.1.) MR. CAINE: I am aware of the words of the right hon. Gentleman, but there is absolutely no difference between a Motion brought forward by the Front Bench in favour of a Select Committee to inquire into any particular question and such a Motion brought forward by one of their supporters to whom the Government gives facilities. We have a right to know a good deal more than the right hon. Gentleman has told us so far. The First Lord of the Treasury states that he is willing to give facilities for the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the whole question, and yet with that before us, and the probability of such a Committee being appointed next Session, the Government propose to go on with the Bill dealing with what a large number of hon. Members and a large number of the general public believe to lie at the basis of any reform of the Licensing Laws. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) has said, it is ridiculous to tell us that compensation is not discussed under this Bill. We are not only now told that this Select Committee is to be appointed, but we are also told that the Government wish to suspend certain clauses of the Bill. Do they think that we are going to tamely submit to Clause 1 being passed by the Committee while the other clauses are hung up in the meantime?

*MR. RITCHIE: We are not going to do that. It is merely with a view to facilitate business.

MR. CAINE: I hope some detailed information will be given to us as to what the intentions of the Government really are. Who is to bring forward this Motion for a Select Committee? When are the Government to give facilities for its discussion—to-day, to-morrow, or when? because if this House appoints this Committee—

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I said next Session, and I do not know who may bring it forward seven months hence.

MR. CAINE: I do not wish to prolong the Debate. I shall certainly divide the House on my Motion unless some satisfactory explanation is given.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Caine.)

(6.3.) SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): I rise to support the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Barrow (Mr. Caine.) It must be evident to the Committee that we stand in a totally different position to-day from what we were in before. A most remarkable statement has been made. The first intimation given of this new policy was made at a meeting of Dissident Liberals, presided over by the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale (The Marquess of Hartington). The noble Marquess stated that he "understood from the Government that they were willing next year to appoint a Select Committee to consider the whole of the compensation question." I hope that the noble Marquess will get up and state to the Committee how he got this information from the Government. Why have not the Government been straightforward and come to the House with this information? The position is a most astounding one for the Government to be placed in. Here is a matter that is exciting more interest in the political world than has any matter in the past three years at least, and all we are told is that the Government themselves want more information. Why do they grant a Committee? No one has asked for one. We have our opinion: we do not want a Committee. Apparently this Bill is to proceed, although the Government say that more information is desired by somebody. There never was such a case of pronouncing sentence first and having the trial afterwards. It appears to me to be positively indecent. In my Parliamentary experience I have never known such an outrage, and I hope that the Committee will show its regard for honour and good sense by carrying the Motion.

(6.6.) THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON (Lancashire, N.E., Rossendale): I rise to say at once that I do not admit the accuracy of the report of the observations I made at the meeting the other day.

SIR W. LAWSON: I took the words verbatim from the Times.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: My hon. Friend will see that no report has appeared in any paper which purported to be a verbatim report. I do not think it likely that I made use of the words that I was informed by the Government that it was intended to appoint a Select Committee. When my hon. Friend asks what is the source of my information, I cannot at this moment undertake to tell him with any accuracy. The fact is that I have heard for a long time discussion on the subject of the appointment of such a Committee—in fact, ever since the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) introduced his Bill—I have heard in all quarters of the House that it was a question of referring the proposals of the noble Lord to a Committee for consideration. Of course, it is quite possible that I might have had discussion with members of the Government, and I certainly never understood that they were adverse to the proposal of a Committee. But I had no authority from the Government at that time to state that they had decided to appoint such a Committee. I do not think, therefore, that the expression was one that I am likely to have used.

*(6.8.) MR. RITCHIE: There is no doubt whatever that the proposition with reference to a Committee emanated from the noble Lord the Member for Paddington. It has been on more than one occasion mentioned as being desirable. The position of the Government in the matter is this—that if there is a desire to investigate the question of compensation, and how it ought to be applied, they do not see that it would be their duty to negative such a proposal. With reference to what the hon. Baronet the Member for Cokermonth said as to the effect that such an announcement has on the position of the Government with regard to this Bill, I would admit that he had some ground for his remark if the Government had alleged that in any real sense their proposals were a settlement of the licensing question. As a matter of fact, the Government have again and again said that they regard the ultimate settlement of this question as only possible upon the lines of handing over the Licensing Authority to County Councils. It will be obvious that if such a proposal were made the whole question involved by compensation would have to be considered. But, so far as this Bill is concerned, the Government have always said that, pending the settlement of the question, they desire that some steps should be taken with the view of meeting the wishes of the Temperance Party by diminishing the opportunities for obtaining drink. We have denied that compensation, as it is understood, is within the four corners of this Bill, or that anything in this Bill will fetter the action of Parliament, or of a Committee, when the whole question comes to be considered.

(6.10.) SIR W. HARCOURT: The right hon. Gentleman has only repeated what he has said over and over again in the course of the discussion on this Bill, but that is not the question. We want to know how we stand with reference to this Committee. The First Lord of the Treasury and the noble Marquess have assumed an air of complete innocence with regard to the Committee, but that is not the way it was presented to mankind two days ago. The fact is that the Government were in a great difficulty. They wanted a majority. The Liberal Unionists were in a difficulty as to how they were going to vote, and the noble Marquess went down to the meeting to induce a number of Members of Parliament and the country to be satisfied with this Bill by assuring them that the Government were going to appoint a Committee. All the Government newspapers said:—"Let us pass this Bill, because we are going to have a Committee on compensation, which will settle the whole thing." It was felt that as the noble Lord the Member for Rosendale had pledged the Government to a Committee, all the Liberal Unionists might safely vote with the Government on the Bill. The First Lord of the Treasury now gets up, and, with an air of supreme innocence, says that it is possible that seven months hence somebody may propose a Committee, and that is a substitute for the assurance of the noble Marquess. You cannot separate the noble Marquess and the Leader of the House, for they are carrying on together this business of purchasing public houses. The signature of the one is the signature of the other, and when the name of one is seen at the back of a Bill you know perfectly well that the other will be obliged to take it up. This Committee on compensation has been used as an argument for supporting the Bill. Either the Government, by themselves or their agents, are going to propose this Committee on compensation, or they are not. If they are going to do so it is a valid argument to report Progress; if they are not, then all the pretences that have been held forth to Members of the House on the matter are a mere delusion. We wish to know whether this Committee is a real thing or a sham.

*(6.14.) MR. W. H. SMITH: The right hon. Gentleman seems to know more about this Committee than the noble Lord the Member for Rosendale, or than I do myself. He says that it is a device by which votes are to be got for this Bill. I entirely deny anything of the kind, and surely the word of the noble Lord is sufficient when he says that he was not speaking for the Government. The noble Lord was aware of the fact—and stated how he became aware of the fact—that many hon. Gentlemen in this House, especially the noble Lord the Member for Paddington, were desirous that a Committee should be appointed to consider the whole question of licensing. Now, that matter is one which is entirely independent of the Bill which is now before the House. No recommendation has been, or will be, made to hon. Gentlemen to vote for this Bill in consequence of that Committee. We are not responsible, nor at any time have we indicated an intention to make a proposal for such a Committee. All that we have said is that, so far as we are concerned, we believe that the examination of the question would be advantageous; we do not bind ourselves to a Committee, or to any reference to a Committee. We do not ask the House to vote for this Bill with reference to any recommendation in any way for a possible Committee, but we ask the House to dispose of the business of this Session before it enters into the consideration of what the business of next Session will be.

(6.17.) MR. ROWNTREE (Scarborough): The matter gets more perplexing the further we proceed. The Committee have a right to ask whether the announcement made at the meeting the other night was not made with some view of influencing votes.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I said distinctly not. [HON. MEMBERS: How do you know.]

MR. ROWNTREE: I think the interposition of the right hon. Gentleman is very interesting; but what I ask is whether, at a meeting which took place on Friday, this statement was not made with a view of influencing votes one way or the other, in view of the Division which was to take place the same night. Secondly, I have to ask whether the report which was published, and which has been quoted, was not an official report issued by the Whips of the Party. But, quite apart from these questions, I wish to express the belief that it will be generally thought that temperance reformers in the country will be put in a very unfair position by the proceedings which have taken place if these clauses which they strongly object to are now going to be forced into law. It has been very properly stated by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board that the proposals of the Government are no settlement of the temperance question. Yes, but there is something far more important than that. These proposals are, and have been, stated definitely by Ministers of the Crown to be a settlement of the principle of compensation. [Cries of "No, no."] Principal supporters of Her Majesty's Ministry have asserted that over and over again. The Times has asserted it, and Ministers have asserted it. What did the President of the Board of Trade say at Bristol? The right hon. Gentleman said—

"Brewers and publicans may surely not feel dissatisfied with the important recognition of the principle of compensation for licences taken away without any default of the holder."

And that was said just on the eve of a bye election, just as the statement was made by the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale on the eve of an important Division. Furthermore, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland has spoken of this Bill as involving the question of compensation, and then in the speeches the President of the Local Government Board has made in the House he has twice quoted in support of the Bill Gentlemen who specially stated that they supported the measure because it involves the question of compensation. I maintain that the temperance reformers will be put in a most unfair position if the Government now attempt to assume that the Bill does not involve the question of compensation; indeed, such an announcement will only increase the heat and feeling of indignation with which the Bill is regarded in the country.

*(6.21.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The hon. Gentleman shifted his language as he went along. In the first place, he said the Government stated that the Bill settled the question of compensation, and afterwards he said they held that the question of compensation was involved in the proposals. I will tell the Committee precisely how I regard the matter. We have not considered our proposal as settling the question of compensation, but right hon. Gentlemen opposite, and a large party out of doors, have read into this Bill that which is not there, and they have argued the whole time upon a principle which we have not admitted to be in our Bill at all. I have endeavoured to show, in replying to the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition the other day, that they themselves are committed to the principle of vested rights and a legislative title. But I quoted the opinions of the right hon. Gentlemen opposite with regard to compensation. We replied to their various arguments, but the particular proposal which we make is entirely apart from the principle of compensation. We are simply dealing with the extinction of licences as carried out in the same manner as that in which Municipal Corporations deal with the extinction of licences where they have purchased licensed houses for street improvements or other purposes. I am sorry to have got involved in any arguments of this nature, but this is the main point of misrepresentation. It is said that we recognise a vested interest for the first time by this Bill. But if it exists, we see that it has received recognition from Municipal Corporations, who, in the making of street improvements, have not waited until the end of the year, when the licence expired, and then told the Magistrates they were not going to require a licence in future, but have spent public money in acquiring the licence. They have spent the rates in buying these rights, because they knew that the community and the law would not have allowed them to do otherwise. Hon. Members must have forgot that this power granted to Municipal Corporations to buy up public houses must have received legislative sanction, because the provisions under which they bought must have been included in the improvement schemes. We, therefore, say that this Bill does not settle the question of compensation; it acts upon the principle of the purchase of public houses, but lies outside the general question of licensing. There is a vast multitude of questions connected with licensing which lie outside this Bill, and we thought that in the various parts of the House there was a desire that so difficult a question should be submitted to inquiry. We do not want any further information for the purposes of this Bill, and, therefore, there is no necessity to postpone the consideration of this Bill to another Session. But if it is the desire generally of the House we feel that much light might be thrown on the various phases of a subject which is so extremely complicated. I repeat, however, that this Bill may and ought to proceed, and, if I may say so without offence to any hon. Members, will proceed quite apart from any question of this Committee.

(6.28.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): Right hon. Gentlemen opposite have been disposed to deny that this Bill embodies the principle of compensation, and to complain of us on this side of the House, who have contended that it does. Now, I have contended and argue still that in saying that it adopts the principle of compensation we are adopting the mildest term by which it is possible to describe this payment of public money. Possibly the right hon. Gentlemen the First Lord of the Treasury, who disclaims compensation, agrees with me that "the Public House Endowment Bill" is the true name that ought to be attached to the Bill, constitutes its true title, and alone describes its effects. When we are compelled to use the word compensation for Parliamentary and public purposes we mean payment out of taxation to be given to the owners of houses which have received annual licences as a condition of the non-renewal of those licences. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has to-night argued that, setting aside the case of criminal misconduct, it would be monstrous to take away any licence without a guarantee for payment in return for it. That is what we mean by compensation. This is a Bill for compensation in this sense. We are not alone in this opinion, for a colleague of the right hon. Gentleman thinks with us. Sir M. Hicks Beach has stated, in addressing his constituents, "The brewer and the publican may surely not feel dissatisfied." By-the-by, on another point that right hon. Gentleman entirely differs as to the object of this Bill from the other occupants of the Government Bench. They said that the object of this Bill was not at all to satisfy the brewer and the publican, but that the object was to satisfy the Temperance Party. Of course we are bound to believe it. But then it is a very awkward circumstance for us, credulous and unsophisticated as we are, that a Cabinet Minister goes to his constituents and blows this out of the water, and says—

"The brewer and the publican may surely not feel dissatisfied at the important recognition of the principle of compensation for licences taken away without any default on the part of the holder."

After that the colleagues of the right hon. Gentleman, fortunately for them in his momentary absence, get up and deny there is any compensation in this Bill. I will not enter into that question, as I wish to keep as strictly as I can to the Motion of my hon. Friend. He moves that we should report Progress, because we are not in condition to proceed with the discussion of enactments bearing on the question of withdrawal of licences, not for compensation, but only for payment of public money. That is his contention, and that is the contention I wish to support. The principal ground on which my hon. Friend bases his contention is that we have been told that a Committee is going to be appointed. I must frankly own the view which I, for one, cannot help taking, and which I believe is taken by not far short of 300 Members of this House, that the proposal of a Committee we look upon as an expedient simply and solely for relieving the Government from a difficulty. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury sees no connection whatever between the Committee and relieving the Government from a difficulty. Well, Sir, I place the most implicit belief on everything said by the right hon. Gentleman, even when that belief compels me to raise questions which I would rather not raise as to the acuteness of the intelligence and perception of the right hon. Gentleman. I wonder whether the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale shares what I will venture to call the blindness of the First Lord of the Treasury, and sees no connection between the suggestion of a Committee so benevolently made and the relief of the Government from a difficulty. However, that is not the main question, what the Government see or do not see, or what we see or do not see. We are at present strongly persuaded of the truth of this idea I have mentioned, and if we are wrong, then I hope you will remove it from our minds, that we may forget it. We are strongly persuaded of the truth of the view I have expressed, but, apart from that, the ground of the Motion now made is clear and strong. A question is raised about a Committee. At one time it appears to be a solid form before us, a real substantial thing; at other times it assumes a cloudy shape, and is in danger of vanishing into the thinnest air. But whatever it be, we have a right to know. Is there to be a committee or is there not? The right hon. Gentleman has said three things. He has disclaimed the intention of the Government to have a Committee, but he sailed very near the wind. He said that in important quarters of the House there was a great desire for a Committee. As I am acquainted with the sentiments of hon. Members in some degree from representations made to me, I can only say that those with whom I have the honour to act, and those who follow the lead of the hon. Member for Cork, do not entertain the desire stated by the right hon. Gentleman; but that, I suppose, is because they are not at all important quarters of the House. It is from my noble Friend the Member for Rossendale, backed by the apparently single voice of the noble Lord the Member for Paddington. My noble Friend is most anxious for a Committee, and the Government say that they pay deference to those important quarters of the House, and that if it is pressed for, they will support or will not oppose a Committee.

*MR. RITCHIE: If it is the general desire of the House.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I do not know what means of ascertaining the desire of the House the right hon. Gentleman has in contemplation. The First Lord of the Treasury added two other things. He said they would give facilities for discussing it—that is a pretty clear indication of the intentions of the Government—and he said, “We think the inquiry would be advantageous.” That is going uncommonly near the point, and leaves very little standing ground indeed for those who say the Government do not ask for the appointment of this Committee. No one, I think, can say that this Bill will not completely alter the position of the Committee if it is to be appointed. Is there any man who will rise on the other side of the House, and say that the Committee sitting after this Bill has passed would be in exactly the same position as if it sat before this Bill passed? If there is to be a Committee, that Committee ought to come to the question with a free hand. Appoint your Committee at once if you like. Why not; if the question is of this vital consequence, it is much better that we should appoint a Committee than waste the time of the Government in this most unnecessary, most unhappy, most gratuitous contention sprung upon us, after we had passed the middle of the Session, without notice in the Queen’s Speech, and totally contrary to our expectations. It is one thing for a Committee to approach this question now, when no one can quote precedent or authority for saying that Parliament has given countenance to the doctrine denying the principle that licences can be taken away without compensation. You are now calling upon us to reverse that principle, and provide that no licences shall fail to be renewed apart from the default of the holder, except by payment out of the public money provided under the authority of Parliament. The two questions are vitally, absolutely, and entirely different. If you pass this Bill and then bring the Committee to consider it, they approach it with tied hands. In point of fact the principle will have been laid down which, in our opinion, decides the whole matter. But at any rate, whether that be right or wrong, can you deny that the position and the conditions under which the Committee will approach the question, must, even according to your point of view, be very materially affected by the passing of this Bill? If there is going to be an inquiry, we have a right to ask that the conditions of that inquiry shall be maintained identically as they now are, and that the freedom of the Committee shall be preserved to it, and preserved intact. On that ground we say it is contrary to sense, to prudence, to public interest, and to every principle involved in the case that we should proceed with those portions of the Bill which relate to licences while the question of the Committee is hanging over our heads undecided.

(6.40.) SIR W. LAWSON: I think we ought to have some explanation from the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale, who made this statement, as to why it was made and with what object. The proceedings of the Committee, we are told, can have no effect upon anything; but I must agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian that our hands will be tied if this clause is passed. We shall become, in fact, a "tied" House. It is, I think, rather humiliating to confess surprise at anything in this House; but I was a little surprised by the Chancellor of the Exchequer getting up and trying to persuade us there is no compensation in the Bill. Now I will read a short sentence from a speech of his own, and the Committee will then understand whether this Bill embodies the principle of compensation or not. In his Budget speech, when the policy was first introduced to the House upon which this Bill is founded, the right hon. Gentleman used these words—

"If the brewers contend that it is out of their pockets and not out of the pockets of consumers this extra 6d. is paid, I respectfully point out to them that in our proposals we include the suggestion of a sum equal, indeed, to their contribution for diminishing the number of existing licences, a process in which I think they, as brewers, will find much compensation and consolation."

I do not know why the right hon. Gentleman shakes his head. I read that in a pamphlet which purported to be a report of the right hon. Gentleman's speech on the Budget, and the pamphlet was sent me, I presume, by his direction; he said he was going to provide a process by which he would give brewers much compensation and consolation. It is, then, I submit too late to tell the Committee there is no compensation in the Bill. No, Sir; the Committee knows how these things are managed, all this talk about purchasing houses for the public improvement. When a Tory is addressing a respectable meeting in which the Temperance Party is represented, he says this is merely giving to Local Authorities the power to improve their locality by purchasing unnecessary licences; but when he attends a really good Tory meeting of publicans and Primrose dames then he says it is "compensation." But the man who tries to ride two horses frequently comes to grief, and the right hon. Gentleman, in trying to ride the temperance horse and the publican horse, will find he cannot make smooth progress and retain his seat for long.

(6.45.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): As a Scotch Member, I enter my protest against the statement made to us. It is idle to say we are prepared to discuss this question now in the same condition in which we were before the important announcement was made to us in reference to the appointment of this Committee. We in Scotland have given evidence as to our feeling in respect to the compensation clauses of this Bill, we stand in a different position to others. The clauses referring to Scotland have still to come before the Committee, and we ought to be informed before we enter upon them what our position is. I desire also to enter my protest against the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in regard to the action of Licensing Authorities in Scotland, on the question of compensation. The right hon. Gentleman said that Corporations gave compensation when they took public houses for public improvements, but he knows perfectly well that Licensing Authorities have no power whatever in regard to city improvements. Houses are taken under the Lands Clauses Act, and there is no reference to the Magistrates, who have no right to interfere, and the Licensing Authorities consequently have nothing whatever to do with compensation in in such cases when public houses are taken. The right hon. Gentleman can not deny that the number of "on" licenses in Scotland have been largely reduced at the discretion of the Magistrates without any compensation whatever, and times without number the Magistrates have declared that they cannot recognise any private transactions with regard to licences, and have claimed the right to refuse the renewal of any licence according to their discretion and their view of the altered circumstances in connection with the application. Licences may thus be refused in sufficient numbers without any compensation whatever, and, therefore, we have a right, if there is to be a Committee appointed, to submit the evidence from Scotland, and this, I am convinced, will clearly demonstrate there is no cause for compensation and for these clauses, so objectionable to the whole of the Liberal Scotch Members.

(6.47.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): The right hon. Gentleman, before any question was put from the Chair, made his statement as to a Committee and the postponement of Clauses 2, 3, and 4. Let me remind the Committee of what was done upon the Budget Bill. When we came to consider it the Government made a similar proposal, and we assented to it. When the Second Reading of this Bill came on we asked that the taxation clauses of the Budget Bill should be postponed, but the Government refused, on the ground that they were necessary and essential. Yet, now they declare their willingness to postpone these Clauses 2, 3, and 4 indefinitely. This is an additional reason why we should know exactly what the Government mean, and where they stand. The First Lord says really it does not matter whether this Committee is appointed or not, and the noble Lord, in his innocent way, said he did not speak at Devonshire House on any sufficient information, he simply threw out the suggestion. Now, let me point out that whenever the Government are in a difficulty they appoint a Committee. When the difficulty arose as to the financial relations between England and Ireland, they said, "We will give you a Committee." Again, when the point arose as to the bonding of spirits, and the favour shown to German spirits, then a Committee was promised. Then, for the third time, when the Liberal Unionists are in a difficulty the noble Lord is instructed to go down to Devonshire House and make a statement on behalf of the other "tied" house, the Carlton Club. It is well understood that Devonshire House is a "tied" house in this matter.

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not see the relevancy of these observations to the Motion before the Committee.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Doubtless, Sir, I was misled by speakers who have preceded me, and I thought I was only bettering their instruction. When the hon. Baronet was allowed to ask a question of the noble Lord I did humbly predicate in my mind that a little more probing would not be more disorderly than the catechism which was allowed. The noble Lord says he had no authority for his suggestion beyond his knowledge that a general feeling prevailed in favour of the appointment of such a Committee. Now, I take leave to say it is absolutely essential, from the point of view of Irish Members, to know exactly where the Government stand. The first thing we noticed when the question of postponement arose was that the Irish Secretary departed from the House when I was about to ask him, if I could have found the opportunity, what was the object of the postponement of the Irish clauses. We have not yet spoken in Committee upon this Bill at all.

THE CHAIRMAN: That is not relevant to the question before the Committee now. There is a Motion to report Progress, on the ground that steps are going to be taken hereafter which will greatly affect further discussion.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Yes, Sir; and I am endeavouring humbly to add a further argument to reinforce the strength of the position in favour of reporting Progress. My anxiety is to know upon what ground the Government wish to postpone the Irish clauses. Here I am glad to see the apparition of the Chief Secretary. My anxiety is germane to the question before us. The Government have expressed their willingness to postpone Clauses 2, 3, and 4. Irish Members have not taken part in the discussions on this Bill, and I now intervene, for the first time on the part of Irish Members, to ask why it is the Government desire to, or are willing to, postpone the Irish clauses. The President of the Local Government Board made a distinct offer to postpone Clauses 2, 3, and 4, which offer, after the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, the First Lord withdrew. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby spoke for one important section of Members on this side; but we want to know what is the possible connection between Irish Customs and Excise and the business of police superannuation? We have police superannuation, and we are puzzled, and suspicious that the Government have something in their minds as to the distribution of the Irish Excise Duty. It may be there is a valid solid reason for postponing the Irish clauses, but let us know that reason. We have what the Chief Secretary calls "reasonable suspicion," but we have no proof, no knowledge of the Government position; and so I think we are justified in supporting the Motion to report Progress.

(6.59.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): We ought to have some more clear understanding with respect to the appointment of this Committee. I do not see the slightest use of discussing with the Government whether compensation is in the Bill or not, we might as well discuss with reasonable human beings whether the sun shines in the heavens or not. With regard to this Committee, which is the basis of this demand to report progress, we have no clear understanding. The First Lord of the Treasury gets up and waives the matter away, saying there was some vague idea that somebody wanted a Committee, that he really did not know quite who, and that he had had no sort of communication with the noble Lord. But what did the noble Lord (Lord Hartington) say? He said it was quite possible he had discussed the matter with the First Lord of the Treasury, and we are asked to believe in a vague way that the proposal emanates from the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill). It is unfortunate that the noble Lord the Member for Paddington, because he happens to be absent from this House, should have all the responsibility thrown upon him. I take leave to believe that the noble Lord the Member for Paddington is not responsible for this. It is absurd to suppose that the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale when he called together his Party at their official meeting place, to consult with them as to a matter on which the immediate supporters of the Government were deserting them, and to bring the pressure of the Liberal Unionists to bear upon the unfortunate Tories who were for a moment getting up their courage and trying to rebel—it is a little too strong for us to be told that the noble Lord, a cautious man, as we are always told, should actually make this proposal because he had heard a vague remark that possibly the noble Lord the Member for Paddington wanted a Committee. I see the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale is not here. I see the First Lord of the Treasury is not here. Where are they now? What monstrosity are they confederating together? What proposal is being made by the noble Lord to the First Lord of the Treasury? Is it something else that the noble Lord the Member for Paddington wants, and the First Lord of the Treasury is to be induced to agree to? We are told by the First Lord of the Treasury that the Government would consent to the Committee, and give a date for it if the House desired it. Now, "the House" is a very vague term. What does it mean? Is it to be a universal assent? Is it to be the assent of 300 Members on this side, or of the Liberal Unionists and Conservatives themselves? My impression is that the Conservatives may assent to it, but they will not desire it. They would have been delighted if this question had not been raised. They have to thank the Chancellor of the Exchequer for it, and, from all we understand, they are not thanking him very ardently for what he has done. Is it the Liberal Unionists who are desirous of having the Committee appointed? Are we to understand that the proposal is to be forced upon the House, with, very possibly, the Closure enforced, after which we will have to vote yea or nay? The reason why my hon. Friend the Member for Barrow moved this was that he, like many of us, is anxious to save the time of the House. ["Oh!"] Yes; what the Government have been doing is this: they have been digging a pit for themselves; they are at the bottom of that pit, and we have been throwing a rope to them, and trying to get them out of it. They turn and sneer upon us, but I will give the Government a piece of advice. Withdraw this Bill, and appoint a Committee. Do not force any general scheme at this time of the Session. Possibly, when you move the Committee, I may oppose it altogether. I do not pledge myself to support anything brought in by Her Majesty's present advisers. Now you have got a Committee proposed, put aside this Bill, and bring it forward again after the Committee has sat, next Session. What you are doing at present is really putting the cart before the horse. You want to pass a Bill first, and then ask a Committee to discuss its principles. If you do not want to waste the time of the country, appoint your Committee, let it Report, and then bring in your Bill next year.

(7.7.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): Before we go to a Division, I wish to make one observation. I hope that, whether or not it is the intention to withdraw all three clauses, we shall not adhere to Clause 2. We are not in a position to discuss Clause 2 in the absence of the clauses relating to compensation.

(7.8.) MR. JACOB BRIGHT (Manchester, S.W.): The Committee is in an extraordinary position. So far as I understand, the great majority of this Committee are in favour of inquiry first and legislation afterwards. I say the great majority, because I understand the followers of the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale are in favour of a Committee. But the Government is in a distinct minority on this question, and if the House voted according to the opinions which have been expressed, it is quite clear that we should relieve the Government of a great difficulty.

(7.10.) MR. T. M. HEALY: If the right hon. Gentleman wishes to avoid a second Motion to report Progress, he will answer the question which I put, as to why the Irish Clause of this Bill is postponed.

(7.9.) MR. RITCHIE: There may be some discussion in connection with the Scotch Clause, and also in connection with the English Superannuation Clause, and it was felt better, in the interests of business, that we should complete the discussion on the application of the money to the acquisition of licences, by going on to Clause 5, which provides the machinery for England. In that way we would complete the discussion. There is no other reason for postponing the Irish Clause.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Are we to understand that if the Irish Members desire to postpone Clause 3, that course will be agreed to?

*MR. RITCHIE: I say at once, if that were generally wished by the hon. Members for whom the hon. and learned Gentleman speaks, the Government would be prepared to accept that course.

(7.11.) MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): As there is hardly a Member of the House who will not feel his position altered by the statement that is to be made to-morrow by the Leader of the House, I desire to support the Motion to report Progress. We want an opportunity to resent the insinuation made by the right hon. Gentleman, that we are less desirous to diminish the temptations to drunkenness than are the hon. Gentlemen who follow him. If the Government will suspend this Bill, and re-consider their position, and then put before us proposals really directed to the diminution of the temptations to drunkenness, I have no hesitation in saying they will be amply supported on this side of the House. If the Government insist on defeating this Motion of the hon. Member for Barrow, I trust, at any rate, they will consent to postpone not only Clauses 2, 3, and 4, but 5, 6, and 7; and then we shall come to the clause which provides for the renewal of licences. That clause, to my mind, is the only clause in the Bill which tends to diminish the temptations to drunkenness, and that clause I promise the Government, will have, on this side of the House, thorough and fair consideration.

(7.14.) MR. BOLITHO (Cornwall, St. Ives): I desire to say one word, and one word only. I am not ashamed to say that, hitherto, I have not given a vote as regards this measure; nor am I ashamed to say, also, that I could not find it in my conscience to support the principles of this Bill. Without at all going into the question of the Amendment put on the Paper by the hon. Member for Huddersfield, I may say that I have an Amendment on the Paper in very similar terms. Feeling, as I do, not only that a very large number of Members on this side of the House, but also on the other, desire to see this question settled on what I call a proper fair and legitimate basis, I have no alternative but to support the Motion of the hon. Member for Barrow.

(7.16.) CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): Before the Committee proceeds to a Division, I wish to draw the attention of the Committee to the fact that nobody, either on the Front Bench or any of the Benches opposite, has answered the challenge of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, that the Committee would not be in the same position, in entering upon this question, if the Bill is passed. That is the distinct challenge that has been thrown down, and nobody has had the pluck or manliness to take it up, because nobody can take it up. Nobody can assert that the Committee would be in the same position if the Bill is passed. I hope hon. Gentlemen who are going to vote will bear in mind that the challenge has been fairly thrown down, and that no one has had the courage to take it up.

(7.17.) MR. H. S. WRIGHT (Nottingham, S.): I rise to reply to the challenge of the hon. Member (Captain Verney), who has just said that no one on this side of the House has disputed the assertion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, that the position of the compensation question will be changed by the passing of this Bill. I venture to deny that it will be practically altered, for the following reason: namely, that the Bill does not create any new vested interest, but simply affirms an unalterable principle of justice in regard to this matter. That principle has been acted on in the past, and was very forcibly laid down by the right hon. Gentleman himself 10 years ago; and I venture to hope that the right hon. Gentleman will adhere to that principle whenever the question of compensation, in some form or other, comes before the House and the country in some future comprehensive licensing measure, or in case it should now be referred to a Select Committee.

MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg): I think we ought not to go on with this measure until there has been an inquiry. There is certainly something sufficiently interesting to justify inquiry by the Committee. I, for one, being of an inquiring turn of mind, am very anxious to have some sort of inquiry before we go on with the Compensation Clauses of the Bill. Therefore, on behalf of a very large number of Members of this House who wish to have all the facts put before them, I suggest that there should first be a Committee to obtain information upon which we might act afterwards. It would seem that one of the objects of our existence is to maintain in office Her Majesty's Government, and they are now in such a difficulty through what happened the other night that I suggest that this is really a providential occurrence, inasmuch as it affords them an opportunity of withdrawing from the mess into which some mischievous power has thrown them. If the Government would only accept this suggestion and agree to the appointment of a Committee they might begin to sit to-morrow if they liked, and after their investigation this matter might be taken up again, but in the meantime there are other matters of great importance which ought to occupy our attention. As I understand that we are to have a statement from the Government to-morrow night I think we are justified in making this suggestion.

*(7.19.) MR. MUNTZ (Warwickshire, Tamworth): It appears to me that hon. Gentlemen opposite have been under an entire misapprehension, and have evolved from their own inner consciousness the idea that it was the intention of the Government to appoint a Committee. If we are to accept the statement of the First Lord of the Treasury the Government had no intention of appointing such a Committee; at any rate, we on this side had no knowledge whatever of any such intention. Having evolved this idea from their own minds hon. Gentlemen opposite have employed very elaborate arguments as to the sinfulness that would be exhibited by the Government in attempting to pass this measure previous to the appointment of a Committee. I hope the Government will proceed with the passage of the Bill and leave for the future consideration of the House the question of the appointment of a Committee, which has only been taken into consideration to meet the views of hon. Gentlemen opposite.

*(7.20.) MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I think the hon. Member opposite, who has said he and his friends had no knowledge of the intention of the Government to appoint a Committee, has somewhat misunderstood the remarks that were first made by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury. The right hon. Gentleman stated that there was no compensation in the Bill, and that among other subjects referred to the Committee would be that of compensation; but we all know that the Bill is a Compensation Bill, and that the course suggested would be merely putting the cart before the horse. We have heard the opinion of the President of the Board of Trade cited by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, and I should also like to quote the words of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who said that the brewers and publicans would not be dissatisfied at the recognition of the important principle of compensation for licences in England and Wales. Here we have two of the most prominent Members of the Ministry actually contradicting the First Lord of the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the essential question with which we are now dealing.

Mr. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

(7.25.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 247; Noes 199.—(Div. List, No. 136.)

Question put accordingly, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."

(7.56.) Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): In rising to move the omission from Clause 1, page 1, lines 18 and 19, of the words "as hereinafter mentioned," in order to insert the following words:—

"As may be hereafter provided by any Act providing for the transfer to County Councils of the right of granting licences and for the increase of Licence Duties in respect of those houses whose profits are increased by the extinction of other licences, and until such Act is passed shall be invested and accumulated as provided by this Act," said: The announcement made by the Government to-night, that they intend to assent to the appointment of a Select Committee next Session to inquire and report on the question of compensation, and also upon other questions affecting the licensing laws, fully justifies the Amendment I have to propose, and will greatly strengthen my argument. I ask whether, if this Bill passes into law, and a Committee is appointed to consider the question of compensation, it is conceivable that any County Council would negotiate for the purchase of licences pending the Report of that Committee. I believe the Act will remain a dead letter. If this Bill is to pass into law it is most important, and, indeed, indispensable, if the County Councils are not to be at the mercy of the owners of licensed houses, and if public money is not to be wasted, that the powers of the Licensing Magistrates shall be transferred to the County Councils at the same time, and that power shall also be given to increase the Licence Duties on houses whose value is to be improved by the monopoly secured to them by the Bill. The Government will, I think, admit the importance or even the necessity of these two points, as they were both contained in their Bill of 1888, and it is very strange that they have been omitted from the present Bill, and that the Bill has been drawn on a line which precludes their being added as Amendments. I propose that the same method shall be adopted in respect of England until legislation on the important points I have adverted to shall have been adopted. Under the Bill as it now stands there will be two wholly independent authorities dealing with licences. The Magistrates will have the power of renewing annually or refusing to renew licences, and of issuing new licences. The County Councils will, on their side, be intrusted with power to buy up and extinguish licences out of public funds. The inevitable result of this double jurisdiction will be that the Magistrates will be paralysed in their action in respect of the cancelling of licences. They will refuse in the future to put in force their undoubted power of cancelling licences, even in the case of misconduct, still more in the case of an excessive number of licences. They will remember that Parliament has pointed out the method of purchase, and will consider that in future that new system relieves them of their responsibility. On the other hand, the County Councils, not being invested with the power to cancel licences, will practically be at the mercy of the owners of licences in their negotiations for the purchase of licences. They must submit to any terms that the owners or brewers may ask for. If some of the owners should be willing to sell, the County Council will find themselves in this difficulty—if the houses are bad ones, in the sense in which the President of the Local Government Board uses the term, the County Council will rightly think it a scandal to expend the public money in buying them up. If, on the other hand, the houses are good ones, they will think it almost as bad to buy up good houses, and to allow the bad ones to continue, and to enjoy the benefit of an increased monopoly. When the Bill was first issued I hastened to see what would be its probable effect in my own district in the country. I reside in a parish which affords a typical case of an excessive number of public houses—there are 11 licensed houses to a population of about 1,200. Many of them are of that class described by the President of the Local Government Board—the holders can only make a living by doing that which they ought not to do. Everyone admits that the number ought to be reduced. I agree with the hon. Member for Barrow that it would be useless to do away with only one or two of these houses. In order to produce a good effect there should be a much more substantial reduction than that; but what probability is there of the number of public houses in a district like this being reduced by the Bill? There is, first, the difficulty as to the means, for the proportion which will be available to the parish out of the fund which will come to the County Council will be only £22 a year. The whole share of Kent out of the money proposed to be allocated to the Councils would be £11,000 a year, of which this parish would receive £22, and with this it would take 150 years to buy up the public houses. Even assuming that the County Council deals with this district in an exceptional way, and devotes a larger sum to it than to other districts, what is the probability of their being able to carry into effect the operation in view? All the public houses I have referred to belong to the brewers, with one exception, and not to one or two big firms, but to a number of separate brewers; and my confident belief is that none of these brewers would be willing vendors. They have bought these houses for the purpose of distributing their beer, and they would be extremely unwilling to sell them, either to the Local Authorities or to anyone else. Many of the houses are of the character referred to by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, that is to say, only made to pay by doing that which they ought not to do. Some of the houses, no doubt, are well conducted and do not come within that category; but let me assume that the brewers who own the houses are prepared to sell them on their own terms to the Local County Council, there would then arise the difficulty of selection. How is the County Council to select houses for extinction? They must select the worst half or the best half. If they were to select the worst half, there would be the public scandal of public money being devoted to the purchase of bad houses, which ought to be closed without compensation. Such a purchase could not be for a moment justified. On the other hand, if it were proposed to purchase the better class of houses, the bad class would benefit by deriving all the profit of the monopoly. I venture, therefore, to think that the more the question is looked into the more difficult will it be for the County Council to work this subject of the purchase of licences. It would be a very different thing if the power of the Magistrates were transferred to the County Councils. If the County Councils were invested with the power to refuse to renew such licences their relation to the brewers and owners of those houses in the negotiations for their extinction would be a very different thing. I believe myself they would make short work with many of the houses referred to. They would refuse to renew licences, and no compensation would be found necessary to the brewers who owned them; and, in the cases of other houses of a better character, they would find no difficulty, with a little pressure, in compelling them to surrender licences on very reasonable terms. This leads me to the second part of my subject, namely, that power should be given to the County Council to increase the Licence Duty on those houses which are left in the immediate neighbourhood of those which have been extinguished. I think no one will deny that their value will be immensely increased. It is not necessary to suppose that where two houses exist and one is suppressed the other will sell as much liquor as the two; but it will sell a great deal more for the same expenses of management, and the profits, therefore, will be greatly increased, perhaps doubled; its value, therefore, will be doubled. That is the second part of my proposition, and, as an illustration of what I mean, I would refer to a case also in my own neighbourhood. In a hamlet not far from my house there are two licensed houses on opposite sides of the road, close to each other. They supply the country people immediately around, and no one can doubt that one of these licenses ought to be extinguished. They compete with one another in offering temptations to the people to drink. The two together do mischief, and one of them ought to be done away with, and I presume that if the Bill is to have any effect whatever, this is one of the cases in which it will apply. The houses belong to different brewers, and if one is done away with the value of the other would be largely increased, nearly doubled. I venture to think that the County Council would not be so unwise as to purchase one of these licenses unless it had also the power of raising the Licence Duty on the other. Ought this additional profit due to the expenditure of public money go to the owner of the house that is left? I think anyone will admit that there ought to be an increased Licence Duty levied on houses whose value is increased in this way; and I am surprised there is no clause in the Bill to this effect. The whole question of licenses ought to be re-considered. The great price of public houses is largely due to the monopoly we give them, and this monopoly is the creation of the State, and the licenses are quite insufficient in a vast number of cases. I feel certain that in a case such as I have mentioned a County Council would refuse to effect a purchase, on the ground that they would be adding greatly to the value of the adjoining premises without getting anything for it. I have no doubt the right hon. Gentleman will say he will be prepared to deal with the matter further next Session; but now is the time, when we are bestowing great benefits on the licensed houses, to exact something in return. If you lose this opportunity, you will not find it as easy with your friends, the holders of these licenses, to pass measures adverse to their interests. As a matter of general statesmanship, when you are conferring a great boon on a particular class, then is the time to take the opportunity of exacting from them something in return in the direction you think right and reasonable. You are conferring on the owners of licences three great advantages. You are recognising in them a vested interest—no one who heard the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer on Friday night can doubt that that is the effect of the measure. We hold that you are practically establishing these owners of licensed houses in every district in which they now exist, and conferring two other great boons on them. You are securing them from competition by statutory provision against the issue of new licences—exceptions being made in certain special cases. In the past they have had no security of that kind, and the competition in respect of new licences has only been limited by the discretion of the Magistrates. Now, for the first time, you are going to make a statutory prohibition against the issue of new licences. The third boon you are conferring on the publicans is the probability of competing houses being extinguished in their districts, for, wherever that takes place, the value of the licensed houses that are allowed to remain will be immediately increased in value. For these boons you get no equivalent. My belief is that the effect of the Bill as it now stands will be very small when it comes to be worked in the country. It is absolutely certain that in many parts of the country where the temperance agitation is strong the County Councils will object altogether to put the provisions into force, and in other parts of the country the County Councils will be unable to work the Act. The result will be that practically no licensed houses will be extinguished. I think, therefore, the wise course would be to adopt the terms of my Amendment, and postpone the putting in force of purchases of licences under the Act for the purpose of their extinction until the Local Authority has been invested with the powers magistrates now have of renewing or refusing to renew licences within its district, and until provision is made for increasing the Licence Duty of the houses which remain, and whose value will be increased by the increased monopoly conferred by this Bill.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, lines 18 and 19, to leave out the words "as hereinafter mentioned," and insert the words "as may be hereafter provided by any Act providing for the transfer to County Councils of the right of granting licences and for the increase of Licence Duties in respect of those houses whose profits are increased by the extinction of other licences, and until such Act is passed shall be invested and accumulated as provided by this Act."—(Mr. Shaw Lefevre.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'as hereinafter mentioned' stand part of the Clause." (8.22.)

* (8.55.) MR. RITCHIE: The right hon. Gentleman has repeated arguments which have been used over and over again, but I cannot complain, because it is almost necessary to do so in Amendments which touch the vital principle of the Bill, and I must ask the right hon. Gentleman to pardon me and not to think me wanting in courtesy if I use arguments in reply that have been used before. The right hon. Gentleman at the outset referred to the Committee, which he said the Government have resolved to appoint. I will content myself by saying in reply that the right hon. Gentleman is mistaken if he supposes that the Government have resolved to appoint a Committee. The First Lord of the Treasury did, indeed, express a willingness to consent to certain points in the Bill, which some hon. Members thought were obscure and were open to consideration, being submitted to a Committee, but, in particular, I think the idea of a Committee originated with the noble Lord the Member for Paddington, and in connection with his measure. It is only on the understanding that the House itself desires the Committee, in order that the various points urged on both sides with regard to compensation may be considered, that the Government will think of assenting to it. Certainly I may assure the right hon. Gentleman that it is not the intention of the Government to propose any Committee, neither is it their intention, nor do they think it in the interest of the cause they have at heart, that the proposal they make in this Bill should be postponed until a Committee has been appointed. Having said so much about the question of the Committee, about which I do not desire there should be any misunderstanding, I will now proceed to refer to some of the other arguments used by the right hon. Gentleman. He has again said that this Bill recognises and sets up a vested interest in public houses. There is nothing new in this Bill, which recognises a vested interest, apart from the way in which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian has, in his speeches, recognised a vested interest. But, however that may be, I will again repeat that the Government have no intention of setting up any interest which does not already exist. They have stated over and over again their opinion that nothing in the Bill does this, and I again repeat that the Government have no intention of setting up any interest which does not already exist, and that, if there is any doubt on the subject, we are ready to accept Amendments to safeguard all the present powers of the Licensing Authorities. The right hon. Gentleman has alluded to the opinion he shares with those near him as to the effect of the Bill in its operation, and has given illustrations to show that the result of buying up the licences of some public houses would increase the value of others. I admit there may be cases in which the buying up of one public house would increase the value of others. That, however, is a result which would equally take place if the Licensing Justices were to exercise the discretion which it is argued they have of refusing to renew licences. But my answer with reference to these matters, and the illustrations the right hon. Gentleman gave, is that the County Councils may be trusted to exercise their discretion in matters of this kind. The right hon. Gentleman seems to think that when this money is placed in the hands of County Councils it will at once be apportioned throughout every village in their county; but I do not believe a County Council would act in the manner suggested. In regard, also, to the question of good and bad houses, there is no indication or instruction in the Bill to County Councils of the kind referred to. County Councils are elected on a popular franchise, and represent the wishes of the localities returning them, and the members may be presumed to be selected because of their qualifications for carrying on the work entrusted to them; and I imagine in this, as in other matters, they will exercise a wise discretion. I do not believe that the County Councils will act in the manner suggested by the right hon. Gentleman, and although there may be cases in which it would seem useless to buy up one or two houses, because it would add to the value of others, yet there are large numbers of cases in which this power may be very judiciously exercised without creating any difficulty or leading to any of the dangers alluded to. Really, I think the answer to the whole of the right hon. Gentleman's objections has been given by himself. He said the County Councils would not be so unwise as to purchase the houses referred to. That, really, is the answer to the right hon. Gentleman. In the cases where there would be an injustice, or if it is not desirable that houses should be purchased, the County Council will turn their energies to other parts where the evil he dreads will not arise; and if the worst comes to the worst—if a County Council comes to the conclusion that they cannot act, and it is better to wait until they are charged with further powers—then the funds placed to the credit of the Council will accumulate, and no harm will be done. But it is a very different thing for the right hon. Gentleman to ask this Committee to pass a Resolution saying the Bill shall not come into operation until County Councils are charged with the control of licences. As the right hon. Gentleman knows, and as we have again and again said, an ultimate settlement cannot be found until a transfer of this control is made to these popularly-elected bodies. We have always advocated that; and when the right hon. Gentleman expresses surprise at not finding it in the present Bill, my answer is that the circumstances are wholly different to those in which, by the Local Government Bill, we proposed to transfer all the administrative functions of the Magistrates to the elected body. We should have been shutting our eyes to facts if we had not then made the proposal, and having changed the Licensing Authority—having altered it from a Judicial Authority bound by certain rules and considerations to a representative authority specially charged with giving expression to the will of the community as to the number of public houses to be licensed—we felt it was impossible to transfer this great interest to a newly-elected body without a change in the law, which, while recognising the licensing power created, recognised the change in the position of the new authority. We had to face the question whether or not some compensation ought to be provided when licences were taken away, because the people wished it.

SIR W. LAWSON: Compensation?

*MR. RITCHIE: We provided that. We did, of course, propose compensation, whether we were right or wrong in doing so. I am bound to say that if the whole question at that time had been considered in a calm, judicial, impartial manner, it is not at all impossible that a settlement might have been arrived at on conditions that might have been generally satisfactory. But, however, that opportunity passed away, and now the right hon. Gentleman is surprised not to find a proposal of the kind here. But this is not a licensing Bill; we are not dealing with the transfer of the Licensing Authority; we are not charging the County Councils with any compulsory power at all; therefore, it is not necessary to consider the question of compensation, or how it shall be calculated. The right hon. Gentleman fears that the action of Magistrates will be paralysed, but is he serious in insisting upon that? It is essential to consider what has been the action of Magistrates in the past. I do not believe that hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite will be prepared to assert that the Licensing Magistrates have exercised their power, if they possess it, of refusing to renew licences to any considerable extent.

MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.): It is constantly done in Scotland.

*MR. RITCHIE: I confess I am not familiar with the practice in Scotland. I am speaking on the English portion of the Bill and the action of Licensing Authorities here.

MR. CAINE: In Liverpool 199 licences have been refused in 17 years.

*MR. RITCHIE: I should like to analyse those figures. I am under the impression that in Liverpool at one time they had what is called free trade in licences, and, therefore, further explanation is required in order to elucidate the real significance of the reduction.

MR. STOREY: And 117 in Sunderland.

*MR. RITCHIE: In what period?

MR. STOREY: In the last 20 years.

*MR. RITCHIE: That is five in a year.

MR. STOREY: Your Bill enables us to get rid of two.

*MR. RITCHIE: I should like to know how many refusals there were because of faults in management, breaches of the law, or endorsements on licences? ["None."] However that may be, this is the first time I have heard anyone seriously assert that the powers of the Licensing Justices have been exercised, from the point of view of hon. Members opposite, in a satisfactory manner. The contention of the Government is—and nothing has been urged to show that the contention is invalid—that, looking to the number of licences which exist, the percentage of cases in which Magistrates have refused licences to properly-conducted houses is excessively small. And even if the Bill did paralyse the action of Magistrates in this respect, we might regard it, looking at other provisions of the Bill, with something like equanimity. But I entirely deny that it will have such an effect. The Government, as has been already mentioned, propose to put a provision in the Bill which states distinctly that, as far as Parliament is concerned, it is not intended that the operation of the Act should in any way hamper the Magistrates in the exercise of their powers. I do not believe that the insertion of any such words is necessary. I believe that the Bill itself will not have the effect of interfering with the discretion of the Magistrates. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton agrees it will not have that effect.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): Not legally, but morally.

*MR. RITCHIE: Morally, without the words we propose to insert? I venture to assert that whatever can be said of the effect morally—and I dispute it—if these words are inserted expressly reserving the powers and discretion of Magistrates, there is no force in the contention that the action of Magistrates will be paralysed by the action of this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman has said that the County Council will be completely at the mercy of the owner of a public house, as far as the price is concerned; but surely the right hon. Gentleman can hardly contend, when he is going into a shop to buy something which it is not necessary for him to buy, that he is at the mercy of the man who has the article to sell, and that he will have to give whatever price he demands? The right hon. Gentleman admits that there is no necessity for the County Council to buy a single public house, as he has spoken of the contingency of their letting the money lie idle.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I referred to the necessity of giving effect to a requisition from a district that the number of public houses is excessive.

*MR. RITCHIE: I altogether dispute that. The County Council has the executive control in the matter, and will not exercise their power to buy at whatever price the publican demands.

MR. STOREY: Then your Bill is useless.

*MR. RITCHIE: I am using the argument of the right hon. Gentleman. I am not using my own argument at all. I believe the Bill will be useful, and that a considerable number of public houses will be disestablished by the operation of the Bill. It is very inconvenient to carry on a conversational argument across the Table. I am endeavouring to show that, out of his own mouth, the right hon. Gentleman has answered his own argument. The truth of the matter, the main contention between the right hon. Gentleman and the Government, is whether this Bill should come into operation at once, or whether all operations should be postponed until the whole question of licensing is dealt with, together with the proposal that an increased Licence Duty should be put upon the other houses. That, of course, is the principle of betterment. Hardly anyone has ever contended that the principle of betterment is not sound in itself, if it can be applied without injustice; but there are enormous difficulties in the way of doing so in this case. There will be great difficulty in saying exactly what house will be benefited by the closing of another. If a public house is closed at one end of a town it confers no benefit on a house at the other end of the town. The proposal is to postpone the question of the reduction of licences to a time not specified. The Government desire to make some progress at once with respect to this matter, and they are not content to allow it to remain in the position which the right hon. Gentleman desires. They believe that much good may be done by such operations as are shadowed out in this Bill, and that it will be a misfortune if the Committee prevent the Government from enacting in this Bill the proposals they have made for enabling popularly elected bodies to deal with the money placed at their disposal for the extinction of licences in such a manner as they think proper and right.

*(9.24.) SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH (Lancashire, Clitheroe): The question has been asked, why should the Government postpone all legislation on this subject? My reply is that, if the Government had brought in a Bill simply suspending the issue of new licences, it would have received general approval, and have been regarded as a common-sense measure on all sides of the House. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board has acknowledged that the proposals of the Government in 1888 were proposals for compensating the publicans. Those proposals dissatisfied the country, and the Government were obliged to drop them, but they have not learned the obvious lesson which that ought to have taught them. On behalf of a Lancashire constituency, I venture to say that the Government could not have made any proposals which would have made them so unpopular with the electors those as now before the House. The right hon. Gentleman complained, and, I think, most unnecessarily, that my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford had been guilty of repeating arguments previously brought forward.

*MR. RITCHIE: I do not know whether the right hon. Baronet was in the House at the time. I certainly made no such complaint. In point of fact, I said I did not see how he could well do otherwise.

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: Well, I am in the recollection of the House. The right hon. Gentleman said my right hon. Friend had been guilty of repeating arguments, and I think that came rather ill from the right hon. Gentleman, seeing that this Amendment raises an entirely new question. The right hon. Gentleman argued that the County Councils might be trusted to exercise their own discretion as to the degree to which they should put in force the provisions of this Bill. He seems to contemplate with remarkable complacency the probability to which my right hon. Friend called attention that the County Council will not exercise the powers entrusted to them by this Bill. I do not think, if I had proposed such a Bill, I should have regarded with complacency the prospect of the County Councils failing to exercise the powers given to them. I share the right hon. Gentleman's views that the County Councils will probably not exercise these powers.

*MR. RITCHIE: The right hon. Baronet must not put words into my mouth. I never expressed that view. On the contrary, I said I believed that they would exercise it largely for the benefit of the community. What I referred to was the argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford, and I said he had answered himself out of his own mouth; because if the County Councils did not use the money, it would accumulate as he desired it to do under the operation of his Amendment.

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: I think that the Committee will agree with me that the right hon. Gentleman seemed to regard with great complacency the hypothesis that the County Councils would not, to any large extent, exercise their powers. I assure the right hon. Gentleman that, judging from the information which has come to me, it is extremely improbable that the Lancashire County Council will avail itself of the powers under this Bill so strong is the feeling on the question. Indeed, the sum to be allocated to the county is so small that it would be inadequate for the purpose of dealing even with one or two places in my own neighbourhood. If this part of the Bill is to be absolutely a dead letter, I do not regard with any satisfaction the spending of the time of the House upon it; and if time must be spent on a Bill, I should like to see some result. A strong argument in favour of the Amendment is furnished by the proposal which has leaked out to-night of a Committee to inquire into the whole subject. The result of the inquiry might be that there would be found for the funds a better use than that proposed by the Bill.

(9.30.) MR. J. G. TALBOT (Oxford University): I do not follow the right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken in his objection to the proposals of the Government, nor in his reasons for supporting the Amendment of his right hon. Friend. If it is a matter of course that the funds will accumulate if they are not used, I cannot help asking why all this fury and rage against the proposals of the Government—proposals which, at the worst, are innocuous. What is expected by the Government is that a certain amount of result will follow from these powers to be given to the County Councils; and if that result does follow, surely it will be a step in the right direction. We all desire, I take it, to see a gradual extinction of the present considerable number of public houses. I suppose that is the unanimous wish of the Members of this Committee; and, if that is so, then it is only a question of degree between hon. Gentlemen opposite and ourselves—

SIR W. HARCOURT: It is a question of method.

MR. J. G. TALBOT: Well, it does not appear that very much turns on the question of method. The right hon. Baronet who has just spoken says the funds will accumulate, and if that is so, then no harm will have been done. It appears to me that the desire of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford is to transfer the licensing authority from the Magistrates who now hold it to the County Council; and he thinks he sees in this Bill an endeavour to perpetuate the present system of licensing. I venture to differ from him in toto. Nothing has been advanced as yet to show that the County Councils would be better qualified to deal with licensing matters than are the Magistrates. But, at any rate, if the County Council is a body so admirably fitted to deal with this question as some hon. Members think, then they will be able, under this Bill, to show their capacity to the infinitesimal extent which it permits. I should like to go one step further. I wish that those who are so anxious to remove the licensing authority from the hands of Magistrates into the hands of the County Councils, would, before they embark on so great a fundamental change, say on what ground they think that the County Councils would do better than the Magistrates have done in the past. It has been stated that in Lancashire a large number of licences have been got rid of. If that is so, the Magistrates are doing what you desire, and why should you seek to substitute for them another authority? Is it not quite as likely that Magistrates, if they are worth anything at all—and I suppose there are some hon. Members who think they are not worth anything—is it not as likely that Magistrates who are in the habit of exercising judicial functions would be better able to deal with this question than a body which is subject to all the waves of popular opinion? Is it quite certain that a popularly-elected body would immediately diminish the number of public houses? I venture to assert that there is a good deal of public sympathy on the side of the public houses. I have had a great deal of experience as a Magistrate sitting in Petty Sessions; as Chairman of Quarter Sessions; and as Chairman of the County Licensing Committee; and I have found myself, as I think, very inadequately supported by public opinion. I have always been on the side of refusing all licences where possible, and have not granted any new licences, and I have found public opinion against me rather than on my side. I am consequently not quite so sure of public opinion. I do not know how it may be in the North. Possibly there are a few unhappy exceptional cases where the Magistrates have acted unwisely, and where public sentiment is on the other side, but I venture to say that in the South of England it must not be assumed that public opinion is on the side of those who desire to reduce the number of licensed houses. As to the Amendment, the result of passing it would be simply to leave things unchanged until there is time for further legislation; and that I do not think would be at all satisfactory, because no steps would be taken in the cause of temperance; no public houses would be suppressed by County Councils, and we should remain precisely as we now are. On reflection I hope that hon. Members will come to the conclusion that the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman is not one which can be accepted, whatever may be their opinions on the general merits of the Government proposals.

(9.42.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I do not wonder that the hon. Member wishes this question to be kept quite clear of the waves of public opinion, for, politically, he lives in an atmosphere in which County Councils are unknown.

MR. J. G. TALBOT: I am a member of one.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I was, of course, alluding to the hon. Gentleman as a member for a University. The speech just made reminded me that, when I was at the Home Office, I received a deputation of Magistrates from the County of Kent, including the hon. Member, who came to me in despair and said, "In Kent we are overwhelmed by the number of public houses; we do not know what to do; and we come to you, as Home Secretary, to take measures to diminish the number." I listened with great respect; but, when they had exhausted their eloquence in denouncing the public houses, I said, "Gentlemen, I am pleased but surprised to see you; but you, the Magistrates, create these public houses; you issue the licences and renew them. Why do not you reduce the number yourselves? You are the authors of the evil; why do not you put an end to it?" One gentleman, less discreet than the rest, said, "We are afraid to do it; we want somebody else to do it." I answered, "And so you want me to accept the unpopularity which you have not the courage to face." And yet the hon. Member argues in favour of keeping the jurisdiction in the hands of the Magistrates in the County of Kent, and against transferring it to the County Council, which would be influenced by waves of public opinion. I told the deputation that I thought the power ought to be given to the County Council, exactly because that wave of popular opinion would give a little muscle, a little spirit, a little courage to the Licensing Body—qualities in which the Magistrates of the County of Kent are apparently deficient. I am not the least hostile to the Magistrates in this matter. In my opinion, the Magistrates possess a strong sense of the existing evil. The President of the Local Government Board says that no one in the House has asserted that the Magistrates have done anything in this matter. I have ventured to assert that they have, and I have referred to a Return which does not come down to the present time by four years, in which it is shown that the Magistrates have shut up off-licences by the hundred, and fully-licensed public houses by the score. I defy contradiction to that statement, and, so far as the title to compensation is concerned, I hold that the off-licences should stand on the same footing as the fully-licensed houses. I have moved for a Return of the last four years, and I shall be greatly surprised if, with the growth of public opinion, with the knowledge of the law, which in spite of the Law Officers of the Crown, is spreading throughout the country, the Magistrates, knowing now that they have the power, do not exercise it far more freely and courageously than otherwise would have been the case. I do not assert that what has been done by the Magistrates is altogether satisfactory. They might have gone a great deal further. If they had allowed the police to know that they wished disorderly houses to be reported, this would have been done, and many houses would have been shut up. Every one living in the country districts is aware that the police know it is no part of their duty to report public houses, and this is the reason why many of them have not been shut up. The President of the Local Government Board has rung the changes on the question as to whether this Bill will or will not be used by the County Councils. I venture to say that there is not one Council in 10 which will dare to use it. The London County Council has already pronounced its verdict; and the Committee know that in this great Metropolis the Bill, if passed, will not be used. My right hon. Friend the Member for the Clitheroe Division of Lancashire speaks with the highest authority on behalf of Lancashire. I speak on behalf of a smaller community, consisting of 100,000 persons, and the notion of proposing to the Town Council of Derby that they should use this Bill is ridiculous. From the moment this Bill passes the entire influence of the Temperance Party will be brought to bear on the County Councils throughout the country. An agitation will begin—it has begun already in the country—and the first object of the Temperance Party will be to make it impossible for any County Council to use the Bill for the purpose intended. The Unionist Party consider themselves to be very strong in the West, but the Committee have heard a voice from Cornwall this evening. Does anyone believe that a County Council in Cornwall will use this Bill? The notion is ridiculous; and, yet, here is the Government proposing taxation which everyone knows will not be employed. But the Government are going to save their honour, as it is called—it is not saving a great deal—on a silly matter of punctilio, knowing, as they do, that they are wasting the time of the Committee, wasting the money of the people, in raising it for purposes for which it is not wanted, and placing it in the hands of bodies which will never use it, because their constituents will not allow them. The right hon. Gentleman says that the Amendment involves the whole licensing question. But we cannot deal with this question in a piecemeal way. The Government cannot introduce a measure dealing with public houses and their purchase without raising the whole licensing question. What is the pressure which has induced the Government to hang out a flag in the shape of the suggested Committee? Because the Government know that their Bill has raised the whole licensing question. I shall be glad to know what was the decision arrived at when, as has been pointed out, the First Lord of the Treasury and the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale retired behind the Speaker's Chair. The Leader of the House and the noble Lord went out together, and they came back together; and I should like to know what decision was come to behind the Chair. It is said, however, that this money is to accumulate. What is the use of accumulating money when it is not known what is to be done with it? This is the finance of the great Liberal Unionist financier. This is the modern finance of the Conservative Party. A more ridiculous system it is impossible to conceive. The money, I suppose, will be put in a stocking and buried until some one finds out a better purpose to which to apply it. I think that this is an absurd proposal, and I shall support the Amendment of my right hon. Friend.

(9.59.) THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. LONG, Wilts, Devizes): The right hon. Gentleman has made a speech characterised by humour of a friendly nature. It has been listened to with great interest and with much less dissatisfaction than is usually felt when he indulges at the expense of hon. Members on this side; but I confess that, after listening to it with the greatest care, I am at a loss to comprehend on which side the right hon. Gentleman was speaking—whether he advocated the Amendment or whether he was condemning the Bill without advocating the Amendment. The Committee have been told that if the money is not spent under this proposal by the County Council it would accumulate. But this is exactly the proposal of the Amendment—that the money shall not be set apart for a specific purpose, but accumulated until certain other processes had taken place. The right hon. Gentleman, however, denounced this process of accumulation. If the right hon. Gentleman's speech tended in any direction at all, it tended to the direction of proving that the taxation of the people for a purpose of this kind is bad, and ought not to be sanctioned by Parliament. But what I would point out to the Committee is that the principle was affirmed on the Second Reading. The sum total of the speeches we have heard from the right hon. Gentleman amount to this: that in certain places and cases the County Council will not exercise their power, sometimes because they are not sufficient and sometimes because they dare not; because, as the right hon. Gentleman has reminded us, the question will be removed from the House of Commons to the counties, and the County Councillors will be told that if they use these powers they will lose their places. Supposing the right hon. Gentleman does succeed in causing the County Councils not to use these powers, what disastrous result will ensue? The only disaster will be that the money will be accumulated; and when the time comes for which the right hon. Gentlemen is so anxiously waiting, and when it will be his fortune to sit upon this side of the House, what an enormous advantage he will have conferred upon him. He will then have in his hand these accumulations, and what an opportunity will be afforded him and his friends to make proposals of a better and more satisfactory character. The point of view from which we regard the proposals is, that they will afford facilities for diminishing the number of public houses without any injustice to the owners of those houses. But whether we are right or wrong in that view, and if the County Councils do not exercise their powers, no harm will have been caused. The money will have been set apart, and it will form a very comfortable nest-egg for the right hon. Gentleman opposite to deal with. I think we are justified in asking the Committee to resist this Amendment, and to adhere to the proposals of the Government. Nobody has pointed out that any real advantage will accrue from the powers of this Amendment. Some speeches have been made in its support, but only because they were against the principle of the Bill. Very little has been said on the Amendment, but a great deal has been said against the principle of the measure; and we have had general speeches on the Bill over and over again in Committee. Well, Sir, it is sufficient for us that we do not share the doubts, apprehensions, and fears which are entertained by hon. Gentlemen opposite. We do not see any sufficient reason to believe that there is any necessity to make provision for these powers proposed by the Amendment, and, therefore, we ask the Committee to stand by the proposals as we have submitted them to the House, and to reject the Amendment the right hon. Gentleman has proposed, and which received such equivocal applause on the other side of the House.

(10.5.) MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): The Amendment moved by my right hon. Friend presents a test both of the sincerity and the earnestness of the Government as to their desire to extend temperance and diminish the number of public houses. What we complain of is that the power conferred upon the County Council is of no practical value whatever. No genuine results can flow from it. My right hon. Friend the Member for Derby made reference to the view which the County Council of London has expressed upon this matter. A few days ago I had a representation from the Town Council of Bradford. By a majority of 24 to five the Town Council of Bradford has passed a resolution praying the Government to abandon these clauses dealing with licences and compensation. We complain that this Bill establishes an enormous legal claim to compensation on the one side; while, on the other hand, the powers conferred on the County Councils to diminish the number of public houses of an improper and mischievous character are of no value whatever. Now, the Amendment of my right hon. Friend would clothe them with genuine and substantial power. While, on the one hand, they would be disposed to deal with some consideration for the publicans, on the other hand they would not be prepared to buy at extravagant prices the interests established in licences. If this Bill is passed, instead of the Magistrates being quickened in the exercise of the powers they now possess, I am convinced that it cannot be for a moment pretended that the Magistrates will take upon themselves the unpopular duty of suppressing public houses. Supposing the County Councils want to get rid of some of these houses, the only power left in their hands is to distribute the money placed at their disposal. In the town of Bradford the annual sum would be about £3,000, which would only enable two public houses every three years, or three every two years, to be closed. Who can pretend that, out of 500 houses, such a dealing with the question is a genuine grappling with the evil? I can only say that the Government will be wisely advised if they abandon for the time being these provisions as to licences. We believe that in the country the Government will be held responsible for acting frivolously, so far as concerns their grappling with this licensing system. They are offering a gigantic bribe to the liquor interest, and conferring enormous profits on the brewers of this country. Until the Government have an opportunity of dealing with the licensing question on a larger scale, we should not have thrown at our heads a proposal of this kind, which will involve the country in an enormous burden, for the benefit of the brewers and publicans. I can corroborate what has been said by hon. Members as to the feeling outside. Since I have come into the House of Commons I have never had so many representations and Petitions on any subject as I have received upon this question; nor have I known proposals against which greater indignation has been expressed than those which we are now discussing.

It has been suggested that when I spoke on the Second Reading of the Bill, I said I should be able to persuade the County Council of Durham to express approval of the Bill. If I said anything of the sort I should be guilty of overweening confidence and great impropriety. What I said had reference to the way in which this Bill would work. I said that the County Councils would propose a Licensing Committee, who would put themselves in communication with the owners of public houses—by no means always the brewers, as some seem to suppose. They would make a selection of the public houses it was desirable to acquire, and they would then deal with the owners if the prices asked were reasonable. If I said anything which pledged the Durham County Council, I should be unworthy to be Chairman of that body. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Clitheroe Division spoke for the County Council of Lancashire as if he pledged it. I do not think he meant it, because he had no right to do so. He spoke of the small sum which Lancashire would have to deal with. I do not see him in his place. If he were, I would remind him of a speech made at Birmingham in the year 1883, when a man, whose opinion he will respect, stated that £15,000 a year would suffice for a scheme similar to this. If that sum was sufficient for Birmingham with its teeming population, surely £50,000 is not a sum to be disregarded or refused by Lancashire. Now, Mr. Bright's scheme for Birmingham was entirely on all fours with this scheme. It was a scheme whereby £15,000 a year was to be obtained from the Drink Tax, to be applied partly in aid of local taxation, and partly in reduction of the superfluous public houses. With regard to the method in which this ought to be done, I say it ought to be left to the County Council. It is said that the County Councils would not adopt this scheme, and I do not know on what ground this is stated. At any rate,

I do not believe it. I should be wrong to speak on behalf of my own County Council, but I should say that if they did not adopt the scheme they would have to reckon with the men who sent them there. I quite understand the opinion of hon. Gentlemen opposite, but I do not believe it is the opinion of the country. I believe that when those who send representatives to the County Councils, see that this is a plan by which the superfluity of public houses might be put an end to, and that Gentlemen opposite have nothing to propose to effect that object, they will sustain Her Majesty's Government, and the common-sense of the country will adopt their plan. Of course, no one of sane mind supposes that we are going to do away with all the public houses of the country at one fell swoop, and when we hear of £250,000,000 being spent for this object it is hardly possible to understand how any man in his sober senses could have made such a suggestion as that. Here, at any rate, we have a scheme for doing away with the superfluity of public houses, and I believe that the good sense of the country will be disposed to adopt that scheme.

(10.18.) MR. STOREY: The hon. Gentleman who has just spoken has told us he represents a County Council of Durham. I also have the honour to be a member of the County Council of the largest town in Durham, and when the hon. Member says that if we do not adopt this proposal we shall have to reckon with our constituents, I reply that if he and the County Council of Durham do deal with the purchase of licences, as proposed by this Bill, they certainly will have to reckon with their constituents. The hon. Gentleman has referred to the necessity of putting down the superfluous public houses, but I would remind the House that he is Chairman of the Quarter Sessions of the County of Durham, and that he and his brother Magistrates already possess the power.

*MR. WHARTON: Not in Quarter Sessions.

MR. STOREY: What I mean is that he and his brother Magistrates, the Licensing Justices of the County, have at present full power to put an end to superfluous public houses, and I will go further, and say they ought to do this if they do their duty, but instead of this the hon. Gentleman suggests to this Committee that money ought to be provided by the people of this country to enable him to pay for the extinction of public houses which he and his friends ought to have extinguished themselves. Speaking of the Amendment before the Committee I cannot deny that if it be carried it will render the Bill inoperative, that is to say, that the money, instead of being used by the County Councils, will be tied up and suffered to accumulate as a fund to be used hereafter, let us hope, more wisely. I make the Government this free admission, but I want them, as fair minded men, to meet me on this ground and to consider what is the precise amount of loss their present proposal would amount to, because by ascertaining that we shall ascertain the measure of what my right hon. Friend (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) proposes to prevent us from doing, because in all these cases we must argue from the means we possess. In Sunderland there are 254 licensed houses, and the Bill would enable two of these to be extinguished per annum, but there is another important provision in the Bill which will enable us, if we choose, to borrow money, to borrow three times the amount otherwise placed annually at our disposal so as to put an end to a certain additional number. Yes, but under that additional clause we shall be held to have exhausted our power until such time as we can refund the whole amount we have borrowed. That is to say, supposing we in Sunderland borrowed three times the beggarly amount proposed to be given annually by this Bill, we should have been at the end of the three years able to have extinguished six of the 254 licensed houses, leaving us still with 248. That is the full measure of the power proposed to be conferred upon us. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford proposes to limit this power still further by tying it up altogether, the difference between my right hon. Friend and the Government, in the mind of all who care for temperance reform, being the difference between "Tweedledum and tweedledee." But I support the Amendment of my right hon. Friend, not because I want nothing to be done, but because I want a great deal more done, and I can see in that Amendment a common sense and reasonable way of arriving at a solution of this question. I cannot help thinking that the President of the Local Government Board, who has shown himself to be a practical, shrewd, and liberal-minded man, must really see in this Amendment the secret of the success of any Minister who will take the proposal up. What does my right hon. Friend suggest? He suggests that the right, reasonable, and fair way of acquiring funds for the buying up of public houses is to tax the remaining public houses, and it is because the Amendment embodies that principle that I shall support it in the Division Lobby. His proposal means that, if we buy one public house, the remaining public houses ought to bear an enhanced Licence Duty sufficient to pay the cost of the purchase. Take a case in my own district. Of 35 public houses, 28 belong to two men. Suppose the Sunderland Town Council put an end to 14 of the 28. Who is to benefit? You may say the public; doubtless that is so, but who else benefits? Clearly the two brewers who own the 28, and who then will own the 14 left of them, first of all, by obtaining a substantial sum from the public purse, and, secondly, because the whole of the business that used to be done by 28 houses can now be done by 14, thereby largely reducing their annual expenditure over the distribution of their drink. Therefore, I shall always hold that neither this Ministry, which I do not think will be a Ministry very long, or any which may hereafter exist can settle this thorny problem unless they provide in some way that will be just to decent people who have invested their property in this business. I freely admit this, the contention being who is to make the necessary provision. The Government say it should be made by those who drink; I say it should be made by those who retain the monopoly of the sale of drink. My right hon. Friend's Amendment indicates this solution of the difficulty. I heartily concur with him, and shall support his Amendment. When I first saw this Amendment on the Paper I did not think it so valuable as I now think it. I thought it rather went beyond what is reasonable, but this afternoon's transactions have given it greater importance. What do those transactions amount to? Why to this, that the Government either have promised, or mean to promise, a Committee to consider this matter. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ritchie) shakes his head, but we are all accustomed to the progressive movements of Governments. Since the time I have been in this House, I have frequently seen Ministers promising a little one day in order that they might promise a great deal another day. The right hon. Gentleman knows that after what has passed this afternoon, there can be no settlement of this question until it has been considered by a Committee. My right hon. Friend's Amendment proposes that the money offered by the Bill shall be tied up and held until such time as Parliament, after due deliberation, and after the Report of the proposed Committee, shall determine. That seems to me an exceedingly cautious and sensible proposal, and I beg, therefore, to give it my support.

(10.28.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I hope the Government will be able to deal with this question without indemnifying every person who has invested his property in the beer traffic. I do not agree with my hon. Friend that every shareholder in a brewery ought to be indemnified. These men have gone into a purely speculative business and taken their chance, and if they are unsuccessful, why should the British taxpayer be called upon to recompense them?

MR. STOREY: I do not wish my hon. Friend to misunderstand me. There are a number of people who have entered into this business and have been trained to it, and others who have inherited businesses of this kind. Before this question can be settled, the equitable claims of such persons will have to be met, but my point is that such compensation should come, not from the public purse but from the remaining licence-holders.

MR. LABOUCHERE: When my hon. Friend speaks of the inheritors he forgets that the persons who inherit, inherit the chances. I quite agree with my hon. Friend that, perhaps, some small compassionate allowance might be granted to the actual occupier or licensee—that is to say, I would not give it myself, but if I found some Government proposing it I should probably move an Amendment against it, but that would not prevent me voting for the third reading of the Bill. I must certainly support the Amendment on its merits. There are exceedingly few Amendments proposed by a conscientious Liberal and opposed by a Conservative Government which would not have me for a supporter in reference to a Bill of this kind. I not only support this Amendment on these general principles but on its merits. It is most desirable that there should be only one body to deal with the whole matter of licences. If the power of licensing remains in the hands of the Magistrates a man may refuse to sell to the County Council save at an excessive price. But if the County Council be made the Licensing Authority it will be able to point out to the man that if he will not sell at a reasonable price he may not get a renewal at all. A Committee is, it now appears, to be appointed to inquire into this whole question of licensing. The only possible legislation will be to vest the County Councils with the Licensing Authority. They will then have the power to get the public houses at a far less price than they can do now when the publicans can fall back on the Magistracy. These Magistrates are the most objectionable tribunal in the world. They are a Conservative tribunal. In almost every case the Lords Lieutenant are Conservatives and great noblemen. One or two of them are Liberals, and in these counties, perhaps, the Magistracy is better than in other counties. We know that lately the brewers have made an alliance with the peers, and a brewer is now almost the same thing as a peer. They will act, as they have acted, together. The whole reason why this Bill is deemed necessary by the Government is that the Magistrates have granted an excessive number of licences to their friends. We may estimate that they will, without any regard to the requirements of a particular place, renew the licences year after year. The brewer will say to the County Council, "I really do not care whether you refuse my house unless you give me an enormous sum for it; I am perfectly safe with my friends the Lord Lieutenant and the Magistrates." Under these circumstances, I think it would be far wiser, from a Government point of view, to put off this proposal until you have made the renewal of the licence the same authority as the purchaser of the public house. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury tells us that he is actuated by so desperate a desire to render this country temperate that he cannot wait for another year. We all know that that is mere House of Commons talking. Surely he can wait for another year in order to deal thoroughly with the subject. It is true it does sound somewhat absurd to tax the people without allowing the proceeds of the tax to be expended for one or two years. That, however, is not our fault. The clause that enables you to tax and to devote the tax to a certain purpose has been already passed. We really do conscientiously believe that the best thing will be to put off the expenditure of this money until the Committee has held its inquiry and presented its Report.

(10.38.) MR. J. ELLIS (Leicestershire, Bosworth): I have talked this matter over with Conservatives and Liberal Unionists, as well as Liberals, in my own part of the country, and I have not met with a single man who did not condemn the present mess into which the Government have got themselves. Most of them were in favour of a compromise, something like that proposed in the present Amendment. They said it was quite impossible for the County Council to make use of the powers given them by this Bill, but they saw a wiser and better way in the direction hinted at by the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey), namely, that some very moderate amount of payment should be fixed by Parliament, and should be obtained by raising the Licence Duties. I do not believe that if you close 14 public houses out of the 28, as much would be drunk in the remaining 14 as in the 28. But the 14 would be better managed, and would be more valuable, and it would be perfectly fair that they should pay increased taxation in order to pay at a moderate rate for the closing of the rest. In Leicestershire the publican no longer owns his public house. I, for one, will do all I can not only to stop the Bill, but to support this Amendment.

Ayes 232; Noes 199.—(Div. List, No 138.)

(10.58.) THE CHAIRMAN: I have some doubt whether the next Amendment on the Paper, in the name of the hon. Member for Carnarvon (Mr. Lloyd-George), and proposing that the share of the money apportioned to Wales and Monmouth shall be applied for such purposes as a Joint Committee of such counties under the Local Government (England and Wales) Act, 1888, may direct, is in order, especially in view of an Amendment to Clause 3 proposing that the money payable to Scotland shall be put under the control of the Members representing the constituencies of Scotland. That Amendment, however, is clearly out of order. The present Amendment deals with an organisation already created, and, therefore, I think, it is in order.

*MR. RITCHIE: On the question of order, Sir [Cries of "Order"], it is perfectly true that under the Local Government Act of 1888, Joint Committees are allowed to be set up for matters which are common to the several counties which appoint Joint Committees; but I venture to urge upon you, Sir, that the Local Government Act gives no countenance to the setting up of Joint Committees with special reference to a matter which has reference to the whole of the counties of England and Wales.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Is it to be understood, Sir, that we are to argue your ruling? Because, if so, we may spend the rest of the evening at it. I suppose this is another method the Government have invented for saving the time of the House. Unless, Sir, you intimate that that is to be the course, I shall assume that your decision rules the Debate.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is quite in order, and it is the habitual practice, to address the Chair on the subject of its decision. But I do not think that the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman affect the decision which I have already given.

*(11.2.) MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorganshire, Mid): In the absence of my hon. Friend the Member for Carnarvon Boroughs (Mr. Lloyd-George) I beg to propose to insert, in page 1, line 19, after the word "mentioned"—

"That in the Counties of Wales and the County of Monmouth so much of such sum as shall, under the provisions hereinafter contained, be apportioned to the said several counties shall be applied for such purposes as a Joint Committee of such counties, nominated under the 81st section of the Local Government (England and Wales) Act, 1888, may direct."

We have been told by the President of the Local Government Board that the provisions of the Bill are not compulsory—in other words, that the County Councils need not use the money which is allocated to Wales for the purpose the Government have in view. We have also been told that if the County Councils do not care to use the money as is desired, the money will not be lost to them, but that it will stand to the credit of the counties, and, in fact, be hung up until Parliament determines what application it shall have. There is a good deal of uncertainty as to this unfortunate Bill. It is uncertain whether it is brought forward in the interest of temperance, or of the brewer and the publican. It is uncertain, say the Government, whether the Bill involves compensation or not; and, from what has been said to-night, it is uncertain whether a Committee is to be appointed to consider the whole question of licensing. But one thing is absolutely certain with regard to Wales, and that is, that not a single County Council in the whole of the Principality, including Monmouthshire, will use the money for the purpose of compensation for licences. That being so, is it not better to provide by the Bill that a Joint Committee of the whole of the County Councils in the Principality shall decide in what way the money shall be applied

A Joint Committee, consisting of Representatives of all the Welsh County Councils, will be an important body, and the House will do well to leave to their discretion—a wise discretion I am sure it will be—the application of the funds.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 19, after the word “mentioned,” to insert the words “and in the counties of Wales and the county of Monmouth so much of such sum as shall, under the provisions hereinafter contained, be apportioned to the said several counties shall be applied for such purposes as a Joint Committee of such counties, nominated under the eighty-first Section of ‘The Local Government (England and Wales) Act, 1888,’ may direct.”—(Mr. Samuel Evans.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

*(11.8) MR. STUART RENDEL (Montgomeryshire): I hope the Government will not regard this Amendment as in any sense a peg on which to hang a dilatory Debate. It has been introduced with the unanimous consent of the Welsh Liberal Members, and has the approval of the vast majority of the Welsh people, a majority far exceeding in number the constituents who return the 27 Liberal Members, a majority which includes no inconsiderable proportion of the Conservative element in Wales. I shall be very much interested to see whether any Member from Wales who sits opposite will venture to rise to oppose the Amendment. The case of Wales is one which I think deserves some separate consideration on the part of the Government. It is well known that the introduction of this Bill has created a far more profound feeling in Wales, than even in any other part of the Kingdom. The intensity of the feeling must be known to the Government by the vast number of Petitions that have come up from every quarter of Wales on the subject. It cannot be said that the Petitions are in any sense manufactured; upon the face of them they bear every evidence of spontaneity. They represent a sincere and earnest feeling quite apart from politics. They come simultaneously from innumerable small bodies of men scattered throughout all Wales, acting from a common impulse.

The Representative Bodies in Wales have never lost an opportunity of solemnly recording their disapprobation of the proposals of the Government. I would point out that the great bulk of the petitioners have treated this Bill as one introducing the principle of compensation, which the President of the Local Government Board nevertheless declares not to be found within the four corners of the Bill. And I would ask how it comes that this House has received and accepted their Petitions if it be the fact that there is no compensation in the Bill? The feeling in Wales against the Bill is, of course, mainly directed against what they believe to be the principle of compensation contained in it, and it is for this reason that it is impossible, as was most truly said by a Welsh Member, that Wales should touch this money if it is to be applied to the extinction of licences; they regard it as unclean. It is not only the Representative Local Bodies of minor importance that have protested against the Bill, but even the County Councils have lost no opportunity of doing so. Such of the County Councils as have met since the introduction of the Bill have recorded their strong disapproval of the measure. I, therefore, appeal to the Government to consider the case of Wales separately, on the ground of the special and unanimous feeling of Wales. In urging this claim, I would point out that the liquor question has already received separate treatment in Wales. The Welsh Sunday Closing Act was a tribute of this House to the feeling of Wales on the question of temperance, and we all know that the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the working of the Act, instead of as some hoped barring the Act, blessed the Act, not so much on the ground of experience as on the ground of the unanimity of the feeling of the Welsh people in favour of the Act. What we ask is, that Parliament, having already given Wales exceptional and special legislation with regard to the liquor traffic in the sense of restricting it, should not now offer to Wales the insult of proposing that she should devote her share of this £350,000 to giving a statutory vested interest, as she considers, to the drink trade. If there is unanimity in Wales, and if there is precedent for the separate treatment of Wales in regard to the liquor traffic, there is equal unanimity with regard to the desirability of spending some such sum as this in the promotion of education, and equal precedent for the separate treatment of Wales in the matter of education. Parliament, by the Act which I had the honour of introducing last Session, has given Wales the separate and distinguished right of levying a rate in aid of intermediate education, and I have no hesitation in asserting that if the County Councils of Wales and Monmouthshire became entitled, under Section 81 of the Local Government Act, to combine for the purpose of determining the form in which this money should be expended, they would decide it should go towards intermediate education. I am sorry I do not see the Vice President of the Council in his place, because he would understand what it would mean if Wales could only have the £30,000 a year which may fall to her out of this sum for the purpose of education.

THE CHAIRMAN: The question of appropriating the money to the purposes of education was discussed upon the Amendment of the hon. Member for Rotherham.

*MR. STUART RENDEL: I feel, Sir, your ruling is right. I am sorry I lost the opportunity I frequently sought, of stating these views on the Amendment of my hon. Friend. I ask the President of the Local Government Board to consider how unreasonable it is to say to Wales, Unless you use this money as is suggested it must accumulate. Is it practical or business-like to leave the destination of the money uncertain? Why not at once determine the destination? Why not say that the disposal of the money shall be left to the County Councils? We tell you if you will simply give the money to the County Councils in Wales there can be no doubt they will use it in a manner which is not only in accordance with their most earnest convictions, but is in furtherance of the policy and working of an Act for which you took credit in the Queen's Speech, and which, I believe, you sincerely desire to foster. You will avoid giving deep pain and offence to large numbers of your own friends in the Principality. You will be acting in accordance with adequate precedents, and you will be promoting the success of an important Welsh measure which you seek to claim as your own.

*(11.19.) MR. RITCHIE: Mr. Courtney, after the expression of opinion that has just fallen from you, I shall not attempt to answer the hon. Member's arguments as to the propriety of devoting this money towards the advancement of education in Wales. I object to the Amendment on two grounds. In the first place, it proposes to reverse the decision of the Committee that the sum of £350,000 per annum should be applied for the extinction of licences in England. I object to the statement that Wales is not included in England.

*MR. STUART RENDEL: I believe we passed an Act last Session, in which it was agreed that Wales should not be included in England unless specifically named.

*MR. RITCHIE: I beg the hon. Member's pardon. No such Act was ever passed, and if any such proposal had been made I should have resisted it most strenuously. Wales was included in that Act, but it was never intended that where Wales was not specifically included it should be excluded. In that Act we, no doubt, endeavoured to meet the sentimental desire expressed by Members for Wales that "Wales" should be added to "England." It was never contended that Wales would have been excluded if the name had not been added. On the contrary, it was argued at the time that without any mention of Wales, England, by statute, included Wales. My second objection to the Amendment is, that it proposes to set up a sort of National Council in Wales for the administration of this money. I have no doubt that you, Sir, have felt yourself completely justified in allowing this Amendment to be put, by the fact that, under the Local Government Act, arrangements were made by which Joint Committees might be set up, and, although I am not objecting to your ruling, I would point out that the proposals in the Local Government Act are very different in connection with the establishment of Joint Committees to those which are proposed in this Amendment. What was proposed in the Local Government Act was, that a Joint Committee might be set up to deal with any administrative question, such as the pollution of rivers, which was common to two or more counties. The same provision applied to England, but it could never be contended that England could set up a Joint Committee of all its counties for the purpose of disposing of money appropriated to England. Nor could it be contended that any such idea was ever in the mind of the framers of the Act of 1888, or in the mind of Parliament when the Act was passed. In fact, if I am not much mistaken, the question arose on some Amendment which was proposed and expressly negatived by the House. The hon. Member said it was an insult to Wales to hand this money over to the Councils for the purpose of dealing with an admitted evil. I admit that the amount is not sufficient for any large purpose, but the hon. Member can hardly contend that the placing of a sum of money in the hands of the County Councils to remedy what we consider to be an existing evil, is an insult to Wales or its County Councils. Nothing of the kind was ever intended, and it is the greatest straining of language to say that it was so intended.

*(11.26.) MR. BOWEN ROWLANDS (Cardiganshire): I do not think any advantage would be gained by discussing now whether, by the proper interpretation of the language of the statutes, England includes Wales or not. The question is whether Wales should not be excluded from that which we regard as a series of most baneful provisions. Hitherto Wales has been exceptionally treated, and especially in regard to the drink traffic. I do not myself attach any importance to the use of the word "sentimental." If it be sentimental on the part of the Welsh people to desire to encourage temperance, or to enrol themselves in the ranks of those who wish to stop the progress of the greatest evil which has for generations cursed this country, then I say that what you call sentimentalism is a thing to be encouraged and fostered. That such a feeling does exist is proved by the resolutions arrived at throughout Wales, and the unanimity with which this destructive proposition is condemned. I myself presented a Petition to this House from the Assembly representing the Calvinistic Church, something like 250,000 or 300,000 persons. Since then I have poured into the somewhat reluctant arms of the right hon. Gentleman Resolutions and Petitions by the score. I give the right hon. Gentleman credit for sincerity when he says this Bill was introduced in the belief that it would meet with the approval of the supporters of temperance in the country. But not only from teetotallers but from all who take an interest in temperance reform there came an unanimous cry of disapprobation of these clauses, and we have had an agreement from the other side of the House in that disapprobation expressed in a startling manner——

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member must direct his argument to the special Amendment before the Committee.

*MR. B. ROWLANDS: I bow to your ruling, Sir, of course, and I pass on to the right hon. Gentleman's argument that there is no available body created by statute which could properly be entrusted with the management of these funds. He was obliged to confess, and readily did so, that the Joint Committee, to be nominated under the Local Government Bill, was not for such a purpose, but was intended to deal with such matters as the pollution of rivers. I do not know what led him to think that a general Council or Committee would be more properly exercised in dealing with such a subject; there is no language in the Bill that can be construed into such a limitation.

*MR. RITCHIE: As an illustration of what I meant, I pointed out that when it was desired to form a Joint Committee of all the Councils of England and Wales they had to come to Parliament to get express statutory powers for the purpose.

*MR. B. ROWLANDS: Such statutory powers as this Amendment desires we urge the Government to grant. The point I make is this, that the Joint Committee need not be confined to objects such as the right hon. Gentleman mentioned. Here is a question more serious than the pollution of rivers, a gigantic moral pollution which we seek to avert, and we appeal to the Government to assist us in our effort by allowing County Councils the free expression of their opinions in regard to the application of these funds. The Government are in this dilemma, either the application they propose is popular in Wales and Monmouthshire, or it is not. If it is popular, then there will be no question of the application being in the manner the Government desire. If the feeling is, as we know it is, unanimous against the Government proposal, then it is not too much to ask that regard shall be had to our view, and that one more concession shall be made in the so-called sentimental direction, upon the principle that has already conceded exclusive legislation for Wales. Whatever may have induced the right hon. Gentleman to conceive that this measure was introduced in the interest of temperance, his views in this direction must have been considerably shaken, and however excusable may have been their introduction of this Bill into Parliament, he can no longer, if he has eyes to see and ears to hear, plead any sufficient excuse for continuing to press them on an unwilling country. The principle of separate treatment for Wales has already been conceded, and particularly in regard to the liquor traffic. The assertions that Welsh opinion did not desire a continuance of the Sunday Closing legislation were completely exploded by the evidence laid before the Commissioners. The distinct and separate treatment of Wales in that matter has been completely justified, and there is every reason for carrying the exemption to the point indicated by the Amendment.

*(11.35.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): The right hon. Gentleman opposes the Amendment on two grounds. The first is the technical objection that the question raised is res judicata, and this is disposed of by the ruling of the Chair. As to the second objection that the Amendment amounts to a setting up of a National Council for Wales, I frankly say that that is a reason upon which I support the Amendment. If ever there was a question upon which I may say the unanimous opinion of the Principality has been expressed it is this: The right hon. Gentleman talks of the pollution of rivers; but this is a question of the moral pollution of the whole country by the drink traffic. Welsh opinion, I say, is practically unanimous. I have looked through the Division List upon the Amendment of the hon. Member for Rotherham, and I find only two Welsh Members voted against it. We are entitled to distinctive treatment; there is precedent for it in the Sunday Closing Bill. The Government systematically disregard the wishes of a whole nation, insisting upon giving us what we do not want, and withholding what we want. With or without this Amendment, I venture to say there is not a County Council in Wales will touch this money for the purpose the Government propose; it will simply accumulate. The Government are trying to drive this Bill through the House by dwindling majorities; is it wise in the face of the expression of an unanimous opinion of the Welsh people to force this legislation down our throats? I do not think the Division List will show any Welsh Member supporting the Government on this occasion.

*(11.37.) MR. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvon, Eifion): There is no part of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board with which I can agree, but there was one portion of the speech which struck me with surprise and amusement. I had always thought it especially the duty of Members on the Ministerial side and of Members on that Front Bench to support the decision of the Chair.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

*MR. BRYN ROBERTS: Well, Sir, I will simply say that no argument is needed to meet the first point of objection raised by the right hon. Gentleman, namely, that this Amendment amounts to a revision of a Division already arrived at, inasmuch as you, Sir, have ruled the Amendment in order. Then the right hon. Gentleman went on to say that the setting up of such a council was never contemplated by the statute passed in 1888. But I apprehend what was contemplated must be gathered from the statute itself. I do not find that the objects are specified for which the council is set up. If this is not an administrative question that is common to all the Welsh counties I would like to know what is. It relates to the application of money which has been voted for the benefit of particular localities, and it is as much an administrative question as the pollution of rivers. The right hon. Gentleman has not attempted to meet any of the arguments advanced from this side in favour of the Amendment. He has not questioned, or referred to, the universality of the feeling in Wales. Let the right hon. Gentleman consult his own Welsh supporters. Will any Welsh Conservative Member get up and support the application of this money as proposed by this Government? Let him take the feeling of the Conservative Party in Wales. He may choose to disregard the views of the Radical and Liberal Party, but let him take any section in the Principality—excluding the publicans, who are pecuniarily interested—and he will find them in favour of such an Amendment as this. Indeed, I do not think a single Welsh Conservative Member can be found who will support the Government proposal. Intermediate education, I may remind the Committee, is not the only alternative object to which the money could be devoted. The Amendment does not define the alternative, but simply authorises such purposes as may be agreed upon by the Joint Committee of the County Councils of Wales and Monmouthshire. It is a safe and a truly Conservative proposal. In his own county of Carnarvonshire, and in Anglesea, there is a strong feeling as to the heavy burden which the abolition of turnpikes threw upon the County Councils, and the money might be applied to lessen the weight of that burden. With respect to the necessities of Wales in the matter of education. Some counties, Denbighshire and Monmouthshire, have very liberal endowment, and would not have much necessity to resort to the powers proposed to be conferred by this Amendment, in order to eke out the funds of the County Committees under the Education Act; such counties would by this Amendment be enabled to apply some of the money not there needed for Intermediate Education towards the relief of the heavy burden of the maintenance of roads. The Government admitted this burden, and the necessity of relief, by introducing the Van and Wheel Tax; but other counties suffer greatly from the insufficiency of funds, and this Amendment would remove the grievance. I would urge on the Government that they will gain considerable credit by accepting this Amendment. There can be little doubt that the chief desire of every Conservative Member on the Benches opposite is to get out of the difficulty created by this Bill without discredit to the Government. The general feeling on both sides of the House is that this Bill has been a mistake; but by adopting the Amendment the Government will derive some credit from it, and at the same time confer a benefit on the people of Wales. No injury will be done to anyone by the adoption of the Amendment. Certainly the publican will not be injured. Not a single County Council in Wales will touch the money for the purpose intended by the Bill, and the publican will not be injured by its application to other objects.

MR. RITCHIE rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

HOUSE OF LORDS,

*Tuesday, 17th June, 1890.HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF CLARENCE AND AVONDALE'S PLACE IN THIS HOUSE.

Committee for Privileges met. The matter with which the Marquess of Salisbury acquainted the House, by Her Majesty's command, relating to the place which His Royal Highness the Duke of Clarence and Avondale should occupy in this House, also the Statute of the 31st of King Henry the Eighth, for placing of the Lords, and also the entries in the Journals of this House of the 22nd and 24th of April, 1760, in the matter of the recommendation from His Majesty King George the Second, relating to His Majesty's grandson, His Royal Highness the Duke of York's place in this House, considered; and, a Resolution thereon being agreed to by the Committee, the said Resolution ordered to be reported to the House.

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION FOR STANDING COMMITTEES.

Report from, That the Committee have added the Lord President (V. Cranbrook) to the Standing Committee for General Bills for the consideration of the Custody of Children Bill, and the Protection of Children Bill, and have added the Earl of Selborne to the said Standing Committee for the consideration of the Custody of Children Bill, in the place of the Lord Chancellor, the Lord in charge of the Bill, now a member of the Committee, under Standing Order No. XLVII., and have added the Earl of Selborne to the said Standing Committee for the consideration of the Protection of Children Bill, in the place of the Lord Chaworth (E. Meath), the Lord in charge of the Bill, now a member of the Committee, under the said Standing Order; and the Committee have added the Earl of Kimberley to the Standing Committee for Bills relating to Law, &c., for the consideration of the Offences Committed Abroad Bill; read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF CLARENCE AND AVONDALE'S PLACE IN THIS HOUSE.

Report from the Committee for Privileges, that His Royal Highness the Duke of Clarence and Avondale has place and precedence in this House next after His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught and Strathearn, and before His Royal Highness the Duke of Albany, His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor or Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, the Archbishop of York, the Lord President of Her Majesty's Privy Council, the Lord Privy Seal, and all other Dukes, and that Her Majesty may direct His said Royal Highness to be placed in a chair or seat, to be prepared for him, on the left hand of the Cloth of Estate, if such shall be Her Royal pleasure; made, and agreed to; and resolved and adjudged accordingly; and Resolution and Judgment to be laid before Her Majesty by the Lords with White Staves: Ordered, that the proceedings of the Committee for Privileges be printed. (No. 124.)

TECHNICAL SCHOOLS ACT, 1889.*QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD NORTON: My Lords, I beg to put a question to the noble Viscount the President of the Council. I have had a notice on the Paper for some time to move for a Return of what has been done under the Technical Schools Act of last Session. I beg to ask the noble Viscount whether that information can now be given?

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): In reply to the question, which has been asked by the noble Lord, I beg to point out that, as far as we are acquainted with it in the Science and Art Department, the information is contained in the Report just published. I think my noble Friend will find it at page 43.

BUILDINGS IN THE METROPOLIS—HANKEY MANSIONS.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT HARDINGE: My Lords, I wish to put a question to my noble Friend who answers for the Office of Works in this House. I assume that none of your Lordships are very much enamoured of a building, which we all know, and which generally goes by the name of the Hankey Mansions. To my mind, it is one of the most unsightly erections that this Metropolis can boast of. It is one of those eyesores that now meet one at every turn. The view from Buckingham Palace, walking south, is one of the best views in the Park, and even that view is marred, to a certain extent, by some high buildings erected in the rear of the War Office. There seems, really, my Lords, to be a sort of mania for building these very high houses. No doubt, they are very profitable speculations; but that is no reason, I think, why speculative builders should be allowed to spoil the appearance of the Metropolis. Then we have what are called the Albert Gate Mansions—those very high buildings which have been erected at Albert Gate. Let me tell your Lordships what took place with regard to that. Mr. Plunket, finding that these buildings might be run up to any enormous height, considered, I am told, that the only way he could prevent it was by threatening to build a wall in front of the windows. In that case, I believe, he succeeded to a certain extent, and they were stopped. Still, to my mind, they are even now of an inordinate height—quite an unnecessary height. Then there are the buildings at the corner of Piccadilly and Arlington street, which shut out light and air from many of the surrounding buildings. Again, as I have mentioned before, the buildings on the Thames Embankment are unnecessarily high; they dwarf all the public buildings and the Banqueting Hall adjacent. Then, my Lords, even if we design a War Office, it seems we cannot design it without having an enormous tower erected, which would dwarf all the buildings in Trafalgar Square. Now, I think, the time has arrived when something should be done in a legislative direction to stop these enormously high buildings. Since giving notice of this question I have been informed by the Secretary of the Open Spaces Committee that last year Mr. Whitmore, the Member for Chelsea, brought in a Bill to limit the height of these houses. That Bill, unfortunately from press of business and other causes, lapsed; but this year the same Association has induced the County Council to insert a clause in their General Powers Bill limiting the height in future of all street houses. The clause in the Bill is to the following effect:—

And then the clause goes on to enact certain pains and penalties for violating that provision. I do not know whether this is a private or a public Bill, and I do not know what stage the Bill has reached in the other House of Parliament, but it strikes me very strongly that a question of this importance ought not to be dealt with in a private Bill. It is impossible to say what may be done with a private Bill when clauses have to be considered. I must express my humble opinion that upon such a question as this it would be much more satisfactory if the Government would take up the question and bring in a short Bill which would effect the desired object. I do not wish to dwell upon the clauses in this Bill, because it might be irregular, as the Bill is not before your Lordships' House; but, looking to the probability of the improvements in Great George Street and in other streets and the possibility of our having other similar buildings, I am anxious that some legislation should take place before another lot of Hankey Mansions be erected in this Metropolis. I hope my noble Friend will not look upon my question in an unfavourable light, but that he will give the House some sort of assurance that his Department will lend its aid to the promotion of what I think a very useful and necessary piece of legislation.

*LORD HENNIKER: My Lords, at the outset I will say that I warmly sympathise with my noble Friend the noble Viscount who has just sat down, in what he has said about these hideous buildings that are defacing London at the present moment; but, at the same time, I must tell him that the Office of Works has no power to deal with these high buildings. At present they have no more power to do so than any one of your Lordships or any member of the public who may pass down Birdcage Walk, near the building which the noble Viscount has described. Of course, that building is not very good-looking alongside the Wellington Barracks, but I may tell the noble Viscount and your Lordships that Wellington Barracks are not under the Office of Works at all. They are under the War Office, and, therefore, this particular building to which he has referred does not interfere with any building under the Office of Works. But, of course, my Lords, these high buildings do very much affect the Office of Works indirectly, because undoubtedly they do not improve the look of the Parks and the buildings which are under the control of the Office. My Lords, this is really a question for the County Council, as the noble Viscount has said; it is not a question for the Office of Works to deal with, or on which even to initiate legislation; but all I can say is this: that if by the wisdom of Parliament legislation is promoted and brought to an end in a satisfactory manner, there will be no one who will welcome the power to prevent the defacing with these buildings of London, the parks, and the buildings under the Office of Works, than the First Commissioner and those who act with him. I am sorry I can give the noble Viscount no other information, but I can assure him that if he can do anything to carry out what he wishes he will receive the warm support of the Office of Works.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 17th June, 1890.

QUESTIONS.

ADMIRALTY—UNDER-MANNING OF SHIPS.

MR. COX (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether some of Her Majesty's ships of war are so undermanned in the Engineering Department that, in an engagement, it would be absolutely necessary to draft men from the guns to make up the deficiency, in order to secure the full steaming power of the engines?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): No; such is not the case. The complement is amply sufficient to secure the full steaming power of the engines. If the maximum speed were maintained for a long period help might be required from deck hands to assist in trimming coal.

THE ROYAL NAVAL RESERVE.

MR. ROUND (Essex, N.E., Harwich): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he is aware of the growth of the maritime population in the towns and villages upon the River Colne; and whether he will provide some station in the locality where facilities could be granted for training for the Royal Navy or for entering the Royal Naval Reserve?

LOED G. HAMILTON: The Admiralty are making inquiries as to whether a suitable site for a drill battery can be obtained in the locality in question; and also as to the number of seafaring men who would probably avail themselves of the facilities for training that might be so afforded.

SEWERAGE WORKS FOR HARROW WEALD.

MR. COBB (Warwick, N.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, referring to the promise which he gave to the hon. Member for the Rugby Division (Mr. Cobb) on the 20th of August last, and to the determination which he expressed in reply to the same hon. Member on the 18th of February last that something should be done as to the sewerage works for Harrow Weald, he can now state whether there is any probability of anything being done; and, if so, when; and whether, if the delay is continued, he will direct some steps to be taken to compel the Hendon Rural Sanitary Authority to proceed to execute the works?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): Since my reply to the hon. Member for the Rugby Division, I have repeatedly pressed the Sanitary Authority with reference to the provision of the sewerage works for Harrow Weald. I am glad to be able to state that the Sanitary Authority have now succeeded in their negotiations for the purchase of eight acres of land for purposes of sewage disposal, and that they have applied for sanction to a loan of £3,500 in connection with the cost of purchase and the execution of the necessary works. It is requisite, however, that the Board should be furnished with plans of the works proposed, and I am informed that plans and sections will be laid before the authorities at their meeting to-day.

MR. COBB: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that plans were laid before the Local Authority 12 months ago?

MR. RITCHIE: I do not know whether that is so or not; but a loan is now being applied for in order that the works may be carried out.

RAILWAYS IN INDIA.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he can state to the House the nature of, or whether he will lay Papers upon the Table showing the various proposals made during the past 12 months, to or by the Secretary of State in Council, and to or by the Government of India, and to either, by any other persons in relation to particular railways in India, or in relation to any general scheme of Indian Railway finance, together with any correspondence thereon?

THE UNDERSECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): My noble Friend the Secretary of State is of opinion that it is not expedient to give the Papers asked for in the question, nor would it be convenient or practicable to do so. He wishes me to suggest to the hon. Gentleman that he will have an opportunity of discussing the matter on the statement in connection with the Indian Budget.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to give notice to the right hon. Gentleman that if he does not lay these Papers on the Table before the discussion of the Indian Budget takes place I shall feel it my duty to submit to the House a summary of the proposals made to the Government, with the criticisms of the Government of India upon them.

RAJAH BROOKE.

MR. NORRIS (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if it is a fact that Rajah Brooke has seized a large part of the Independent State of Brunei, against the wishes of the lawful Sovereign of the State; and, if so, has Rajah Brooke broken the agreement made between the Sultan of Brunei and Her Majesty's Government, also his own agreement with the Sultan; whether Her Majesty's Government has received a strong protest from the Sultan of Brunei, informing them that Rajah Brooke has interfered with the independence of the State of Brunei, and thereby violated the terms of the agreement between Her Majesty's Government and His Highness, dated 17th September, 1888; and if Her Majesty's Government will take steps to insure that their Treaty with the Sultan shall be respected, and if they will award compensation for any losses suffered by the Sultan in any breach of such Treaty?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): Rajah Brooke has annexed the Limbang District, which was nominally under the Sovereignty of the Sultan of Brunei, though his authority over it does not appear to have been recognised by the inhabitants for some years. The annexation is subject to the approval of Her Majesty's Government. The Sultan of Brunei has protested. We are not yet in possession of sufficient information to enable me to make any statement as to the course which Her Majesty's Government may feel bound to take in the matter.

FISHING IN THE LOWER HOPE.

MR. BAZLEY-WHITE (Gravesend): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has received a Memorial from the fishermen of Gravesend, praying that boats from Greenwich and Blackwall may be prevented from fishing in the Lower Hope with illegal nets, called "stobard nets," by which the fry and spawn of all kinds of fish are destroyed, and the livelihood of the fishermen taken away; also that sewerage matter may be prevented from being brought down the river and deposited at the entrance by the steamships Barking and Bazalgette, whereby great harm is done to the fishing; and whether the Board of Trade will take such steps as may be necessary to remove the nuisance complained of?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I have received the Memorial to which the hon. Member refers, in which complaint is made of the use of stow boat nets, and the deposit of sewage in a part of the River Thames which is under the jurisdiction of the Thames Conservancy. A copy of the Memorial was forwarded to the Conservators, who have replied that instructions have been given to their Harbour Master to carefully watch and report all cases of a breach of their bye-laws.

TREATMENT OF PRISONERS IN MOROCCO.

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he will cause our Minister in Morocco, Sir W. Kirby Green, to make representations to the Sultan in order to alleviate the alleged ill-treatment of the prisoners confined in the prisons at Tangiers and Tetnan?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The attention of Her Majesty's Minister has been already called to the subject, and he has authority to make representations respecting the state of the prisons to the Moorish Government whenever he sees any prospect of doing so with success. I regret to say that, according to his latest Report on the question, he had found that diplomatic representations were ineffectual to abate the evils complained of.

FLASH SIGNALS—ADMIRAL COLOMB'S INVENTION.

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he will lay upon the Table of the House Copies of all letters, agreements, and receipts given by Admiral Colomb, relating to his invention of the Flash Signals?

LORD G. HAMILTON: As the question of this officer's services in the introduction into the Navy of the system of flashing signals is still under consideration, it would be inexpedient to present to Parliament at the present time any Papers on the subject.

EGYPTIAN LOAN.

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he will ascertain from the Financial Adviser of the Egyptian Government the amount of commission paid to Messrs. Rothschild and Sons for issuing the new Egyptian 3½ per Cent. Loan?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: This is a matter entirely within the discretion of the Egyptian Government.

MORELL'S CHARITY.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the hon. Member for the Penrith Division of Cumberland (Mr. J. W. Lowther) whether the Charity Commissioners have, since the date of the Report of the Royal Commission on the City Livery Companies, in 1884, dealt with Morell's Charity of the Goldsmiths' Company; and, if so, in what way, both generally and with special reference to 30 acres of land at Barking, part of the corpus of the Charity?

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): The Charity Commissioners are taking proceedings for the establishment of a new scheme. The scheme does not deal with the land at Barking.

CIVIL ESTABLISHMENTS.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in view of the great inconvenience which is occasioned in the several Public Departments by the existence of vacancies in the staff, and the stagnation of promotion which has occurred since the appointment of the Royal Commission on Civil Establishments, the Treasury will expedite the settlement of the various establishment questions now under their consideration, and sanction the promotion of those clerks of the Second Division who have already been recommended by the Heads of their Departments under the new Regulations set forth in the recent Treasury Minutes and the Order in Council?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The Treasury has been busily engaged upon these questions, and material progress has been made towards their settlement. But the reduction of various establishments to a fixed cadre, in accordance with the recommendations of the Royal Commission, is a matter concerning which a great variety of opinions may be legitimately expressed, and which demands the most careful adjustment. The promotion of Second Division clerks to the upper class in that Division and to staff posts, must necessarily depend on the schemes adopted for the entire Departments, as it is these schemes which will determine the classification and distribution of the work.

THE LADIES' GALLERY.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works what is the height from ground floor of the House to the Committee Rooms and the Ladies Gallery, and would it be possible to put up a lift or lifts for the convenience of Members and of ladies visiting the House?

*THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): I find that the height of this building, from the ground floor to the Committee Rooms, is 39ft. 3in. It would be possible to introduce into the staircase leading to the Ladies' Gallery a small lift to contain three people, but it would be an expensive undertaking.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): Is there not already a lift for coals, and could not the ladies be substituted for coals?

*MR. PLUNKET: Such a lift does exist, and it certainly could be used either for the ladies or the coals; but I think it would be very difficult to combine the two. I can give no undertaking at present.

MR. T. M. HEALY: During the recess will the right hon. Gentleman inquire into the matter?

*MR. PLUNKET: I have no objection to do that.

MR. LENG (Dundee): Has the right hon. Gentleman obtained any estimate of the cost?

*MR. PLUNKET: No, Sir.

THE CORPORATION OF NEWCASTLE-UNDER-LYME.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he can fix an early date for the holding of the promised inquiry into the way in which the Corporation of Newcastle-under-Lyme have expended the proceeds of a loan of £23,624, originally borrowed for certain specific purposes, several of which have not been carried out; whether, when an urban Sanitary Authority borrows money under the sanction of the Local Government Board, that Board has any control which will enable it to secure that the money is expended for the purposes for which it is borrowed; and whether such authorities are under statutory or other obligation to publish to the ratepayers any accounts which will show how the proceeds of loans are expended and from time to time otherwise dealt with?

MR. RITCHIE: The Local Government Board have received a communication from one of the Councillors of the Borough of Newcastle-under-Lyme, in which it is alleged that certain monies which have been raised under the sanction of the Board have not been wholly applied to the purposes for which the loan was sanctioned. The Board have forwarded a copy of the communication as regards these allegations to the Town Council, but have not yet received their reply. The Board have been informed of a further proposal of the Town Council to borrow. No sanction to a further loan will be given without a local inquiry, and at that inquiry the question as to the appropriation of the proposed loan will be considered. In the case of Local Boards and other authorities, whose accounts are subject to the audit of the District Auditors, it would be the duty of the Auditor to satisfy himself that monies borrowed for a particular purpose are applied to that purpose. In the case, however, of a Municipal Corporation the accounts are not audited by the Auditors appointed by the Board. Under Section 233 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, the Treasurer's accounts are open to the inspection of the Council, and an abstract of these accounts is to be open to the inspection of all the ratepayers of the borough, and copies thereof are to be delivered to ratepayers on payment of a reasonable price. These provisions are made applicable to the accounts of a Town Council acting as an Urban Authority by Section 246 of the Public Health Act.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Am I to understand that an inquiry will be made if the right hon. Gentleman is not satisfied in regard to the manner in which the money has been expended?

MR. RITCHIE: The inquiry I have spoken of would be an inquiry as to the circumstances connected with a further application for a loan. In regard to all applications for power to raise money by loan an inquiry is held; but I have pointed out that the Local Government Board have no power to appoint Auditors. They do not possess the same control over the expenditure of money in the case of Corporations as they do in the case of Local Boards.

MR. BRADLAUGH: If the application for a further loan is not persisted in have the Local Government Board no authority to inquire as to the expenditure of the money already borrowed?

MR. RITCHIE: No, Sir; we have no authority; none.

WAR OFFICE CONTRACTS—BAYONETS.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary for War what contracts and for what total number of bayonets have been made with Messrs. Wilkinson, and what number of bayonets have been delivered under such contracts; whether, subsequent to the respective contracts or any of them being originally made, any alterations were made in the shape of the bayonets or the test to which they were to be submitted; and whether the short bayonets or knives now being used with the new magazine rifle are those for which the first contract was given to Messrs. Wilkinson?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY FOR WAR (MR. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): Only one contract has been made with Messrs. Wilkinson for bayonets, namely, for 150,000. Originally they were to have been of the pattern known as the Enfield Martini, 1877, and to a specification dated September, 1888; 42,000 were made under this order. In September, 1889, it was decided that the remaining 108,000 should be made of the 1888 pattern, and to a revised specification, which was sent to the contractors on November 11, 1889. These are the short bayonets used with the magazine rifle, for which the test naturally differs from that of the longer weapon of the 1887 pattern. Consequently, the bayonets ordered in 1889 are not those for which the original contract was made.

MR. HANBURY: In the new contract was the price altered?

MR. BRODRICK: I believe there was some alteration in the price.

THE METROPOLITAN POLICE.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Chief Commissioner of Metropolitan Police submitted an estimate of £138 for gratuities to the police who performed extra duty, and the Secretary of State granted £100 only, and, in consequence, the allowances have had to be reduced below the usual scale; and, if so, will he say why the usual course has not been followed?

MR. G. BRUCE (Finsbury, Holborn) also asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the Police Order quoted in the Daily Telegraph, of Saturday last, relating to the grant of refreshment allowances or gratuities to the officers and men of the Metropolitan Police Force; whether it is the fact that the police have been deprived of the usual refreshment allowance to which they are entitled under the Rules; what is the Rule governing the grant of refreshment allowances, and was the claim, in respect of which the £100 (mentioned in the Order) was given, made under that Rule; have any other payments of that character been made; and whether any steps have been taken to mitigate the pressure of exceptional work falling upon officers and men of the Police Force?

MR. BURDETT-COUTTS (Westminster): I have also to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with reference to the grants of refreshment allowances or gratuities to the Metropolitan Police for extra service in times of emergency, whether the sum of £138 represented the allowances, calculated on the usual scale for the extra work done by the police during the recent gas and dock strikes; whether that sum was reduced to £100; whether he is aware that this reduction has caused great discontent amongst the men, and whether he will explain his reasons for the reduction?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I will answer the questions of the hon. Member for Bethnal Green (Mr. Pickersgill), and my hon. Friends the Members for Westminster (Mr. Burdett-Coutts), and Holborn (Mr. G. Bruce), numbered 26 and 28, at the same time. Refreshment allowances are governed by the Regulations of the Police Force, and are allowances for expenses incurred, subject to two conditions, namely, that a man has been on duty over nine hours continuously, and that he was on duty too far from his home or Division to return for meals. This refreshment allowance has never been refused, and has never been reduced in any case which comes within the Rules. Last September the Commissioner asked that the refreshment allowance should be granted to men who were not entitled to it, because they had not fulfilled the conditions laid down in the Rules, but who had done extra duty or had suffered loss of leave in connection with meetings in Hyde Park, and these demands were made on several occasions. They involved the principle that the police had an equitable right to be paid for loss of leave or for overtime beyond their usual spell of eight hours' duty. This principle has not hitherto been admitted in the administration of the police. It appears to me contrary to the terms on which the police are employed. It carries with it the consequence of payment for all overtime beyond an eight hours' day. I did not feel justified in allowing this novel claim. But whilst I declined to grant a refreshment allowance, which had not been earned, I awarded in recognition of the zeal and good services of the police a round sum of £100, to be distributed by the Commissioner at his discretion among those men who had been most inconvenienced by extra work or loss of leave. The Commissioner asked that this gratuity might be increased to £138, on the ground that £138 would enable him to grant the refreshment allowance, which I had just declined to allow as unsound in principle, and contrary to the Rules. I had had no previous estimate of this amount. I declined this application. This was in February last. No distribution of the £100 gratuity was made till the 13th inst.; and the distribution, contrary to my intention, is not on the basis of rewards for exceptional hardship, but on the basis of a reduced refreshment allowance. It is very possible that discontent has been caused by the manner in which this gift has been distributed. On May 28, I awarded another gratuity of £200 for extra work done by the police on other occasions when the refreshment allowance had not been earned. Altogether, I have distributed in gratuities of this kind, beyond and outside the Rules governing refreshment allowances, over £900 since July last. I also, in December last, sanctioned the substantial increase of 1,000 men to the Police Force, largely with the view of mitigating the pressure of exceptional work falling upon officers and men, and my desire has always been to treat the Force with consideration and liberality, and to recognise, so far as I could, the zeal and devotion displayed by the Metropolitan Police of all ranks.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): How many of the 1,000 men have been already added?

*MR. MATTHEWS: If I am to answer the question with perfect accuracy I must ask for notice. The increase was sanctioned in December last, and is to be made at the rate of 100 men a month.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is that the increase which was sanctioned by the right hon. Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt)?

*MR. MATTHEWS: No; it was sanctioned by me in December last.

MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to confer with the Chief Secretary in order to see how English money is spent upon the police in Ireland.

MR. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): When will the question of the addition to the Police Force, and the consequent provision of expense, be brought before the House?

*MR. MATTHEWS: I am afraid I must ask for notice of that question. It will not be in the Vote this year.

MR. STUART: Am I to understand that this House has no voice as to the number of the police?

MR. MATTHEWS: All I intended to say was that no Vote of the House will be asked for in order to meet the expense.

MR. JAMES STUART: Then how is the expense to be met?

MR. MATTHEWS: Out of the income of the Metropolitan Police Fund.

MR. JAMES STUART: Is it not the case that the income of the Metropolitan Police Fund was not too much in the past year; and how is it to be made sufficient to meet the necessities of more policemen?

MR. MATTHEWS: On the Police Vote the fullest explanation will be given to the House.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): Do I understand the Secretary of State to say that no Vote is going to be taken this year in the Estimates for the sum which is to be paid out of public money for the Metropolitan Police?

MR. MATTHEWS: Certainly.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: Is it intended to bring forward the Police Vote at such a time that the House may have an opportunity of discussing it?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The Police Vote will be brought forward on an early day.

MR. PICKERSGILL: May I ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, before the Second Reading of the Police Bill is taken, he would publish the fixed scale (within the meaning of Clause 3) which he proposed to adopt for ordinary pensions in the Metropolitan Police Force.

MR. MATTHEWS: Publication of the scale at the present time would be premature. It is enough for me to say that it is my intention, if the Bill passes in its present shape, to adopt the maximum scale in the schedule as the scale for ordinary pensions in the Metropolitan Police Force, and not to prescribe any limit of age as a qualification of the right to claim pension after 25 years' service.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL.

CAPTAIN PRICE (Devonport): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty when the Greenwich Hospital Accounts will be in the hands of Members; and whether any opportunity will be afforded for their discussion?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: On the 20th June. The usual facilities in discussing Estimates will be offered.

SHEERNESS DOCKS.

MR. H. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether steps are being taken, or will be taken, to enlarge the docks at Sheerness, so as to obviate the necessity for large ships having to go to Chatham?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The Admiralty are at the present time considering a suggestion to lengthen one of the docks at Sheerness for accommodating vessels of a certain class, as it is proposed by the present Board of Admiralty to build vessels of a larger size at Sheerness than have hitherto been constructed there.

CONSTITUTION HILL.

CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether, in view of the experience gained of the traffic on Constitution Hill during the height of the season, this road can now be thrown open to cyclists?

MR. PLUNKET: I have not received any official Report on the subject; but it seems to me that the volume of traffic on Constitution Hill is steadily increasing.

THE SCIENCE AND ART DEPARTMENT.

MR. J. WILSON (Lanark, Govan): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether a Circular has been issued by the Science and Art Department, to the effect that in future no pupil on the register of an elementary school can be examined in science by that Department; whether he is aware that several School Boards in Scotland have, on the strength of encouragement held out to them by the Department, incurred considerable expense in providing laboratories and apparatus, as well as teaching power, all of which will, under the new conditions imposed by the Circular referred to, be rendered useless; and whether, in the circumstances, the Department will withdraw the conditions imposed by the said Circular so far, at least, as it refers to Scotland?

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): May I ask whether the Minute in question will apply equally to Board Schools in England?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): The Circular in question was issued to check the duplication of payments caused by the overlapping of the functions of the Education Departments in the three Kingdoms and the operations of the Science and Art Department; but representations having been made to me that paragraph 2 of the Circular will have a detrimental effect upon science instruction in many schools, I am considering the possibility of substituting for the rule there laid down some regulation which, without being open to the same exception, will promote the object we have in view.

DR. KENNY (Cork, S.): Will a similar Rule apply to Ireland?

SIR W. HART DYKE: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to be good enough to put the question down.

THE POST OFFICE SERVANTS.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the East Central letters of the French Mail, which arrived on Saturday night at 6.40, and should have gone out by the 8.15 delivery the same night, were still in the office on Sunday night; whether the block in the East Central Office on Saturday night was as great as is usually the case at Christmas time; and what is the cause of such unusual pressure? I have to ask, further, whether it has been reported to him that on Friday last, on the Western District, postmen who should have finished their delivery at 4.20, and be on duty again at 5.20, only finished their delivery at 5.40, and were then deprived of their usual time allowance for tea; whether such delay was caused by the non-arrival in due time of the district bags from the Central Office; and what was the cause of such delay; whether it is the case that a large quantity of circulars which were received at the General Post Office on the 13th instant were not despatched till 10 a.m. on Monday the 16th instant; whether, in consequence, the usual 10.20 a.m. delivery was delayed fully half-an-hour; whether a special staff was asked to work on all through Saturday night; and whether, in the ordinary course, such circulars would have gone out on Saturday morning? I have also to ask how much has been expended at the E.C. and W. District Post Offices in payment for extra duty caused by the suspension of postmen at those offices for attending a Trade Union meeting on the 16th May; and why the letters by the Dutch mail arriving at 8.15 a.m. on Saturday and Monday were not delivered until between 11.30 and 12.45; whether this was two hours beyond the usual and proper time; and whether he can take steps to prevent this delay, which causes great inconvenience to business men in the City?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): To questions Nos. 29, 30, 31, and 33 the answer is, in each case, There is no foundation for the statements suggested. To question 32 the answer is £5 6s. 6d.

MR. CONYBEARE: The answer of the right hon. Gentleman is the same which he gave me two or three days ago. I should like to ask him on what authority he makes the statement that there is no foundation whatever for these allegations? I can only say that the information has been supplied to me on the very highest authority.

*MR. RAIKES: I have made the state ment on the best official information I could obtain at the Post Office.

MR. CONYBEARE: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will state the number of postmen who had a part of their wages forfeited for attending a Trade Union meeting on 16th May, the ordinary weekly wage of the men, and the total amount forfeited?

*MR. RAIKES: Thirty one; but three having given satisfactory assurances for their good behaviour, the punishment in their case has been remitted. The wages of the men ranged from 18s. to 32s. The total amount forfeited cannot be stated at present or until it be known how many of the men, besides those who have already done so, are prepared to give satisfactory assurances for their good behaviour.

MR. CONYBEARE: Will the right hon. Gentleman state what are the satisfactory assurances these men have given?

*MR. RAIKES: They have given their word, which I regard as a satisfactory assurance.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): Do the Regulations apply to the superior officers as well as the working men?

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he will state whether the persons he sent to obtain, or from whom he did obtain, the names and numbers of the men who attended the meeting on Clerkenwell Green on 16th May, have reported some men as being at that meeting who were not there; and whether the officers who performed this work were the ordinary overseers or assistant overseers, or whether they were from the Confidential or Criminal Investigation Department?

*MR. RAIKES: It is the fact that some of the men who were reported as being at the meeting on Clerkenwell Green on the 16th May have stated that they were not there, or that they happened to be passing on their way without any intention of attending the meeting. In all such cases the assurances of the men have been accepted. The officers employed were of various grades, and did not belong to the Confidential Inquiry Branch.

MR. C. GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether Mr. Raynor, assistant or second class overseer, and Mr. Birch, foreman porter, at the Western District Post Office, were sent to Cavendish Square on 16th May to take the names and numbers of the postmen who assembled there for a Trades Union procession; whether these gentlemen went on their own responsibility; and, in either case, whether their information was made use of; whether, in consequence, Mr. Raynor lost all control over his subordinates, and had to be removed to a new position; and whether such officials will be so employed in future?

*MR. RAIKES: I have to say that the officers employed on this occasion acted under the instructions of their official superiors. It would therefore serve no useful purpose to mention the names of individuals so employed. Mr. Raynor has been removed to a fresh duty, but not in consequence of his having lost control over his subordinates. For the future the same or some other Post Office servants will be similarly employed as occasion may require.

MR. C. GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that in 1882 a meeting of postmen, including delegates from country postmen, was held in the Memorial Hall, to which the public were admitted, at which a Member of Parliament and several postmen made speeches; and whether postmen were punished for attending or speaking at such meeting?

*MR. RAIKES: I am not aware of the circumstance to which the hon. Member refers, and the shortness of the notice has not admitted of my making inquiry.

MR. C. GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has taken any steps to ascertain the objects and methods of organisation and action of the Postmen's Union; whether he will communicate the result to the House; and whether, if he should be satisfied that it does fully represent the postmen, and that they wish matters affecting their wages, hours of labour, &c., to be negotiated between the Department and their Trade Union officials, he will take steps to give effect to their wishes?

*MR. RAIKES: No, Sir. I must absolutely decline to discuss matters affecting the postmen, except with the postmen themselves.

MR. C. GRAHAM: Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that he declines to treat with anyone but the postmen themselves? Is the Secretary to the Postmen's Union to be excluded from discussions as to the interests of the men?

*MR. RAIKES: The postmen are perfectly well aware that the person described as the Secretary to the Postmen's Union is not, and never has been, a Post Office servant; and it is the universal rule that matters relating to persons engaged in the Service can only be discussed between them and their superior officers.

MR. C. GRAHAM: Do these men, on becoming postmen, forfeit their right to join a Trades Union; and has the right hon. Gentleman any right to subject them to quasi-military discipline?

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the ancient contention of the employers of this country was that they alone should settle any disputes with their workmen, without the interposition of the Secretary of a Trades Union? There were continual conflicts in consequence; but since the employers of labour have taken the more common-sense plan of discussing these matters with the Secretary of the Union there has been much peace. May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will not take the advantage of the experience gained by the employers of labour, and adopt the same plan in his Department?

*MR. RAIKES: I must point out that I have only endeavoured to carry out the Regulations of my Department, which, I may add, have been considerably relaxed for the benefit of the men. In regard to the question of the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey), the most recent experience indicates, I think, the advisability of maintaining a firm and resolute attitude.

MR. C. GRAHAM: I wish to have a decided answer in the affirmative or negative as to whether these men are prohibited from joining a Trade Union, or whether they are not?

*MR. RAIKES: I can only say, again, that the men are quite free to form or join Associations for their mutual benefit and mutual consideration of matters affecting their status; but it is impossible for the Department to recognise any combination which attempts to dictate to it on matters relating to its administration.

MALTESE MARRIAGES.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is a fact, as stated by Lord Salisbury—

“That mixed marriages in Malta, where one party is a Roman Catholic and the other is not, remain in the same position which they have previously held, and are not in any way affected;”

and whether the Governor of Malta will, in accordance with the practice which has been in existence for many years, continue to issue licences to Protestant ministers authorising them to celebrate such marriages?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Yes. It is not intended to alter the law regulating mixed marriages in Malta. I cannot say, positively, within what limits it has been the practice of the Governor of Malta to issue licences authorising Protestant ministers to celebrate marriages. Further inquiry will be made as to this. But our intention is that Protestants shall not be placed, in any respect, in a worse position.

MR. T. M. HEALY: What does Sir Lintorn Simmonds want at Rome? Who asked him to be sent there? Was it the Maltese people?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: He went there in order to settle some matters affecting the welfare of the people of Malta. Of course, he was sent by the responsible Government.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Did the Catholics of Malta ask that he should be sent to Rome?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Not that I am aware of.

IRISH LIGHT RAILWAYS—MAYO AND DONEGAL.

MR. CRILLY (Mayo, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if any decision has as yet been come to by the Treasury as to what line or lines of light railways are to be constructed in Mayo under the Light Railways Act of last year?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): Negotiations are going on, and I hope that a satisfactory arrangement may be arrived at.

MR. CRILLY: Seeing that the chief aim of these schemes was to give employment to the people of the district, and that the spring crops are now cut down, and the people will have nothing to do until harvest time, will the Government endeavour to overcome this unaccountable delay in making these lines? Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the Mr. Barton, whose line in Donegal is being pushed forward, is the same Mr. Barton who reported upon the line to Belmullet, and why should his schemes be favoured while nothing for Mayo is being favoured?

MR. JACKSON: It is obvious that the hon. Member ought to give notice of a question of that kind, containing as it does allegations in which I do not agree.

THE TIPPERARY AND CASHEL MEETINGS.

MR. LEAKE (Lancashire, S.E., Radcliffe): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is true that large bodies of constabulary assaulted with bâtons and chased the people of Tipperary Town on Sunday 25th May, without previously giving them authoritative notice to disperse, and although no resistance was offered or attempted; whether it is true that on the same day Colonel Cadell, R.M., referring to Father Humphreys and the honourable Members for East Mayo, East Tipperary, Mid Tipperary, South Galway, and South Louth, who were conferring together, gave the orders to the police: "Men, draw your bâtons," and "Charge, and clear these fellows out;" whether it is true that similar assaults on the inhabitants, many of whom were women, were committed in Boherlahan village in the presence of Mr. Bruan, R.M., and at Cashel, in the jurisdiction of Mr. Shannon, R.M., and in both cases without any preliminary request to disperse being made by the proper authority; whether it is true that on Mr. Bruan entering Cashel at the head of a body of military and police, he was publicly addressed by Mr. Shannon in the words, "Bravo, Bruan! we have bâtoned them like hell in Cashel to-day," and whether he will consider the advisability of separating the magisterial from the police functions of the Resident Magistrates in Ireland?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I am informed the people were not dispersed without previous warning. With regard to Mr. Bruen, previous notification was given. The statement as to Colonel Cadell that gentleman completely denies. Mr. Shannon likewise denies that he used the language attributed to him. I quite agree with the last part of the question, and I shall take care that arrangements are made even more effective than those now existing.

*MR. LEAKE: Are we to understand that the right hon. Gentleman takes the denial of the Magistrates mentioned, rather than the statements made by eye-witnesses and ear-witnesses, and by hon. Members in their place in this House?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Those Magistrates were eye-witnesses and ear-witnesses of the facts.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Will evidence on oath be received if tendered; or does the right hon. Gentleman prefer to take the simple word of Magistrates who are themselves incriminated?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I should like to know the circumstances under which the evidence on oath would be tendered.

MR. GILL (Louth, S.): Five hon. Members agree in making a statement. Does the right hon. Gentleman not consider that sufficient for an inquiry?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir. The grounds for an inquiry on oath are not so simple as the hon. Member seems to imagine. I am strictly following precedent.

MR. GILL: Is the word of Colonel Cadell to be taken in preference to the word of five hon. Members?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Colonel Cadell is a man in every way worthy of credence.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): If four or five affidavits are laid before the Government, will the right hon. Gentleman order an inquiry on oath?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no power to order an inquiry on oath.

MR. SEXTON: Is the right hon. Gentleman not aware that the Constabulary Code provides for an inquiry?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: For a Departmental Inquiry. If sufficient evidence is placed before me which, in my opinion, justifies a Departmental Inquiry, that may be held; but I will give no antecedent promise on the subject until I see the nature of the evidence.

*MR. LEAKE: Is the House to understand that the very explicit words alleged to have been used by Mr. Shannon are due to the imagination of the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon).

MR. GILL: Does the Chief Secretary consider the words of five Members of this House worthy of the same credence as the words of Colonel Cadell. Does the right hon. Gentleman desire to imply that they are not worthy of consideration?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; I do not.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): Is it customary for Resident Magistrates to exercise judicial as well as executive functions?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is perfectly true that any Resident Magistrate may be called upon to exercise judicial as well as executive functions; but he does not exercise a judicial function in regard to the same services and transactions as he exercises an executive function. The two functions are divided.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Does the right hon. Gentleman call a baton charge an executive function?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Certainly, Sir.

IRISH PRISON WARDERS.

MR. CONYBEARE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what is the number of warders that constitutes a complete staff in each of the three classes into which the ordinary prisons of Ireland are divided; whether the staff in all classes have to do the same duty, and observe the same hours; what is the average number of hours per week each warder in each class of prison has to work; how often has a warder in each class to do night duty per month; how many holidays or half-holidays (exclusive of half-days before and after night duty) a warder gets in a month; is a warder ever entitled to a holiday except on the recommendation of the Governor; if the staff of a prison is reduced, owing to sickness or from any other cause, must the other warders in the prison do the duty of the absent warder or warders; do the warders performing such extra duty get any extra pay; and have old-service warders been deprived, by a Minute of the Treasury, of the pension they were entitled to as prevailing at the time they entered the Service?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The General Prisons Board report that the number of warders is not uniform in any class of prisons, but is regulated under Treasury sanction, according to the circumstances of each prison. The duties and hours of the staffs of the different prisons necessarily vary considerably according to circumstances. The average number of hours of actual duty per week may be taken to be about 82 in the larger prisons. In small prisons, where the staffs are limited, these hours are sometimes necessarily exceeded, but in these cases the general duties are of a much lighter character. In most prisons night duty is taken by each warder about three or four times in the month. In most prisons the warders get a half-holiday on every second Sunday and prison holiday. No holidays are granted, except on special application, but each warder is entitled to 14 days' annual leave. When the staff of a prison is temporarily reduced owing to the sickness of a warder or other cause, sometimes the other warders of the prison are required to do the duty of the absent warder; in other cases extra assistance is supplied, if possible, from another prison. There is no provision enabling the Board to give extra pay in such cases. The Board are not aware what Treasury Minute is referred to; but the Prisons Act of 1877 (section 27) provides that old prison officers shall hold their offices on like terms and tenure as before the Act.

MR. CONYBEARE: Have not many warders refused the half-holidays because they had to wear uniform?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no such information.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Is it not the fact that before the right hon. Gentleman took office warders were allowed to spend their holidays out of uniform?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It may be so, but I have had nothing to do with it.

CHARGES OF RIOT AND ASSAULT AT PORTUMNA.

Mr. ROCHE (Galway, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to the inquiry made by the Constabulary Authorities into the conduct of Constables O'Gowan and M'Grady, as disclosed in the evidence given in the dismissed cases of riot and assault brought by them against five men before two Resident Magistrates at Portumna, on 27th May last, whether he can now state the result of that investigation?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that the officers who inquired into the case find that the constables, while not drunk, had taken more intoxicating liquor on the occasion in question than men employed on responsible duty should indulge in. With regard to one of the constables, I am informed some further steps will be necessary before his case can be dealt with. The case of the other constable does not now arise in connection with this matter, as he is being discharged from the force in consequence of a serious breach of discipline, subsequently committed.

Mr. SEXTON: Has there been any finding upon the evidence given by the constables, which was found to be false?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I have given the hon. Member all the information I possess.

Mr. MAC NEILL: Has it been found that the constable who said he discharged his gun in self-defence was justified in discharging his gun?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: The case of one constable is still sub judice, and the other constable has been dismissed.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: Is there any objection to prosecuting the constables for perjury, as they apparently perjured themselves in getting up the case against the five men?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: The whole matter is under consideration.

"SHADOWING" BY THE IRISH POLICE.

Mr. PICTON (Leicester): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what are the authorities or official persons who determine whether any individual is so notoriously engaged in boycotting or intimidation as to be rightly subject to shadowing by the police in Ireland; whether such authorities or official persons take any evidence before they order a man to be shadowed; whether the accused has any opportunity of defence; and is there any limit fixed to the period during which a man may be shadowed without being brought before a legal tribunal to be tried for the offence in which he is held to be notoriously engaged?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: The Divisional Commissioner or other Local Authority responsible for the carrying out of the law in the district directs the duty in question. The directions are given on information being forthcoming that the suspect is actively engaged in promoting illegal practices. It is not usual to inform the suspected person that he is being watched. To do so would render the obtaining of evidence with a view to prosecution more difficult. No limit of the nature mentioned in the last paragraph can be fixed, but, as I explained yesterday, the shadowing is at once stopped as soon as there is any ground for thinking it unnecessary.

Mr. PICTON: Does the right hon. Gentleman's answer apply to the new method of shadowing, by which one constable walks abreast of the shadowed man and another at his heels?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: It applies to all shadowing in Ireland.

Mr. BRADLAUGH: On what authority can anyone connected with the police give directions which could not possibly be for the detection or prevention of crime?

Mr. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman see that a record of these orders for shadowing is kept, so that it may not be in the power of any constable to inflict this nuisance without leaving some trace of it behind?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: There is always some such record kept, I imagine. With regard to the question of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) the prevention and reduction of crime is the justification for this shadowing.

Mr. CONYBEARE: Will the right hon. Gentleman state on what authority, or upon what suspicion of crime, three ladies—namely, Lady Sandhurst, Miss Conybeare, and Miss Vivian—were shadowed by the police in Tipperary in the early days of July last year?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the hon. Member will give notice of that question I will make inquiries on the subject.

DR. KENNY: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is aware that this system of shadowing has gone on to such an extent, and is of such an indiscriminate character, that two most respectable persons, who came from Manchester to Tipperary from mere motives of curiosity and to gain information, were also shadowed by the police to such an extent that that they were obliged to return to Dublin in disgust; and whether one of the persons shadowed was not connected with the right hon. Gentleman's Election Committee in Manchester?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the hon. Gentleman has got an incorrect version of the facts; but I will, if he wishes me to do so, make further inquiry.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Has the right hon. Gentleman any statistics as to the number of persons shadowed, and the number of police employed in that service?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must have notice of the question.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Does the right hon. Gentleman not know the number?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Of course I do not know the number. I do not carry these statistics in my head.

MR. GILL: With reference to the new method of shadowing—namely, walking side by side with the person shadowed, and another policeman following at his heels—I desire to ask the right hon. Gentleman what constitutes the superiority of that system over the old method?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether any charge of boycotting or intimidation has been made against the Rev. David Macrae, a minister of religion at Dundee, who is at present travelling in Ireland for the benefit of his health; and on what grounds he was recently "shadowed" by the police while travelling from Newbridge to Clongorey?

MR. CAREW (Kildare, N.): I have also to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Rev. Mr. Macrae, of Dundee, and his wife, when visiting Clongorey on Thursday last, were shadowed by a policeman—name Keating, who followed them from point to point on a bicycle, going everywhere the visitors went to; and whether he can say why they were so shadowed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have asked for information, but have not yet obtained it. It is, therefore, necessary that I should ask for further time.

TENANTS OF TOWN PARKS IN IRELAND.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state under what provision of the Land Purchase (Ireland) Bill the tenants of town parks in Ireland are entitled to relief without the consent of the landlord; and whether he will introduce a clause to enable them to have fair rents fixed in respect of their holdings?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Of course, the purchase must be by mutual consent.

COLOUR BLINDNESS AMONG SAILORS.

MR. WIGGIN (Staffordshire, Handsworth): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if the Committee who were appointed to investigate the subject of colour blindness amongst our Mercantile Marine have yet reported; and, if not, when they will be likely to do so; and if he could briefly state the mode adopted for testing?

*MR. M. HICKS BEACH: I conclude that the hon. Member refers to the Committee of the Royal Society, which is investigating this subject. The Committee was only appointed in March, and I have not yet heard when it is likely to make its Report.

LITERATURE FOR IRISH PAUPERS.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Boards of Guardians in Ireland are empowered, as similar Bodies are in England, to defray out of the rates the cost of supplying the inmates of workhouses with newspapers, periodicals, and books; whether he is aware that the President of the Local Government Board in England has directed that the Inspectors of the Local Government Board shall be instructed, in connection with their visits to workhouses, to give this subject their special attention, and to report to the Board as to the views and practice of the Guardians with respect to such supply; whether he will give, if he can do so legally, similar directions to Local Government Board Inspectors in Ireland; and whether, if the law in Ireland is in this respect different from the law in England, the Government will introduce a measure for the assimilation of the law in Ireland to the law in England on this subject?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is no enactment specifically authorising Boards of Guardians to provide a supply of literature for workhouse inmates from the rates, though it is possible they may have such authority under their general powers. I am aware of the action taken in England referred to in the second paragraph. I am causing similar action to be taken in Ireland, and shall give the whole matter careful consideration.

THE FERMOY PROSECUTIONS.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether civil processes for damages have been issued by Mr. Thomas Barry, P.L.G., against District Inspectors Ball and Sergeant, R.I.C., Currabeha, Fermoy, in which the defendants are charged with assaulting and wounding the plaintiff; and whether, since plaintiff announced his intention of proceeding by civil bill for the assault, he has been served with a summons for having obstructed the police?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The legal proceedings appear to be still pending, and it would not be proper for me to make a statement in the matter.

MR. FLYNN: It is because legal proceedings are still proceeding that I put the question on the Paper.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am unwilling to answer a matter of fact in the question, because it might prejudice the action.

MR. T. M. HEALY: What is the matter of fact which might prejudice the case?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As far as I am concerned I should be glad to answer the question; what I refer to is the question of the dates of the two actions.

MR. T. M. HEALY: When Mr. Barry said that he would proceed against the police did they say that if he did so they would bring that charge against him?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think that the hon. Gentleman is in error. As he presses the question I will inform him that the police summons was on the 6th; the notification of the civil case was on the 9th.

MR. T. M. HEALY: That is not the point, as the right hon. Gentleman well knows. The point is that Mr. Barry, having informed the police that he should proceed civilly against them they immediately served him with notice of prosecution.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I know nothing of any threat on the part of Mr. Barry.

CATHOLICS IN IRISH PRISONS.

MR. CONYBEARE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state, for each of the months since September last, the number of Catholic prisoners confined in Derry Gaol, and the terms for which they have been imprisoned; whether any Catholic clergyman has, during that period, been permitted to visit such prisoners; has any Catholic service been conducted in the prison chapel during that period; whether he still refuses to sanction the appointment by the Bishop of the Diocese to the prison chaplaincy of such clergyman as the Bishop may see fit to nominate?

MR. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): May I ask if the hon. Member for Camborne, when in prison, received the ministrations of a Catholic chaplain?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The answer to the first paragraph is too long to read to the House, but I have directed a copy to be sent to the hon. Member who puts the question. Many of the prisoners have been confined but a very short time in Londonderry Prison, as since December last those Roman Catholic prisoners whose sentences amounted to a month or more have from week to week been removed to another prison to which a Roman Catholic clergyman is attached. In accordance with the practice of the Service, in relation to prisoners of any denomination other than those of the paid chaplains attached to a prison, the Governor of Londonderry Prison duly reports to the nearest officiating Roman Catholic clergyman the committal of every new prisoner of that religion, with an intimation that permission can be had for visiting such prisoners. Such permission has, however, been availed of by the Roman Catholic clergyman of the district only eight times during the period in question, and then only at the request of individual prisoners. Owing to the refusal of the Vicar Capitular to nominate a successor to the late Roman Catholic chaplain, as fully explained in reply to a Parliamentary question in February last, no service has been conducted in the Roman Catholic Chapel in this prison during the period named. The Board are and have been most anxious that the Roman Catholic Bishop should nominate a clergyman to this prison, and in two letters addressed to the Vicar Capitular in September last they specially invited him to nominate some clergyman as successor to the late chaplain. Up to the present, however, they regret to state no such nomination has been made.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Was this one of the questions with regard to which Sir L. Simmonds was sent to communicate with the Pope, while pretending to go over about the Malta marriage question?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. MACNEILL: Is it not a fact that the Rev. Dr. O'Doherty, the Roman Catholic chaplain of Derry Gaol, was dismissed from his office because he refused to attend a local inquiry held by Mr. Joyce, and refused to answer questions which he considered ought not to have been put to him as a Roman Catholic chaplain; has his action been ratified by the Vicar Capitular of the diocese; whether since September last there has been no Roman Catholic chaplain in Derry Gaol; and whether Catholics under lengthened terms of punishment have been removed to Belfast and other prisons?

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman will obtain better information by putting a question on the Paper.

MR. MACNEILL: As a matter of personal explanation, I may say that I have asked every one of these questions before.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

DR. KENNY: Has not Dr. O'Doherty been re-nominated?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Mr. O'Doherty was dismissed for breaking the Prison Regulations. If hon. Members wish for the details I must ask them to put a question on the Paper. I think it will not be denied that the ordinary procedure expected from a prison official was not followed, and we cannot accept his re-nomination by the Bishop of the diocese.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Have the Government gone the length of remonstrating at Rome as to the conduct of the Bishop?

MR. PARNELL: Does the right hon. Gentleman think that Roman Catholic prisoners should be permanently deprived of the consolation of their religion, in order to gratify his feelings as to the duties of the Roman Catholic Bishops? I think that this is not an unreasonable question, seeing that many months have elapsed during which these prisoners have been without any of the administrations of their religion.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have done my very best to minimise the evil effects of the action of the Vicar Capitular in this case, by sending the prisoners, as far as possible, to other prisons: I wish that my efforts in this direction had been seconded by the acting Bishop.

MR. P. O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): Was not a summons served on Dr. McAlroy, chaplain of Tullamore Gaol, to give evidence before Mr. Joyce relative to a suit of clothes which was taken in to the hon. Member for North-East Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien) when a prisoner in that gaol; and is it not a fact that although Dr. McAlroy refused to appear or give evidence he was neither dismissed or censured; and whether he, the Chief Secretary, can explain why Father O'Doherty has been differently dealt with?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must ask for notice of that question.

MR. MACNEILL: Was not the only offence of the Rev. Dr. O'Doherty that Mr. Joyce, the Prisons Board Inspector, had written a letter asking him to come over and give evidence in an investigation in a friendly way, and that Dr. O'Doherty had not done so?

DR. KENNY: What are the ill-effects of the action of Dr. O'Doherty?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : The principal evil effected is that some of these prisoners have been deprived of the administrations of their religion.

"REGINA V. MITCHELL."

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM : I beg to ask Mr. Attorney General, with reference to the confidential character of communications which passed between the Attorney General and the counsel for General Mitchell, whether he is aware that Messrs. Hare & Co., Agents to the Treasury, produced in Taxing Chambers Court of Queen's Bench a copy of one of these confidential letters to Master Archibald, taxing master, in support of a series of claims in their bill of costs in connection with the compromise; whether the gallant plaintiff reported the fact some weeks ago to the Attorney General; and whether Master Archibald struck out the whole of the items, and commented strongly on the course pursued by the Agents for the Crown?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight) : The hon. Member has been completely misinformed. One letter from Colonel Mitchell's counsel was produced at his request; otherwise it could not have been read. As I, in common with other members of the Government, have received a large number of letters from Colonel Mitchell, it is not possible for me to say whether he had referred to the fact or not. There is not the slightest foundation for the suggestion that Master Archibald commented strongly or adversely on the course pursued by Messrs. Hare & Co. in the matter referred to in the hon. Member's question.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he will, in view of the decision in the Courts of Law in "Mitchell v. Regina," cancel the letter dated Treasury Chambers, 31st March, 1888, addressed to the Secretary of State for War?

MR. W. H. SMITH : Search has been made, and no Treasury letter, relative to the Mitchell case, of the date named, or approaching that date, can be traced. If the hon. Member will furnish me with fuller particulars further search will be made.

HEREDITARY PENSIONS.

MR. HANBURY : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when he expects to be able to state to the House the long-promised proposals of the Treasury for the extinction of the remainder of the hereditary pensions, including some of the most contested of them; and whether, meanwhile, these all alike continue to be paid in full?

MR. GOSCHEN : With regard to the proposals that were promised by the Treasury for the extinction of the remainder of the hereditary pensions, it is necessary that every case should be gone into separately. I am so much engaged at present that I am unable to give that minute attention to the subject which I desire that it should have. The pensions will be paid, as the Government have no option in the matter.

THE PROPOSED COMMITTEE ON LICENSING.

MR. CAINE (Barrow-in-Furness) : In the absence of my hon. Friend the Member for the St. Ives Division of Cornwall, I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the intention of the Government to appoint a Select Committee to inquire into the licensing system, especially with regard to the question of compensation, he will consider the desirability of instructing County Councils not to part with any money allocated to them for the extinction of licences until the Committee has reported to the House?

*MR. W. H. SMITH : I understood the hon. Member was not going to put this question, and, therefore, am not prepared with an answer. The Committee referred to in the question at one time appeared to be desirable, but now it appears it is objected to. It must not be assumed the Government had the attention ascribed to them.

SIR W. HARCOURT : Arising out of this question I desire to ask the First Lord of the Treasury a question of which I have given him private notice. The following letter appeared in the Times of this morning:—

"Lord Wolmer has addressed the following letter to Mr. J. Shelly, Chairman of the Executive of the Devon and Cornwall Liberal Unionist Association:—

'Great George Street, Westminster, June 14.

'Dear Mr. Shelly,—Lord Hartington desires me to thank you for the information which you have given him of the strong opinions averse to certain clauses of the Local Government Bill, held by many of the staunchest and most valuable members of the Liberal Unionist Party in Devonshire and Cornwall. The opinion of these gentlemen is naturally a matter of much importance to the Liberal Unionist Party, and Lord Hartington desires me to assure you that he has given the very fullest consideration to the views and objections which they have put forward. The Government have consented to accept the Amendment proposed by Mr. Heneage, to insert a clause to the following effect:—"Provided always that nothing in this Act contained shall be construed as altering the existing law affecting the renewal of licences, or as giving to the holder of any licence any right or privilege other than that now enjoyed by him." Before it was known that the Government were willing to accept this Amendment, it is certain that many earnest temperance reformers honestly feared that the Bill would have the effect of altering the legal position of the publican: but now that this clause is to be added to it, Lord Hartington is unable to understand how it can be seriously contended, either that a vested interest not at present existing is created by this Bill, or that temperance legislation in the future can be prejudiced by it. The Government have also determined to propose next year that a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into and consider the questions on compensation which have been raised by the present and other proposals. The facts elicited by such an inquiry and the Report of such a Select Committee cannot fail greatly to facilitate the progress of temperance legislation in the future. The consideration of these facts will, Lord Hartington hopes, tend to allay the opposition of Liberal Unionists to the present attitude of the Government on this question.

'Believe me yours very truly,

'WOLMER.' "

Having read that letter I desire to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the statement made by Lord Wolmer in the name of Lord Hartington is or is not well founded?

VISCOUNT WOLMER (Hants, Petersfield): Perhaps the House will allow me to make a personal explanation in relation to this letter. I am authorised by Lord Hartington to say that he saw the draft of my letter to Mr. Shelly before it was sent, but that he did not particularly notice the expression "determined to propose," and that if he had he should have altered it into "are prepared to assent to," but that he did not, and does not now, attach the importance to the distinction which the right hon. Member for Derby appears to attach to it.

Sir W. Harcourt

*MR. SPEAKER: The noble Lord's remarks are hardly in the nature of a personal explanation.

SIR W. HARCOURT: After what the noble Lord calls a personal explanation, I have to repeat my question to the right hon. Gentleman—namely, whether the statement made by Lord Wolmer, on behalf of Lord Hartington, to induce the Liberal Unionists to vote for this Bill, is or is not well founded?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I thought we discussed this subject sufficiently last night; and I then stated to what extent the statement of the intentions of the Government was accurate. Lord Hartington appears to have been under the impression that the Government were willing that a Committee should be appointed. I have already explained, in answer to the hon. Member for Barrow, that the Government were under the impression that such a Committee was desired in many parts of the House, but certainly it was not the intention of the Government to move for such a Committee, and it is not the intention of the Government to ask the House to accept such a Committee, unless it is the strong desire of the House they should do so.

MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): Does the right hon. Gentleman still adhere to the statement that the announcement of the Committee was not made to influence public opinion?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am strongly of the belief that that was so; but the hon. Gentleman is quite able to form his own opinion, and is not bound by mine.

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): Is it the present intention of the Government to propose the Committee next year?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I stated a few minutes ago that we had certainly no intention of moving for such a Committee.

MR. D. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): I will ask why the intention to appoint that Committee, which, as was explained by the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale, was entertained ever since the introduction of the noble Lord the Member for Paddington's Bill, was not divulged to the House during the discussion on the Local Taxation Bill, considering it would have had a most important bearing on the Bill.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I must really demur to the statement the hon. and learned Gentleman has made. He has attributed to the Government an intention which we do not entertain.

THE COURSE OF BUSINESS.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he can now say whether the Government intend to ask the House to pass the Land Purchase Bill this year; and what proposal, if any, they will make in regard to the business of the House? I should also like to ask when the Government intend to introduce the Local Government Bill for Ireland, which was promised in Her Majesty's speech at the opening of the Session?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Perhaps it will be convenient that I should now make the statement which has been promised as to the course of public business. With reference to the last question asked, I am afraid I can make no engagement, so far as the present Session is concerned, and I think the hon. Member will see himself that the work which we have in hand would not justify the Government in asking the House to consider a question of such very great magnitude and complexity as that.

MR. SEXTON: You might print the Bill.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am myself of opinion that that course would be very undesirable. I have been under an engagement to the House to refer to the course of public business and the recommendations of the Government to facilitate the further progress of business. I must ask the House to cast its recollection back to the Debate which took place in March last on the Motion made by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Bridgeton, in which he endeavoured to bring us to the conclusion that it was most desirable that our sittings should be terminated earlier than has hitherto been customary, and also to bring about an earlier meeting of Parliament. I have from time to time been asked by hon. Gentlemen opposite as to the measures which the Government would propose with a view to effect what we understand to be the general wish of the House. Although that wish was not expressed by a decided majority of the House, it was the duty of the Government to give its serious consideration to the arguments used and the vote by which those arguments were supported. We were sensible of the fact that hon. Gentlemen who voted with us, in opposition to the Motion of the right hon. Baronet, did so although desiring that the Session might, as a rule, be brought to a conclusion at an earlier period. The Government have very carefully considered the measures necessary to accomplish that wish. One of those measures certainly would be an earlier assembly of Parliament than has hitherto been customary. Another would be, I hope, and I say so with great respect, some curtailment of the Debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. A more important measure which we desire to propose for the consideration of the House is that a Standing Order should be passed under which it would be possible to suspend a Bill of great complexity, great detail, and considerable minutiae which has been frequently in the possession of the House, but as to which when the month of June or July is reached insufficient time remains for its careful consideration in Committee. I refer to Bills of the character of the Land Purchase Bill, which ought not to be pushed through the House at any great or accelerated speed, on account of the varied and important interests involved.

An hon. MEMBER: You pushed the Coercion Act through the House.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am endeavouring to avoid any question which will occasion any controversy. I am endeavouring to avoid questions of controversy now. I am endeavouring to propose to the House regulations for the conduct of the business of the House, in the belief, and with a desire, that they will improve the procedure of the House, and enable it, whatever Government may be in power, to dispose of its business in a more satisfactory manner. The proposal we desire to make to the House is one by which it will be possible to suspend a Bill which has reached the Committee stage, by a Motion made in the then Session of Parliament, to carry it over to the next Session of Parliament, it being always understood that that Session is a Session of the existing Parliament. It will not be proposed that any suspended Bills should be taken up in a new Parliament, but that Parliament should be at liberty to take the suspended Bill up in a Session of the same Parliament, and to take it up on nearly the same footing as if it were an adjournment of the Session. The proposal we shall make is that a Standing Order should be passed, the terms of which will be placed on the Table either to-morrow or on Thursday. I will read the general terms of that Standing Order, without binding myself absolutely to the exact words. I am sure no hon. Member would desire that I should be bound absolutely to every word I will now give to the House. I shall move—

“That, in future Sessions after July 15, and in the present Session, after a day to be hereafter appointed, no public Bills (except money Bills, Continuance Bills, and Bills returned from the Lords, with Amendments) shall be further proceeded with, provided that, in respect of any public Bill which is in progress in Committee of the whole House, or in a Standing Committee, or which has been reported therefrom, a Motion may be made, after notice given, that further proceedings on such Bill be suspended until the next Session. If such Motion be carried, then in the ensuing Session (being a Session of the same Parliament) any Member whose name was on the suspended Bill may claim ‘that the Resolution of the previous Session be read.’ Thereupon the Speaker shall direct the Clerk to read the Resolution, and shall proceed to call on the Member to present the Bill in the form in which it stood when the proceedings thereon were suspended; and the questions on the First and Second Readings thereof shall be successively put forthwith. If both these questions be carried, the Bill shall be ordered to be printed, and if it had been partly considered in Committee in the previous Session, it shall stand committed to a similar Committee, and it shall be an Instruction to such Committee to begin their consideration of the Bill at the clause on which Progress was reported in the previous Session; but if it had been reported from Committee in the previous Session, the consideration of the Bill as reported shall be appointed for that day week.”

We have sought, in framing this proposed Standing Order, to preserve to members all the rights and duties which belong to them in respect of the progress of any measure as far as the future progress of the measure is concerned, so that it will be taken up, after the formal first and second reading has been approved by the House, precisely at the point at which it was left in the previous Session, and any Amendments and any notices regarding the Bill will have to be dealt with according to the ordinary

Mr. W. H. Smith

Rules and Regulations of the House. I think the best explanation I can give of the measure is that, consistently with the Rules of the House and consistently with the fact that in every Session a Bill must be read the first and second time, it will be simply an adjournment of the proceedings on a Bill, analogous in all respects to the adjournment which may take place with regard to a Bill in Committee from one day to another, from one week to another, and from one month to another. It will, perhaps, save time if I refrain from going into any argument in support of the proposal which I shall make on a later day, seeing that that will probably be the best time for the consideration of any objection that might possibly be urged. Presuming—which I hope may not be a rash presumption—that the House will be willing to adopt the Standing Order, which, I believe, will tend greatly to facilitate our business, I should ask the House to adjourn certainly the consideration of the Land Purchase (Ireland) Bill in Committee until next Session. I shall ask the House to continue and to pass the Local Taxation Bill which I believe is the only seriously contentious business, apart from the Irish Land Bill, which remains for the consideration of the House. I hope it may be possible to pass the Tithe Bill without very serious contention. I believe that the House generally does not desire that that question—a very thorny and difficult one—should remain undisposed of, and that we shall, if possible, arrive at a settlement which shall be fair and reasonable to all concerned, and which shall preserve a property which certainly neither the land lord, nor the farmer, nor the occupier in any sense has any claim or right to. I regard with apprehension the continuance of a condition of things which renders it possible that such a property may be in any degree damaged or lost. There is another Bill of very considerable importance which arises out of the proposals of Her Majesty's Government, and which is now in possession of the House, although it has not yet been read a second time, and that is the Police Bill. That, I hope is a Bill which is to be regarded as not a contentious measure or a Party measure, and, having regard to the importance of the claims of a most deserving body of men throughout the country, I hope I may regard that Bill as one which will not be met by what I should call Party opposition; and in case of that Bill being read a second time within a reasonable time, I think it may well go to a Standing Committee, in order that all the clauses and the schedules may be most carefully examined in the manner in which Standing Committees of this House do discharge their duties to the House. The Government will be prepared to accept the work of that Committee—I will not say absolutely, because it would be dangerous to say beforehand what the Government may feel it their duty to do—but the Standing Committee will, I am sure, deal with a Bill of this character in such a manner that the Government will, I hope, be able to accept their conclusions. There are two other Bills which have been frequently referred to, one by my hon. Friend behind me, and one by the junior Member for Northampton. I refer to the Western Australia Bill and to the Indian Councils Bill. These Bills must be passed. I say that with due respect to the House; but we feel that they must be passed in the course of the present Session, and we shall certainly put them in a front place at the earliest possible period, and shall ask the House to consider them as soon as we are relieved from Committee on the Local Taxation Bill. The Barracks Bill is also a measure of very great importance. It is not a large measure. It is one on which some difference of opinion prevails, and it is right that that difference of opinion should be fairly and fully discussed, but I hope it will pass without much delay. There is a Bill which has not been introduced, and as to which I hope little difficulty will arise. That is the Census Bill, which must also be passed this year. There remain two or three other measures, which, I think, are not contentious measures—one is the Housing of the Working Classes Amendment and Consolidation Bill—as to which I believe hon. Members on both sides of the House are in agreement that it is desirable that these measures should be passed into law this Session. The course we shall take with regard to these measures is to read them a second time, as quickly as possible, and send them to a Standing Committee. There is the Savings Banks Bill, to which I hope there will be very little opposition. There is a Bill which we should have been very glad to have passed into law this year, if time had permitted, but hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House have given notice of opposition, and have informed me privately, in the most frank manner, that they would feel it their duty to raise considerable discussion upon it. I refer to the Employers' Liability Bill. Under these circumstances, I do not think it would be possible for us to persevere with that Bill this Session. There is also another Bill with which we should wish to proceed, if possible, and I hope that an arrangement may be made with Scotch Members which will enable progress to be made with that measure. I refer to the Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill, but if it should meet with anything like persistent opposition, it is not one in regard to which we should ask the House to prolong its sitting. I have not referred to all the Bills on the Paper, but I have referred to all the Bills of an important character, or rather of a character that would be likely to cause considerable discussion. There is also the Electoral Disabilities Removal Bill, which is a measure of some importance, and we shall endeavour to find time for it, but it is obvious that we cannot ask the House to sit for a prolonged period in order to pass that Bill. With regard to the Friendly Societies Bill, I am afraid it is not possible to pass that Bill this Session. The question is one of importance, but it is again one of those measures which, although not of a Party character, still deserves to be fully discussed, and, looking at the period of the Session and the desire of the House for an earlier adjournment than we have been accustomed to of late years, I am afraid it will be necessary to postpone its consideration for another Session. I am not aware whether there is any other point to which I need refer on the present occasion. It is obvious that we shall be desirous of proceeding with Supply at the earliest possible moment. We have no wish but to wind up the business of the Session as soon as possible. Probably there are few persons in this House on whom public business presses with so much severity as those who sit on these Benches, and there can be no desire on our part to prolong the Session.

MR. SEXTON: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he intends going through this enormous legislative programme before he comes to the financial business of the Session?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. Gentleman will find, when he considers the various measures I have referred to, that the legislative programme is not so enormous as he supposes. We desire to proceed with the Local Taxation Bill, but my impression is that a very few days will be sufficient to dispose of the other business to which I have referred. Almost the whole of them are practically of a non-contentious character. The Government do not intend to take up Supply until the Local Taxation Bill has been disposed of. There is the question of the Police Vote. With reference to all the circumstances of the case, the Government think it desirable that this should be considered as early as possible. We propose, therefore, to take the Vote on Friday—[An hon. MEMBER: What Vote?—the Metropolitan Police—and the Standing Order on Monday. I shall endeavour to place the Standing Order in the hands of Members on Thursday, and not later than Friday.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): Do the Government propose to take a Vote on Account?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I hope not, Sir.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): I rise for a very narrow and specific purpose, because I draw a broad distinction between the important statement which the right hon. Gentleman has just made with respect to the arrangement of the business for the present Session, and the notice he has given for the introduction of a new measure with respect to the business both now and hereafter. I presume the statement of the arrangements for the present Session may require some discussion, but into that I do not intend to go. I rise merely for the purpose of giving a notice and putting a question. We have heard the right hon. Gentleman's draft of the Standing Order, and I quite concur that he ought not to be held bound to the particular expressions of his Standing Order, particularly after the doctrine laid down to-night as to the explanation of a very important letter which appeared in the Times. The right hon. Gentleman is entitled to that after what we have heard as to the licences of construction and amendment. But that is not the matter in hand. The right hon. Gentleman seems to have given his notice, and I wish to give another notice on the same subject and in the same sense. I do not give the precise terms, but I wish to state that a Motion will be made, when the right hon. Gentleman proposes his Standing Order, from this side of the House, to the effect that so grave a change in the usage of Parliament and the practice of the Constitution ought not to be made without our having, agreeably to former precedents, previous examination by a carefully-selected Committee. That is the notice I have to give; but I wish also to put a question in the nature of a suggestion to the right hon. Gentleman, and I hope this further proposal will be acceptable to the right hon. Gentleman. It is in the nature of a suggestion—it is that, inasmuch as the subject has been on previous occasions before the House, all Bills which would now be extremely difficult of access—those Bills representing the positive action of the other branch of the Legislature, or representing proposals which that portion of the Legislature has entertained; I would ask whether the right hon. Gentleman will give directions for the re-printing of those Bills, and that they be circulated so that hon. Members may have the benefit of knowing the contents of those Bills?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I shall endeavour to comply with the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman, and the Bills shall be printed and circulated.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I have no doubt there will be included the Report of the Committee of this House upon a Bill sent down in 1848.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I shall take care that the fullest information, as far as possible, shall be communicated to the House.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I wish to ask a question of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, after the announcement which we have just heard as to the Land Purchase Bill. As the right hon. Gentleman is aware, with regard to the Ashbourne Act of 1888, it is not in the power of the Commissioners to receive applications after the funds placed at their disposal are exhausted. I have reason to believe that the funds will be exhausted certainly before the end of this year. The announcement that the Land Bill is to be abandoned for this year puts us in this position—the Bill can hardly become law for another 12 months, so that for a period of six months the Ashbourne Act will be suspended. I want to know whether the right hon. Gentleman is prepared for that suspension.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the right hon. Gentleman is unduly depressed both as to the amount of money and with regard to the time that it will take for the Land Bill to pass into law. He anticipates that the surplus money under the Ashbourne Act will all have been exhausted. I hope both prophecies are below the mark. I trust the money will last longer than he thinks, and I have every expectation that the Bill will have passed into law long before another year has passed by. If he asks me whether I should regret that any interval should elapse between the final conclusion of the Ashbourne Act and the inception of the policy of the Land Bill, I reply I should greatly regret it; and if it should arise it will be from other causes than those over which I have control. I shall not be responsible for it.

MR. J. MORLEY: The right hon. Gentleman says that he should regret if there should be any suspension, and yet he says that the applications will not be sufficiently numerous to exhaust the funds. Those statements are opposed to each other.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Surely not.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I hope, now that the Land Purchase Bill has been abandoned till next Session, and in view of what took place in the Second Reading Debate, the Local Government Bill will be laid before the House and printed and circulated before we are called on to proceed further with the Land Bill.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I should require notice of that.

MR. DILLON: I shall repeat it tomorrow.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I ask as to the India Councils Bill. I hope we shall have full notice when it will be taken. We ought to have at least two days' notice, and that should be possible under the new arrangement.

*MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): I shall be glad if the First Lord will inform us when we shall have an opportunity of discussing the Report of the Royal Commission presided over by the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale?

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I beg to give notice that when the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House moves his Standing Order, I shall move that it be extended to Bills passed by this House and rejected by the House of Lords.

*SIR U. KAY - SHUTTLEWORTH (Lancashire, Clitheroe): What will be done with regard to the Industrial Schools Bill and the Reformatories Bill, which have lately come from the House of Lords?

*MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): Are we to understand that when Bills are suspended by the Standing Order the Amendments will also be carried over?

*MR. POWELL WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.): Will there be an earlier meeting of Parliament than usual next year?

*CAPTAIN VERNEY: I should like to remind the Government that two years ago the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury gave a definite and personal pledge to introduce a District Councils Bill in the Session next ensuing.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will be good enough to state whether, in arranging the programme, he has made any estimate of the day in December this Session will come to a close?

SIR W. HARCOURT: Do we understand that the right hon. Gentleman intends to sacrifice the Employers' Liability Bill to this Compensation Bill? I want a definite answer. If that Bill is not proceeded with very great objection will be taken to the Compensation Bill. Does the right hon. Gentleman mean to employ the time of the House on the Local Taxation Bill, to the exclusion of the Employers' Liability Bill?

MR. H. GARDNER: Will the Tithes Bill be taken after the Local Taxation Bill?

MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): Will the Leader of the House consider the propriety of taking Wednesdays?

MR. D. CRAWFORD: The right hon. Gentleman has overlooked the Corrupt Practices (Municipal Elections) Bill. It has been returned by the Grand Committee.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): There is the Police Superannuation Bill for Scotland. Is it intended to pass that during the present Session; and, if so, will it come into operation during the current year?

(5.30.) MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: May I ask whether it is intended to take any action on the Report of the Sweating Committee?

(5.30.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I would ask why, when the Government pledged themselves to introduce a measure of Local Government for Ireland, nothing has been heard of it, while the Licensing Bill, of which no mention was made in the Queen's Speech, has been thrust to the front. As the Land Purchase Bill has been dropped, when may the House expect to see signs of the great Government policy for Ireland which was promised as far back as 1886?

*(5.31.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I will endeavour to reply to the numerous questions which have been addressed to me in the order in which they were asked; but in reply to the hon. Member for West Belfast, I may say that I proposed to move the Resolution on Monday next. In view of the request of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, that the House should be furnished with copies of certain Bills and that every effort should be made to place them in the hands of Members at once, I shall have to see whether it is possible to adhere to Monday. As to the Indian Councils Bill, the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) must see that at present I cannot hold myself bound to any particular date. Notice will be given before the Bill is taken. The Government hope that the Employers' Liability Bill will be received with consideration and without occupying much of the time of the House. The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Broadhurst) shakes his head, and if he implies by that that much time will be occupied in dealing with the measure, I am afraid it will be impossible to take it. This, and the Reformatory and Industrial Schools Bill, are non-contentious Bills—if they are contentious, there will be difficulties in the way of proceeding with them. But we shall place the Bills before the House, and it will be for the House to say whether they are to become law. As to the Report of the Royal Commission, the understanding is that any observations which hon. Gentlemen may think it right to make on that Report will be properly taken on the War Office Vote, which we shall put forward as soon as possible. An hon. Member asked whether the Amendments on the Paper to the Land Purchase (Ireland) Bill, which is to be suspended, can be carried over to next Session. My impression is that it will be possible to do that; but under any circumstances, the Amendments can remain on the Paper, and it will be for hon. Members to direct the clerk at the Table to put them back again as they are next Session. It certainly is the intention of the Government to recommend an earlier meeting of Parliament next year, with a view to securing an earlier adjournment. [An hon. MEMBER: When will the Session commence?] I am afraid I can hardly say that. Perhaps all that is desired by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton will not be attained, but a great deal of it will be, we hope. I can only say that we hope and desire to pass the Tithe Bill, and as to the District Councils Bill, we have a great desire to bring it in; but the prolonged discussion on other Bills has made it impossible to do so. It is suggested that, with reference to the Votes in Supply, Wednesdays should be taken by the Government. No doubt it will be the duty of the Government to ask the House for Wednesdays later in the Session. [An hon. MEMBER: What about Sundays?] But there are still some Bills which private Members have in hand, and I think it would be hardly fair to them to ask the House to give the Government Wednesdays, at any rate, not for two or three more Wednesdays. The Scotch Police Superannuation Bill, I am informed by the Lord Advocate, is in a forward state of preparation, and I hope it will be accepted by Scotch Members, and will not meet with opposition. The Corrupt Practices (Scotland) Bill is practically, I believe, accepted by Scotch Members. It has been passed by the Standing Committee and is now for consideration on Report, and I take it for granted that it will pass without much delay. In regard to the Local Government (Ireland) Bill, I cannot enter into an argument with the hon. Member for Longford about the precedence due to this Bill. We are anxious to introduce such a measure, but we must introduce measures in the order we think best; and we cannot undertake to introduce this Bill until the Land Purchase Bill has, at all events, attained considerable progress in this House.

(5.39.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I do not wish to extend the remarks I have made, but I think it is impossible that I should allow the statement of the right hon. Gentleman to remain without one or two observations. It appears to me that the upshot of what we have heard is this: that everything in the House in which the Government are interested, or in which anybody else is interested, is to be sacrificed for the Licensing Bill. It is the Licensing Bill obviously, and it is the Licensing Bill alone, which blocks the way. If it remains in the position in which it now stands, the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, to which we had all fondly looked forward as the harbinger of shortened labours, is, on the contrary, a distinct intimidation to us of a Session of indefinite length. The right hon. Gentleman has been very laudably anxious to pass the Tithe Bill, because, whether all its principles are right or not, the object of the Government is to save a property which is recognised as national property. But whenever the right hon. Gentleman is asked about the Licensing Bill, the answer always is that the Government are determined to pass it. Yet to-day, in reference to the Tithe Bill, he can only say that he desires and hopes to pass it. Desires are uncertain and hopes are shadowy and unsubstantial affairs. The determinations of the Government are confined, as it appears—except in regard to an Indian Bill and the Western Australia Bill—to the Licensing Bill, which was never mentioned in the Queen's Speech or even heard of before the middle of the Session. Therefore, I am justified in pointing out the extraordinary position in which we stand.

Even as to the Indian Councils Bill, the right hon. Gentleman cannot say when the discussion will be taken on that Bill and on the Western Australia Bill. Then the Reformatory and Industrial Schools Bill is of the greatest importance; but that is to be sacrificed for the sake of the Licensing Bill, if any difficulty should arise, and some time, it appears, must be required in disposing of it. For the Barracks Bill, one of the important measures of the Government, which they think to be essential to the well-being and comfort of the Army, no time can be mentioned, although we have now passed a half of the month of June. The Employers' Liability Bill is a Bill directly touching the welfare of the mass of the labourers of this country, and this Bill is, if need be, to be sacrificed—for it is virtually given up this evening—in order to prosecute a measure which the working classes of this country, from one end of this country to the other, absolutely detest.

(5.44.) SIR C. LEWIS (Antrim, N.): Is it in order, Sir, that any hon. Member disagreeing with the right hon. Gentleman should enter into this controversy?

*(5.44.) MR. SPEAKER: Although there is no question directly before the House, it is usual on such special occasions as this to allow some latitude.

*(5.44.) MR. W. H. SMITH: Perhaps my hon. Friend will, for the convenience of the House, allow this very limited discussion to take place.

(5.45.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The only alternative to the latitude which it is usual to grant on such a special and peculiar occasion as this is to make a Motion for the adjournment on the ground that the right hon. Gentleman's statement raises questions of pressing urgency for the House. I do not desire to take that course. What I want to ask is, partly in the tone of a question and inquiry and partly in the tone, if I may so say, of expostulation and even of entreaty, whether we are still to see in this Licensing Bill, not only the measure to which, on its merits, we so fundamentally object, but also the instrument by which this Session is to be indefinitely prolonged and other valuable measures, which we are anxious to welcome and discuss fairly, and to pass, are to be placed in the extremest danger or are at once to be sacrificed? Is it the intention of the Government still to press forward this Licensing Bill and to pass it into law?

*(5.46.) MR. W. H. SMITH: Perhaps the House will allow me to reply very shortly to the observations of the right hon. Gentleman. He asks me in a tone of expostulation and entreaty whether it is the intention of the Government to press forward the Licensing Bill; and he attributes to the Government the whole of the delay and responsibility for the whole of the delay in public business which has been caused by the Bill to which he refers. The right hon. Gentleman has a very long experience of this House, and I think he must admit that the Government are at liberty and are bound to press forward measures which they believe to be necessary in the interests of the country at large, even although a minority of the House may entertain very strong views as to those measures. I think I should be inclined to address to the right hon. Gentleman, and to those who are acting with him, an entreaty that they will permit a measure, after reasonable discussion, to be passed by a majority of this House. There are times and seasons in which opposition may fairly and properly be developed, and it is right that those who differ from any measure should put their reasons and statements frankly before the country and the House. After that has been done, I venture to ask whether the Government is responsible for the repetition of Motions, of statements, and of arguments which unduly occupy the time of the House? Is it to be laid down by the right hon. Gentleman as a canon of Parliamentary law that if the Opposition take a strong view as to a particular measure they are at liberty to demand from the Government that that measure shall not be pressed? Those who are responsible for the business of the House are at least bound to take the course which they believe to be right, and we are at liberty to appeal to the House not indefinitely and unreasonably—if I may use the word without offence—to prolong Debates upon questions which have been already decided by the House. With ordinary discussion it may yet be possible, without asking for any sacrifice on the part of Members, to pass many of those Bills which the right hon. Gentleman has mentioned. I should be glad to avail myself of the opportunity of passing those measures, and I am therefore unwilling to be responsible for discharging them from the Orders. If the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends can assist the House in discharging its duty I shall heartily welcome their aid.

(5.50.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Are we to understand that the Government intend to proceed with the Local Taxation Bill until it has gone through Committee, and that until that is done they will postpone the consideration of all other measures?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am afraid that we must take that course.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to give notice that when the Census Bill is introduced, I shall move clauses in it to enable the Irish people to express their views as to the government of their country, so that we may be able to ascertain the exact strength of the contented minority.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Do the Government seriously mean to postpone their proposals as to Irish Local Government until the Land Purchase Bill has been disposed of, next year, or the year after?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have already stated that the Local Government Bill for Ireland will not be introduced in the present Session. It would be contrary to all precedent for me to state the course which the Government may take in the next Session of Parliament.

MR. WADDY: Can the right hon. Gentleman tell us whether he has formed any estimate as to when we are likely to finish the Session?

MR. PICTON: I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he has any evidence, through the usual channels of Party information, that the majority of the people in this country prefer the Compensation Bill to the Irish Local Government Bill?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have no evidence whatever as to any agreement in the country about the Irish Local Government Bill.

DR. TANNER: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will not re-consider this question with regard to Irish Government, which was referred to in the Queen's Speech this year, or whether he will remain satisfied with his present lucrative position of public executioner?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, following the precedent of the Local Government Bill of 1888, he will lay on the Table a Paper showing the probable amount which will be given to each county under the three heads of the provisions of the Local Taxation Bill?

*MR. RITCHIE: I will endeavour to meet the right hon. Gentleman's views. I may say, however, it will be impossible to give with any accuracy the amount which will be received by counties and county boroughs in those counties in which there are county boroughs.

ENDOWED CHARITIES (OXFORD-SHIRE).

MOTION.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

(6.0.) Mr. LABOUCHERE, Member for Northampton, rose in his place, and asked leave to move the Adjournment of the House, for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the serious condition of Public Business, which has been caused by the mismanagement of the Government: but the pleasure of the House not having been signified, Mr. Speaker called on those Members who supported the Motion to rise in their places, and not less than 40 Members having accordingly risen:—

MR. LABOUCHERE: The First Lord of the Treasury has given notice of his intention to move an alteration in the Standing Orders with regard to carrying Bills over until the next Session, and he has also laid down a programme of business to be taken during the present Session. The right hon. Gentleman seems to be under the impression that his programme will be received with thanks by the Opposition side of the House, and that it is a fair and legitimate and proper one for the facilitation of public business. The House ought to look back a little in order to consider what it is that has brought it into the present difficulty, because most unquestionably the House at the present moment is in a very great mess and muddle, which, I contend, is entirely due to the action of the Government. At the beginning of the Session there was, as usual, a Speech from the Throne. In it the House was told that certain Bills would be brought forward, but, in addition to this, it is desirable to remember, for no particular reason that I could understand, Parliament met later this Session than in any previous Session. I think, however, that the Government programme, as then laid down, was a full programme. We were told there was to be a Bill to alter the present system of Tithes, a Bill for Land Purchase in Ireland, and it was indicated there would be a Bill for the Local Government of Ireland. These were to be the Government Bills, as the House understood. But the Irish Local Government Bill has disappeared. It was only after Whitsuntide that the Bill for Land Purchase in Ireland was read a second time; but suddenly, just before Whitsuntide, it was sprung upon the House in a sort of indirect, incidental way at first, that it would have to consider the question of compensation for the publicans whose licences were not to be renewed. If Her Majesty's Ministers had looked at the question as practical men, seeing what is the ordinary habit of the House in regard to discussion, knowing that the Land Bill for Ireland would meet with the strongest opposition, knowing that the Tithe Bill would be most exhaustively discussed, they must have seen that it was monstrous and preposterous for the First Lord then to spring upon the House this Compensation Bill. But surely the House had a right to suppose that the prominent and important measures of the Session were those mentioned in the Queen's Speech. So far as I can see, Ministers were not entirely at one with each other. Each Member of the Government had his own little Bill. The Chief Secretary had his Land Bill, and the right hon. Gentleman wanted to distinguish himself in the matter. I do not say that it is a case of absolute jealousy between the Chief Secretary and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but they are two eminent Gentlemen, sitting on the same Bench, and each is eager to distinguish himself. Then there is another element. We have not the advantage of possessing the Prime Minister as a Member of this House, but the House has the son of the Prime Minister perpetually coming forward like Master Wackford Squeers, and asking when a Bill in which his father was apparently especially interested was going to be put before the House. We have heard of persons trying to drive three coaches abreast through Temple Bar, but here we have three gentlemen on the Treasury Bench trying to cut each other out, and each trying to push forward his own Bill. This is the cause of the block. But, surely, the First Lord of the Treasury does not forget that he is under a pledge to the House. During the last two or three Sessions the consideration of the Estimates has been persistently put off until the end of the Session. We know what that means. We know that in August there is the greatest anxiety on the part of Members to get away for the holidays, and any hon. Member who wishes fairly to discuss questions connected with the Estimates

finds the greatest difficulty in resisting the general feeling then prevalent, and the question is probably allowed to drop. The House was told last Session that the Government would bring forward the Estimates early this Session. Undoubtedly, some Estimates were considered at an early period, and I and my hon. Friends showed ourselves to be most kindly disposed towards the right hon. Gentleman. In two or three days a great many Votes were passed—an exceptional number, considering the time devoted to them. About 32 days are ordinarily devoted to the Estimates in the course of a Session. Up to the present this Session we have only had six or seven days. If, then, we take the average number of days, the First Lord of the Treasury will see that we have a claim for at least 20 more days for Supply. There are most important matters connected with the Estimates at the present time. There has hardly been a single Irish Debate during the present Session. The Irish Members have given a free hand to Ministers, but they wish to raise most important points on the Estimates. At present Ireland is governed under exceptional legislation, and the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian once said that so long as this kind of legislation is in force every Irish Representative has a perfect right to bring forward any case of injustice or unfairness in the administration of the law. The Law Courts in Ireland are closed, but the House of Commons is open to the Irish Members and the Irish people. The Government now say that they are going to proceed with this miserable Publicans' Compensation Bill. How long do they think the discussion will last? I think that the Bill will scarcely get through all its stages within a fortnight. There is also the proposal to alter the Standing Order. How long does the right hon. Gentleman think this will take? The First Lord of the Treasury seems to be under the impression that the House is not going to discuss this alteration; in limine I protest against the proposed alteration being a Standing Order, but Amendments will have to be proposed and discussed. Then, when will there be time for the Estimates? Their consideration will have to be put off until some time in August, and if the House takes 20 days for their consideration, this will carry the sitting of the House into September. There will be protests raised by the Government against what is described as the obstruction of the Opposition, but it ought to be clearly laid before the country that it is not obstruction which causes the delay, but the utter muddling of Her Majesty's Ministers. The Government have no right, at any time, to put off the consideration of the Estimates until August or September, and they have especially no right in the present Session, in view of their former pledges, and in view of the fact that they have taken away the Private Members' days. In these circumstances it would be desirable that the House should have an opportunity of registering a protest against the course pursued by Her Majesty's Government in the present Session, and, therefore, I beg to move that the House do now adjourn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—
(Mr. Labouchere.)

(6.15.) MR. PARNELL (Cork): I think the hon. Member for Northampton is entitled to the thanks of the House for the action he has taken in reference to this important subject. There is no question which can more profitably occupy the time of the House than an attempt to search out some method by which we may rescue the House from the entanglement, the morass in which Her Majesty's Government have landed us by their utter mismanagement of public business. We have listened to-night with the utmost interest to the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman as to the Government proposals. Speaking for myself, I can only say that the result of my attention to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman is to fill my mind with dismay as to the future. When I heard the right hon. Gentleman calmly going over the long list of measures that he proposed to save from the annual slaughter of the innocents, and ending with 108 Votes in Supply, and with the Amendment of the Rules of Procedure under the guise of a new Standing Order, I was obliged to bring my mind forward to the almost certain probability that the House, if it is to carry out the programme of the right hon. Gentleman, will find itself sitting at the beginning of October. If there is to be proper attention given to the various measures named by the right hon. Gentleman, and proper discussion of the financial, colonial, English, Scotch, and Irish questions which must arise on the various Votes in Supply, we cannot possibly hope to leave this House for our holidays before an interval of three months. It is time for the House to do something to help the Government out of this mess, to accept the invitation extended to it by the First Lord of the Treasury to assist the Government, not, indeed, in the futile way suggested by the right hon. Gentleman, but to assist the Government against their own incapacity. For the position in which we are now, and the tenfold worse position in which we shall be if we are to allow the Government to plunge deeper into the morass, is due to the want of all ordinary power of calculation, on the part of the Government, as to the management of their business since the beginning of the Session. I should not be justified in doing more than referring to the new Standing Order to be proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. It may be a good thing in a small way, but it appears to be ludicrously inadequate for the object in view. The right hon. Gentleman himself seems to be conscious of the ridiculous mouse he has produced, and every one who listened to him must know that his proposal will be utterly inadequate. The fact of the matter is that the Government proposal is not a proposal to do more work, but to throw away the work which it has undertaken unwisely, and without due calculation of its own powers, after much time has been lost upon it. The proposal does not go to the root of the question. It will not enable the House to do a particle more work. It will, when we have lost valuable time, leave us, after we have lost days and nights in considering grave Constitutional questions, in as bad a position as we are in at present. Surely it is not too late to ask the Government to retrace their steps, to take the House into their confidence, and ask the House how we may save the relics of the Session. We have not had a single Irish Vote brought forward yet. We have been asked for various Votes on Account. The Constitutional power of the House over the grant of money to the Crown for the service of the year is a real question with us in Ireland, although it may be only a formal question with you in England. In Ireland the Crown has unfettered control, and the Estimates give us the only opportunity we have of stopping the Chief Secretary in his arbitrary career in Ireland. In these circumstances we have a right to ask that the Estimates should be brought forward in reasonable time, and that the Constitutional powers of the House should not be constantly abrogated as they have been by Her Majesty's Government. The House has been considering the question of procedure for many years. I remember when an attempt was made to deal with the subject 15 years ago. I then ventured to predict that no Amendment of the Standing Orders would be ever worth the time spent upon it, and I venture now to predict that you will lose your time more completely than you have done before in discussing the new Standing Order. If the Government had been composed of statesmen, they would not have ventured to come down to the House with this absurd and preposterous proposal, utterly insufficient as it is for the rescue of the House from the embarrassing position in which they have placed it by the mismanagement of the affairs intrusted to their keeping. I will only say, in conclusion, that if the Government will come before the House with a reasonable proposal with regard to the business to be transacted during the rest of the Session, and with a selection of such measures as are measures of public utility, sought by the country and by all parts of the House, and measures which can be passed without exciting political passion, and if they will carry into effect the mind and the wish of Parliament, they may use the limited time still left at their disposal most profitably to the public interests, and most satisfactorily to the House and the country at large.

(6.25.) MR. HANBURY (Preston): I do not propose to offer any arguments whatever on the proposal of the Government, to make a new rule for the despatch of business; but I do ask the Government seriously to consider whether they are taking a wise, or even a Constitutional, step in postponing Supply while they press forward legislation. The first duty of the House is, in my opinion, to vote the ordinary Supply for the services of the country, and I also firmly believe it is the duty of hon. Members to discuss the proposals for Supply at adequate length. This Session the House has treated the Government very generously with regard to Supply. Two or three Votes on Account have been taken, and the Government are really drifting into a false position if they insist upon passing their Bills before they deal with Supply. I do not want to see them drift into a false position; and I believe they will be neglecting their duty if they endeavour to vote large sums of money for the service of the country without adequate discussion at the end of a very long Session, and when the House is wearied. Before they definitely make up their minds on the subject I ask them to seriously consider the matter, and to let the House have a proper opportunity of voting Supply in the ordinary way.

*(6.27.) MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): In relation to the question of the conduct of public business, I desire to draw attention to what occurred last night. I had the honour of moving an Amendment, on behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for the Carnarvon Boroughs, which related to the unfortunate Licensing Bill, and the Debate was closed in 50 minutes.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member cannot raise the question upon the present Motion.

*MR. S. T. EVANS: What I wish to do, Sir, is to call attention to the fact that the Government have invariably this Session closed Welsh Members. A very important Instruction on the Tithes Bill was proposed by the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. F. S. Stevenson), on which one of the oldest and most respected Welsh Members was desirous of speaking, and yet the Government thought it their duty to close the hon. Member.

*MR. SPEAKER: I do not think that line of argument is at all permissible on the Motion for the Adjournment of the House on "a definite matter of urgent public importance."

*MR. S. T. EVANS: I will only say I can assure the Government that it is not the best way to facilitate business to closure Members who are not obstructing.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

(6.29.) MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I have looked at the Amendment Paper, and find that there are exactly 18 pages of Amendments which have to be dealt with on the Local Taxation Bill. I will simply remark with regard to them that a large number raise questions of very serious and grave importance. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. H. Smith) has had an opportunity—I daresay a very painful opportunity to him—of seeing how slow the progress has been on that Bill. I think he may fairly infer what the future of the Bill will be from what has already taken place, and I think he needs a warning from us that the importance which we conscientiously attach to the Amendments will justify us in discussing them at considerable length, and, therefore, in monopolising a considerable portion of the time left us this Session. To a certain extent I sympathise with the right hon. Gentleman, and we have heard with universal regret that his labours have had a prejudicial effect upon his health. He has our hearty sympathies on that account, whatever may be our political differences. I noticed the other day a statement to the effect that the right hon. Gentleman had conveyed to his political supporters that if they persisted in their demand for an Autumn Session he would have to retire from his arduous duties. Well, but he proposes to inflict upon himself that very Autumn Session against which he warned his supporters with a threat of retirement. If the Government persist with this Licensing Bill we shall be sitting in this House through September and October, and probably even later; we shall have all the inconveniences of an Autumn Session without the compensating advantage an Autumn Session sometimes gives. The right hon. Gentleman is bound to look with a considerable amount of alarm and distress on the present condition and temper of Parliament. I join in the desire that the Parliamentary machine should be thoroughly effective, that our proceedings should be carried on with order and decorum and all necessary dispatch. But the management of the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues has brought us to something little short of chaos and anarchy, and if we are to proceed with these clauses of this Bill that chaos and anarchy will increase day by day. The right hon. Gentleman must know that Members on this side would not dare to take the attitude of uncompromising hostility to this Bill we have taken if we were not convinced that the opinion of the country is at our back. I do not wish to depart one hairs-breadth from the narrow limits of such a Motion as this, and if I do so it is in spite of my intention. Upon this Bill, for which the Government are sacrificing everything, they had the opportunity of knowing long ago the mind of the country. Two years ago those same proposals were rejected by the voice of the country, and the Government listened to that voice. So far as this Standing Order which is to be proposed may lead to the acceleration of the business of the House the object of the right hon. Gentleman will have our sympathy, but let me point out that interference with the rules that govern the proceedings of this assembly is one of the greatest enterprises a Minister can embark upon, and whoever essays to change the time-honoured usages of Parliament must do so seriously, carefully deliberating with due regard to many important considerations, and he must be prepared to have his proposals sharply criticised. Why, some years ago, the Minister of the day thought it necessary to devote the whole of an Autumn Session to the carrying out of new rules, and certainly it is not the proper time to make such an alteration suddenly towards the end of a Session, when Members are fatigued and irritated with protracted discussions. Such a proposal should come at the beginning of a Session, when the House is fresh and Members willing to undertake the task of considering such an alteration. The right hon. Gentleman must not be surprised if we consider it our duty to examine his proposal with due reflection, and I give him fair warning—he has received a warning from the leader of the Opposition, and I repeat it—in bringing a new Standing Order before the House, to relieve himself from the difficulties of his own mismanagement, he must not calculate upon the Order being allowed to pass without serious discussion. The attention of the right hon.

Gentleman has been called to the serious character of the Bills he is sacrificing to this most unfortunate, this iniquitous, measure. What will the working classes say when they learn that a Bill to protect their lives and limbs is, in spite of an almost unanimous feeling in its favour, sacrificed in favour of a Bill to support which the Government cannot bring forward their ordinary majority in this House. Here is a serious question for the right hon. Gentleman's consideration. He has been an attentive and a pained observer of the fortunes of the Compensation Bill. He has seen his majority, which a few years ago was upwards of 100, and even at the beginning of this Session 70 or 80, reduced to a majority of 32. There is the handwriting on the wall. There is a state of almost mutiny among his followers, only kept from public expression by the strong ties of Party discipline and the sense of common danger. If he paid any attention to these signs he would see in the face of a vehement Opposition, supported by public opinion, that it is almost insane to press these proposals as he is pressing them. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not think I have spoken in language too warm as to this measure. Sincerely I deplore the position into which he has got himself. I offer him hearty sympathy in his difficulties. If hon. Members think they help the right hon. Gentleman by compelling us to sit here until October, they do not take my view of the personal difficulties of his position. I repeat, in spite of the jeers of hon. Members opposite, I sympathise with him in the grave difficulties imposed upon him by the Government attitude on this Bill, and I hope, even at the eleventh hour, he may see his way to abandon the path of fatuous obstinacy upon which he has entered, and will withdraw a Bill condemned by a united Opposition, by the country, and by the murmurs of his own followers..

*(6.40.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I have listened with interest to the epithets that have been applied to me in the course of this Debate. I accept them as Parliamentary language which hon. Gentlemen unfortunately feel themselves compelled to use in regard to a political opponent.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: The right hon. Gentleman will allow me to say that any epithets I may have used were applied to measures and not to himself.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No doubt, it was Parliamentary language used under the belief that it was justified as applied to the leader of the House for his conduct of public business. The hon. Gentleman who introduced this Debate by way of forwarding our discussions and assisting public business, has moved the adjournment of the House, is the hon. Member who, I think, I am not wrong in saying has taken pride in the difficulties he has placed in the way of business. From time to time, both here and out of doors, he has avowed his intention to obstruct the business of the Government as far as he possibly can. I apprehend that whether it were the Licensing Bill or any other Bill which the Government had thought it necessary to proceed with the same system of opposition to the Government he is desirous of destroying would undoubtedly have been adopted by the hon. Gentleman.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I said I would oppose all bad Bills. If the right hon. Gentleman would bring in any Bill that I consider good I should be happy to support it.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: In other words, if we would make arrangements by which the hon. Gentleman could pass his judgment upon all measures we propose to introduce, and proceed only with those having his approval, then we would be free from his opposition in this House. I have stated what I understand to be the view and the attitude of the hon. Member in regard to public business. His practice has been what I have stated, without colour or exaggeration. I shall not go back on what I have before said, that Her Majesty's Government must be responsible for the measures they ask the House to take into consideration, and the House will consider whether the practice which now prevails of carrying on a protracted Debate on measures of which the principle has been accepted is for the advantage of the House, and is calculated to establish the reputation of the House as a legislative machine and as the representative body of this Empire; or whether such practice will not endanger the efficiency of this House whatever Government may be in power, when this method of opposition—I do not use the word obstruction, which might more correctly describe the attitude taken up—when this practice is adopted as the usual custom. What is done to-day and now under the belief that it is justified by the peculiar circumstances of a particular measure will be done to-morrow, next year, and in future Parliaments and with regard to successive Governments that may be in Office. It is for the House to take the matter into its own hands. We may be wrong; hon. Gentlemen opposite believe us to be wrong in having introduced this measure, and wrong in pushing it forward; but the Government believe that they are right. I regret that the practice and traditions that have hitherto prevailed are being abandoned—the practice that, when the House of Commons has fully considered a measure, the opposition to it shall not be continued to such a degree that all the time of the Session shall be occupied with that measure, and no time shall be left for the consideration of any other measures. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Northampton remarked that the Government were sacrificing the interests of the working man. I deny absolutely that this is the case. I do so without desiring in the least degree to make any statement that might produce heated controversy in this House; but, again, I say that we are acting upon our rights and in accordance with our duty in pressing forward measures which we believe to be necessary. If those measures are to be opposed at such length in this House, that other measures which are of great importance to the interests of the country cannot be considered, the responsibility rests upon those who protract the Debates and who will not permit the House to come to a conclusion upon them, and so postpone the passing of measures that are admitted to be of importance to the country. That is the view I humbly take in this matter. It is only reasonable that the Opposition should charge the Government with having involved the House in difficulties, and with having introduced chaos and anarchy into its proceedings. I am accustomed to charges of that character. Very likely I have not been successful in my conduct of business, but I must act according to the best of my lights. I must speak plainly and honestly to the House, and I entreat them to give us permission to go forward, after a fair protest, with the measures which we believe are for the interest and the good of the country, and which can be disposed of in the course of the present Session without unduly protracting it, without putting an undue tax upon the time of hon. Members. I trust the House will credit me with honesty of statement. In the conduct of public business I think it is only right that when a Bill has been entered upon it should be proceeded with, and so soon as this Bill (the Local Taxation Bill) is concluded, I will endeavour to make fresh arrangements which will, I hope, meet the reasonable desires of hon. Gentlemen, and take steps for making further progress with business—with Supply and the other important measures which can be considered by the House—without making any further great claim on the health and time of hon. Members.

(6.48.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I can assure the right hon. Gentleman he will hear from me no epithets of personal disrespect, for I am sure every Gentleman on both sides of the House regards with the highest esteem the character and abilities of the right hon. Gentleman. In any comment we make on the conduct of the Government—and the object of my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton in making this Motion has been, in my opinion, to pass a just condemnation on the conduct of the Government for their mismanagement of public business in this House—we speak of the Government as a Corporation; we speak of them as possessing those attributes which have been remarked as belonging to Corporations, both physical and moral, in a definition well known to the House. Therefore, I can speak of the conduct of the Government in this matter without fear of personal offence. Now, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman has said that all these charges of mismanagement and misconduct are the fruits only of a factious spirit on our part—that it is only by factious and obstructive opponents that the Government are charged with the misconduct of public business. In answer to that, I will call his attention to what is thought of the Government by their own friends—what is said of them by their own supporters. If there is any representative of public opinion which is a more ardent supporter of the Government than another, it is, I suppose, the Times newspaper. That paper has counselled the Government to use violence towards the House in order to get out of the scrape in which they find themselves. This is what the Times newspaper, the great friend of the Government, says, only two days ago, of the Government and their conduct of public business. I will call a witness into Court whom, at all events, you cannot accuse of factions motives and Party enmity against you. This is what the Times says of the action of the Government and of their conduct of public business in the House of Commons—

“We cannot congratulate the Conservative Party on the position it presents to-day.”

Well, that is very true. I do not think that anyone who has watched the proceedings of that Bench for the last week would be disposed to congratulate them on the position they hold to-day. The Times goes on to say—

“Unfortunately, Ministers themselves have been the first to forget the physical limitation<sup>s</sup> under which they work. They have committed the tactical blunder of pledging their reputation to the transaction of an amount of business for which their time and endurance are inadequate.”

That is the first and fundamental mistake of the Government—that they have not understood the nature of the business they have proposed or the power of the House of Commons to transact it.

“We shall assuredly not be charged with having excused or minimised the wilful obstruction offered by the Opposition upon every available opportunity.”

I am sure a charge cannot justly be brought against the Times of having minimised the misconduct of the Opposition. But hear what it says of you—

“But we are bound to say that the Government have displayed a want of common prudence in creating needless difficulties for themselves. A Lord Melbourne, with his ‘can’t you let it alone?’ would have been an invaluable adviser at an early period of the Session. The Irish Land Purchase Bill, a large and complicated measure, touching many interests, raising many difficult questions, and certain to encounter the stubborn opposition of a Party whose very existence, political and material, it directly assails, was of itself nearly sufficient occupation for a Session.”

Sir W. Harcourt

*MR. W. LOWTHER (Westmoreland, Appleby): I rise to order. I wish to ask you, Sir, whether the right hon. Gentleman is in order in reading from a newspaper in the House?

SIR W. HARCOURT: Why, the President of the Board of Trade the other day made half his speech from readings from a newspaper.

*MR. SPEAKER: The Rule which precludes the reading from a newspaper has, in accordance with the general feeling of the House, been relaxed of late years. I need hardly say that of late years extracts from newspapers have been much used in the House, though I have not seen the actual newspaper from which an extract is taken produced and displayed so conspicuously as on the present occasion. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would have done better if he had brought an extract from the paper instead of the paper itself; and, doubtless, if he had had the opportunity he would have prepared extracts among his notes.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The fact is, Sir, that my extract, which I have treasured so much, is at home, and this Motion having come on rather by surprise, I was obliged to get this copy of the newspaper, and inasmuch as the right hon. Gentleman in charge of this Bill made a large portion of his speech consist of extracts from newspapers, I thought I might read this extract, and with the leave of the House I will conclude the extract, which is very instructive, and, I think, very true.

“It ought to have been regarded as a misfortune that the tithe question had assumed a phase calling somewhat peremptorily for treatment in the same Session, but to raise in addition the thorny questions connected with public house licences was a piece of gratuitous rashness, all the less excusable because the present Administration has already had a sharp lesson from temperance fanaticism.”

Then, with more comments on the wickedness of obstruction, it goes on—

“But even in the absence of this extraordinary development the Ministerial tactics would have been rash and dangerous. As things are these tactics have led to a damaging rebuff. Whatever soothing phrases may be employed to describe the arrangements contemplated by the Government, the plain truth is that the Land Purchase Bill was the principal measure of the Session, and that they fail to carry it. We are not concerned to deny that there is a moral difference between dropping it altogether and carrying it forward to next Session as a partially debated measure, though we attach little importance to moral triumphs accompanied by substantial defeat. But it is not at all clear—

[Cries of "Oh, oh!"] Well, I will make this article a part of my speech, if you please. It is an agreeable novelty to me to adopt and speak the language of the Times. You may take it as my speech, if you please, though I am afraid it is against the Rules of the House to read a speech; but there are only two sentences more that I wish to read.

"But it is not at all clear that the labour already expended upon the Bill will make much difference in the labour it will require next Session, and in the meantime the broad fact stands out plainly and unmistakably that the principal measure of this Session has failed. That is not a pleasant condition of affairs for the Government or its supporters in any case, and least of all when there are fair grounds for holding that the measure might have been passed in spite of obstruction had not the Government wasted time and energy upon legislation which might have been postponed."

Do not tell us now that criticism of your conduct comes only from factious opponents. That is the language held about you by your strongest supporters in every part of the country. You may read it in any Conservative or Liberal Unionist newspaper in the country. I am sorry my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham is not in the House. If he were I would refer him to what looks like an inspired article in the Birmingham Daily Post, to which I commend the attention of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. All the difficulties you find yourselves in are due to your own mismanagement of public business. You have proposed a great measure for discussion—whether a good measure or not—the Irish Land Purchase Bill. You have frittered away the time of the House. Having named as your first Bill a remedial measure for Ireland, the first business you entered upon was a discussion, the object of which was to blacken and defame the Irish Members. Upon that subject a great number of days were necessarily expended. Then you have introduced a number of Bills which you ought to have known would produce the strongest and most violent opposition. An hon. Member on your own side of the House has called attention to the position of Supply. You have spent very few days—10 only—upon Supply. If you are to devote to Supply the ordinary time which has been given to it in former Sessions, you still owe 27 days to Supply, which would occupy nearly the whole of the remaining time of this Session if it were an ordinary one. The Debates on the Irish Votes under a Coercion Act must necessarily be protracted. When the ordinary law is suspended it is inevitable that the Executive Government should be challenged and questioned in a way which is not necessary when the ordinary law only is in force. You have the additional advantage of private Members' days, and yet this is the situation to which you have brought the House and country. Now you come forward at the end of the Session and propose a desperate remedy to cover your own humiliation and mismanagement. You have proposed this Standing Order, which must, of course, be discussed at considerable length. I think that the hon. Member for Northampton was perfectly justified in making this Motion, which he has made with the object of calling attention to the real situation. We told you from the first that we were determined to offer to this Compensation Bill every resistance in our power, and we shall continue to do so. In doing this we believe, and are confident, that we have with us the wishes of the great majority of the people. If you doubt that, you have the means of refuting us. What is the meaning of your dwindling and waning majority? You are forcing this Bill through by majorities which are not half of your normal Party majority. What is the meaning of that? It is that the Members of this House know that the opinion of this country is against the policy of this measure, to which the Government, in a frame of mind bordering upon insanity, have given precedence. We shall oppose your proposals because, in our opinion, they are not the result of due deliberation, but are a hasty and desperate expedient to which you have recourse in order to get out of the mess in which you have involved yourselves. Far from constituting a wise, well-considered, deliberate measure for forwarding public business, these proposals are only an expedient to cover the ignominious defeat of a discredited Administration.

(7.5.) MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I should not have risen had it not been for the remark of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, in reply to the hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool, who alluded to the fact of no progress having been made with the Employers' Liability Bill. I ask the House whether during the whole of the Session the Government have made any attempt to place the Bill in such a position that it would come on for Second Reading, notwithstanding that they have been asked to do so time after time. The whole responsibility of not dealing with that question rests with Her Majesty's Government. If two years ago, when they had the opportunity, they had listened to those who had a right to speak on behalf of the organised trades of the country, we should have had facilities offered for the Employers' Liability Bill such as we on this side have offered to the President of the Local Government Board with regard to the Bills brought before the House for the housing of the working classes of London. We protest against the First Lord of the Treasury trying to deceive the country by throwing upon the House the responsibility for the Employers' Liability Bill being withdrawn. We listened to the long statement which the First Lord of the Treasury made, and the impression left on my mind was that it was the first day of the Session, and he was putting before the House the amount of business that could be got through. But let me remind the First Lord what took place with respect to one Vote in Supply. We raised the whole question of contracts, a very important subject. But hardly had the Secretary for War replied—it was a Morning Sitting—when it was found that there was not time for further discussion. The Vote was not taken again until the end of the Session, when there was not time to discuss it. I tell the First Lord of the Treasury now that there are some of us who are interested in this question of contracts, and at whatever time this particular Vote comes on this year, we shall resume the discussion which was burked last year. It is scandalous in the extreme at this time of the Session that these Bills should be put down as though they were to be run through. We are told that they are non-contentious, but that is the opinion of the First Lord of the Treasury, it is not the opinion of the House in general. If these Bills are pressed through we shall be debarred, as in the past, from discussing the serious Votes in Supply. That is the conduct of the Government against which we protest. With regard to the Licences Bill, the Government knew two years ago how much opposition they created by a similar proposal; yet they have flung on the floor of the House a new Bill, and if they find the most determined opposition it is only what they can expect.

(7.10.) Mr. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I was really amazed to hear the defence made for himself by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury. No one has made any personal accusation against the right hon. Gentleman, but when the whole policy of the Government is arraigned, we should have heard something else than this kind of general appeal for the interests of the House and the dignity of the country, which we have heard 9,999 times from the lips of the First Lord of the Treasury. We say that your declared policy four years ago was the policy of expenditure of public money, and simultaneity, and so on, in dealing with Ireland, and in applying to Ireland the same measures as to England and Scotland. You declared, at the beginning of the Session, by the mouth of the Queen, through her most gracious Speech, that you would extend to Ireland a measure of Local Government, and we ask you, when you get up in the House to defend yourselves, why it is that a Bill not mentioned in the Queen's Speech, but hatched by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in connection with his Budget, is pressed forward, while a Bill declared to be the key-stone and corner-stone of Her Majesty's policy, is to be held over to another Session. We ask for an explanation on that point, and how are we met? We are met by the right hon. Gentleman, the head of the Party who consumed 60 days of Government time in 1881 discussing the Land Bill, at a time when Ireland was almost in a state of revolution, at a time when every moment was precious, and at a time when, strongly as we were opposed to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, we found ourselves obliged to continue to vote with them. It is they who, in the following year, spent 19 days in discussing the Closure —now applied by the right hon. Gentleman every quarter of an hour. It is the head of that Government, and of that Party, who now comes forward and appeals to us with regard to a measure on which the Opposition are united, and upon which the followers of the Government are disunited, as to which there is no demand, and for which there is no agitation in the country. When you have that situation, what does the First Lord of the Treasury do? He gives us a lesson in Parliamentary deportment. We are tired of these Turveydrop lectures. The right hon. Gentleman beseeched us to have regard for the dignity and position not only of this but future Parliaments. Future Parliaments can take care of themselves. The right hon. Gentleman is teaching us our lesson very late. What we say is this: that this ill-fated measure—this ill-starred measure—being introduced out of time, and in the most offensive manner, there is no conduct almost that would not be justified in giving opposition to a measure so conceived. What is the position? I invite the House to consider the high price which the Tory Party have to pay for Liberal Unionist support. I should like to have the opinion of the Chief Secretary on the conduct of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Why is this Bill persisted in? We are told because it is demanded in the interests of the House and the dignity of the country. If I inverted the phrase it would be all the same. The right hon. Gentleman simply gives utterance to a sort of Parliamentary abracadabra, whichever way it is read it will do. I once knew a poet who wrote his verses backwards as well as forwards, and whichever way you read them they were always equally good. Each sentence of the right hon. Gentleman's speeches is in its essence a most admirable piece of literary mosaic. If the first sentence were put last and the last first it would come to the same thing. What is the real reason why the Government are sticking to the Compensation Bill? The real reason is the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I can almost picture the Cabinet meeting in Downing Street after the Chief Secretary introduced his Land Purchase Bill, and conceived to himself the fond delusion that he would be dangling before the House during the months of June, July, and August, and I can fancy his attitude when the Chancellor of the Exchequer came gently down and said, "Oh, yes; but there is a little Bill of mine I want to appear on the stage at Westminster for a brief period to show my Parliamentary dexterity, and how I can manage figures and finance." And then the Chief Secretary may have said, "Oh, yes;"—and I venture to say this is what occurred in the Cabinet—"but my Bill is promised in the Queen's Speech; it is part of the Government Programme; it is the corner-stone of the Government policy; what have we got to do with your Bill?" Then, I suppose, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would say, "Oh, yes; but I have a large Stock Exchange experience, and I know that there is a large number of Limited Liability Companies starting, and a number of people have a great interest in brewing shares and in whisky shares, and it will greatly strengthen and consolidate and cement the Tory Party all over the country if we show these people that we are determined, by means of our Bills, to back up the interests in which so much money has been invested." I have not the smallest doubt that it is due to that attitude on the part of the right hon. Gentleman that he induced the Government to bring in his Bill, and, having brought in his Bill, that he induced the Government to stand by it by the threat of resignation, simply because he did not want to be discredited, as he was discredited in regard to his Van and Wheel Tax. And, then, what is the House asked to do? It is proposed, in order to save four days of Parliamentary time occupied in the Second Reading Debate on the Irish Purchase Bill, to revolutionise the procedure of this ancient Parliament. By what means? To borrow another illustration from the Stock Exchange, by a species of Parliamentary "contango"—that is, the carrying over by Standing Orders, and it is Members of this House who will have to pay the difference. We will have to sit here during the months of June, July, August, and September. And Parliament is to be revolutionised for what? That we may save four days next year of Parliamentary time that have been wasted upon the Irish Land Bill, and that is the sop which the Irish

Chief Secretary gets for being thrown over. That is what the Government are paying for Liberal Unionism, for a manipulative Chancellor of the Exchequer; and, if we are to believe the Times, that great newspaper which everybody believes now, they are paying rather dearly. They are obliged to admit that themselves. Their own newspapers admit it; their majority is waning; while the Opposition, I venture to say, is engaged in one of the holiest causes in which Members of Parliament have ever been engaged. We are engaged in resistance to a measure which we believe justifies every word that has been uttered against it. Yet we are besought and implored, for the sake of our dignity, by those who are sacrificing the ancient traditions of Parliament, to pass this Public House Endowment Bill. Who are the true champions of Parliamentary tradition and privilege? Are they the gentlemen who wasted 40 days during the Irish revolution of 1881 discussing the Amendments, or 18 days discussing the Closure Rule of 1883—that Closure which is now applied every quarter of an hour by the right hon. Gentleman who now proposes to revolutionise Parliament to save four days of Parliamentary time—are they the true champions of Parliamentary dignity? Is it to them that the country should look for the way in which Parliamentary business is to be conducted, or is it to the Opposition, who have done nothing in this matter except under the ordinary and usual traditions, to which we always consider we are entitled to look? Supposing we were in a normal state, I hold that the Opposition are justified in considering that they are dealing with a Government which practically puts lies into the Queen's mouth, because that is what it comes to. Session after Session Her Majesty is made to declare her anxiety to deal with Irish government. Session after Session, on platform after platform, there have been repeated declarations of the anxiety of the Government to deal with Ireland, in the same way as England and Scotland. Two years ago we had the English Local Government Bill; last year we had the Scotch Bill; and Ireland, the Cinderella of the three countries, is to be left out until some future time, which is not even specified, and Irish Members cannot even get a sight of a corner of the Land Bill, while the Government are passing measures to endow public houses. A splendid programme for the country, truly, a policy of simultaneity and synchronising, and all the other "isings." That is abandoned, and we have now gone in for a policy of pints and quarts and pewters. That is the position of Her Majesty's Government. On behalf of the English and the Irish public, whose votes have been got on false pretences, we would be false to our duty if we did not protest against the conduct of the Government. Even the Tory Party itself is now finding the poison in the wound of Liberal Unionism; it is finding what it is to have a Chancellor of the Exchequer with one eye on the polling booth and the other on the Stock Exchange, who does not hesitate to sacrifice all the traditions of Parliament, every one of them if necessary, to promote a policy that is founded on some of the most sordid considerations that have ever actuated any Government of the day. The position of the Opposition in this matter is clear. The Government have broken every pledge they have made. Members of Parliament find that they cannot get what they are entitled to, namely, a fair and reasonable time for the discussion of matters of importance arising on Supply. The business of the House has always been supposed to be chiefly the voting of moneys to the Crown. That opportunity of stating our grievances has been taken away in order that we may discuss the endowment of public houses. If the Government will only bring forward Supply nobody will find fault with them if they never bring forward legislation. The Liberal Party do not ask or urge them to legislate. The Conservatives themselves do not want to legislate, because they are conservative. There is not in the Conservative intellect any momentum or main-spring for legislation. The true policy of the Conservative Party would be to give the House plenty of business to do in the nature of Supply, and then in the smaller interstices to bring in pretended Bills for the benefit of the working classes and other objects of so-called benevolence of that kind. Business like the Census Bill, for instance, might be up to the Constitutional high-water mark of Toryism—for this reason, that they would only be called upon to pass it every 10 years. Instead of that we have a set of measures of a most contentious and embarrassing kind, measures which have disrupted the solid phalanx of the Tory Party itself; and I, for one, protest against the policy which, while it attempts to lay upon the Opposition the blame for the delay of business, is in reality a policy in itself calculated to embarrass and irritate the Opposition and irritate the country, and which in the end, in my opinion, will find its reckoning day at the poll.

(7.30.) MR. ALLISON (Cumberland, Eskdale): I am very glad that the Adjournment of the House has been moved, because it has given an opportunity for Gentlemen opposite to fulminate against us on this side of the House those charges which they have been constantly bringing against us in the speeches they have made in the country, that we have been in the habit of obstructing the business of the House. We, of course, know that those charges are untrue, and that the position in which the Government now find themselves is due to their own mismanagement, and to the imbecility they have displayed in the conduct of public business. Another proof of that imbecility has been afforded to-night. They might have accepted an Amendment for devoting the money provided by the Bill to the cause of education, instead of for the benefit of the publicans; they might have accepted the suggestion of the appointment of a Committee put forward by the noble Lord the Member for Rosendale, or they might, as another alternative, have dropped these proposals altogether. But instead of doing either of these things, they have decided on going on with the Bill. But I wish to point out that there is another course which might have been adopted, and which ought to commend itself to their supporters. In the personal devotion which is felt by those supporters to the present Government, they might, out of sympathy for the occupants of the Treasury Bench, have endeavoured to place them in a minority, in which case we on this side of the House would have gladly accepted the appeal that would have been made to the country. That is the course I would have recommended them to adopt, and even now I strongly invite hon. Members opposite to come to the relief of the Government by adopting this suggestion.

(7.34.) MR. MUNTZ rose in his place and claimed to move "That the Question be now put;" but MR. SPEAKER withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question, and no Member rising to continue the Debate, MR. SPEAKER put the Question, "That this House do now adjourn."

(7.34.) The House divided:—Ayes 181; Noes 233.—(Div. List, No. 141.)

AGRICULTURAL COMPENSATION PROCEDURE BILL.

Clause 1.

(7.48.) THE CHAIRMAN: I desire to point out that owing to an accident the Amendment of the hon. Member for Brigg (Mr. Waddy), which stood first on the Paper last night, has been placed on the Paper for this evening in its wrong place, the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) having been put in the first position. Therefore it is necessary to take the Amendment of the hon. Member for Brigg first, although that of the hon. Member for Sunderland will come on for discussion at the same time, inasmuch as they both involve the question of giving the County Councils the option of varying the use of the money which the Bill proposes to place at their disposal from the purpose stated in the Bill. If that question be decided in the negative on the Amendment of the hon. Member for Brigg, the hon. Member for Sunderland's Amendment must fall with it. The second Amendment of the hon. Member for Sunderland, and that of the hon. Member for the Launceston Division

(Mr. C. Acland) belong more properly to a later clause. The Amendment of the hon. Member for the Carnarvon Boroughs (Mr. Lloyd-George) is out of order, the question having been practically decided last night. Some other Amendments to the 1st clause relate to later clauses, and therefore will be out of order on the first. I would, however, add that although the Amendments of the hon. Members for Brigg and Sunderland are in order, a good deal of the ground they take up has already been covered by the Debate on the Amendment for Rotherham. The main point to be discussed is whether the money provided by the Bill should or should not be given exclusively for the purchase of licences, and much of that ground has already been covered by previous debate.

(7.50.) MR. STOREY (Sunderland): Am I to understand that if it be decided on, the Amendment of the hon. Member for Brigg, that there should be no option, my Amendment falls to the ground? Would it not, then, be competent to me to move a third use of the money as a subsequent Amendment? At present the Bill proposes to give the County Councils £350,000 for a certain purpose, £350,000 more for another purpose, and the residue for their own purposes. Will it not be competent to me to move that a further sum of £50,000 or £100,000 should be applied for the purpose of extending the amount of 1d. in the £1, which is at present allowed for the adoption of free libraries?

THE CHAIRMAN: If the residue be sufficient to cover the amount so to be allocated the hon. Member might no doubt make that proposal.

(7.51.) MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg): I rise, Sir, to move the Amendment I have placed on the Paper, namely, at the end of line 19 of Clause 1, page 1, to insert the following words:—

“Or if the County Councils shall so determine, any part of the said sum of £350,000 may be applied in England in relief of the School Board rates, or of the fees payable by or on behalf of the children in elementary schools aided by the State in such proportion as the County Councils may determine.”

I have listened with attention to the observations which you, Sir, have made as to how far this is, and how far it is not, a reasonable Amendment, and how far the principle of my Amendment has been anticipated by the discussion which has already taken place. I shall endeavour, as closely as I possibly can, to follow the course which you, Sir, have indicated, and to say as little as possible on that portion of the question which has already been covered. But it will be impossible for me entirely to avoid touching on matters that have already been referred to, for this reason: that we on this side of the House—at all events, the majority of us, some of us expressing our views and others not expressing them in consequence of a certain pact that we have made—the majority of us, I say, probably consider that the whole thing from beginning to end is as bad as bad can be. But I will not pursue this point any further; it is settled and done with; and at present we are in this position: that the sum of £350,000 which is provided for by this Bill is to be taken and allotted, either for the benefit of the public houses, or in some other way, according to one or other of the Amendments upon the Paper. I am sincere in what I have to say with regard to the Government. I asked a question of the leader of the House a short time ago which he would not answer. I did not ask that question disrespectfully, but for the purpose of ascertaining when it was that, in his own mind, he anticipated we should probably rise. The right hon. Gentleman did not answer that question because, no doubt, it was a very difficult question to answer at that time, but now I want to suggest to my right hon. Friend opposite, the President of the Local Government Board, that, after all, the course I am about to propose to him may save the Government an enormous amount of time and labour should they be disposed to adopt it. They are at the present moment committed to a Bill which I truly believe in their own inmost hearts they are very sorry they ever touched, and thereby they are committed to the fighting of principles which they do not like. The differences which have already manifested themselves among the Government supporters on the opposite Benches may be taken as strongly indicative of the views of their own Party; and I put it to the Government, is it not possible that they may take a weapon even from our side of the House? If they were to accept this Amendment it would get them clear of all the difficulty, or of a great portion of the difficulty, which still remains. And I will tell you why, apart from the ridiculous position of the Aldermen on the County Councils, the country generally would, undoubtedly, have perfect confidence in the way which those bodies would administer the powers and duties conferred upon them by this Bill. It may be that in some model districts where there are not too many public houses there would be little need of the exercise of the purchasing power, while there may be many other districts in which the state of things is so bad that a number of those houses ought to be immediately extinguished. What in those cases are the County Councils to do? Each of these bodies is entitled to its proper share of this £350,000, but the major portion of them do not want the money for public house purposes, and are unable to apply it to any other source that would be of real advantage. What, then, are they to do? In the division which I have the honour to represent the County Council, although largely composed of the Conservatives of North Lincolnshire, has already actually passed a vote opposed to the carrying out of this Bill. Why then, I ask, are they on the one hand to lose the benefit of the application of this money to purposes of which they approve, and why, on the other hand, should they be compelled to devote it to purposes of which they disapprove? Well, Sir, my Amendment gives the Government the opportunity of saying, "Here is a certain amount of money to be devoted to some purpose;" and I say to the Government, "Do not fasten yourselves so absolutely to the chariots of the big brewers. Give yourselves some opportunity of taking a better course. Give your friends some chance of acting in accordance with their own views." We ask the Government to say that these bodies shall not be compelled to apply the money, as it is not really needed; to say that they are not going to select particular places or to make any particular choice, but that they propose to leave the choice generally to the County Councils, who know best what is most wanted. We ask you, in point of fact, to say that, having created these bodies, having been the means of calling them into existence, you will give them the opportunity of saying to what purpose this money shall be applied, although there can be no objection to the imposition of some kind of limitation, such as, say, for instance, the money shall not be allowed to be used for the purpose of public parks or objects of amusement and recreation, but that it shall be applied to some good and useful purpose. It is for this reason that we ask you to accept this Amendment. The objects I have mentioned will probably, not all of them, commend themselves to hon. Members on this side of the House. I say, however, the Amendment is as good as, under the circumstances, I can undertake to make it, and I ask the Committee to accept it on that principle. I propose that this money shall be given partly in relief of the children's pence. I know perfectly well there are several Members on this side of the House who will say I am simply anticipating free, or rather assisted, education. Some Members will say, "Give all the money to the rates," and others will say, "Do not give any of it to the rates." It is just possible there may be found off the Government Bench a few who think it had better be given to the public houses. With regard to the children's pence, I think the Government had better accept the Amendment. I think they had better not let it be said at the next General Election—which may be adjourned for some time, but which, sooner or later, will come down upon them as surely as fate or death—that when there was a choice in this House between giving the money to drink and giving it to the children, if the County Council desired it, they said, "We will have the drink, the whole drink, and nothing but the drink." I advise them to put away this cup from their lips. The cry they are preparing against themselves by opposing this Amendment will do them great harm, and a perfectly legitimate instinct of self-preservation may induce them to say that, on the whole, they think they had better accept an Amendment like this. The Amendment, if adopted, will not hinder the County Council from laying out the whole of the money, if they like, on public houses. There is nothing whatever in the Amendment which calls upon them to divide the £350,000 into three equal parts and to give one to each purpose mentioned. If the County Council find when they get the money that the best way of expending it, and the most useful for morality and for the people generally, is to buy up licences, there is nothing in my Amendment to hinder them from using it in that way. By accepting this Amendment, all the Government do is to say that the County Council knows better than they do, having local knowledge, how the money may best be spent in their own locality, and being able to deal with the question intelligently, honestly, and fairly. If they refuse this Amendment, it amounts to this: that they are prepared to say to the whole of the County Councils of this country, "We do not believe either in your honesty or your intelligence." I apprehend that will be a very strong thing to say. No doubt, if there has been some previous arrangement which ties the Government to their own proposal in spite of everything, they will have to carry this ridiculous Bill as it stands. We offer them the opportunity of giving the County Councils power to spend on the public houses every single farthing they will get if they think it wise. If the County Councils say they do not want the money for this purpose, why should Gentlemen opposite say that money which is not wanted for public houses should, nevertheless, go to public houses? Supposing that the County Councils say that they do not want this money for enfranchising, or extinguishing, or purchasing, or compensating the licencees of public houses, what follows? Why, we propose that the County Councils, who, it may be presumed, know the wants of their districts, should be entitled to hand the money over in relief of children's pence to people who are absolutely unable to find the money for the education of their children. If there is one thing standing in the way of education in this country and making it unpopular, it is the, perhaps, necessary and inevitable harshness with which the law has to be administered now and then with regard to the poorest of the poor. We are told by a distinguished person in this country that he has a notion of introducing as soon as he can, before his term of office expires—and I am afraid, under the circumstances, he will have to be very quick—something in the nature of free education or assisted education. That will be a bold stroke when it is done, and you must remember that when you have given that stroke you can never retract. You will be taking a leap in the dark of a very serious character, involving an enormous expenditure of money. See, then, what an opportunity this proposal of mine offers you for making an experiment without taking this serious leap in the dark. The opportunity is one that you ought to be extremely glad to avail yourselves of. You can here make an experiment—a small one—in the direction of paying school pence and freeing or assisting education, which will serve to give you experience. The more I consider this proposal of mine the more am I impressed with the fact that I am the greatest benefactor the Government have ever had. I come to them with my hands full of gifts, and nothing but what theologians call "obstinate impenitence" induces them to refuse these gifts. We heard from the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board last night, in opposition to the views enunciated by the hon. Member for Rotherham, his objection to the application of the principle of subvention to anything but a public house. It is said, "The amount you propose to give to education is too small to be of any use." Well, that is a very dangerous proposition to set up, because if it is a very small amount to contribute to children's pence, it is a much smaller amount to give for the purchase of publican's licences. If it is inadequate for the purpose of sending a few children to school, it is very much more inadequate for dealing with the quantity of licences you propose to deal with—so inadequate, in fact, as to lead to the pretty general belief that your true object is not to pass a practical and useful measure for the purchase of licences, but to lay down a principle which will be binding on us and on yourselves. The principle of the Amendment is already in the Bill itself, because, under the 2nd clause, £40,000 is to be applied in relief of school fees in Scotland, and in the 3rd clause a portion of Ireland's share of the duties is to be paid to the Commissioners of National Education. If such an application of the money is good for Scotland and Ireland, surely it is good for England. Why should these distinctions be drawn between the one country and the other? I maintain that this country is not a bit better educated than are Scotland and Ireland; why, then, are you going to subsidise Scotland and Ireland and leave England out in the cold? There has been some talk about money coming from spirits going to spirits; but there is a distinct fallacy in that argument, for money coming from spirits goes to the payment of education in Scotland and Ireland, and I submit that, having acknowledged that principle in the case of those countries, you are bound to acknowledge it in the case of England. If not, you must make out a case for the exception, which, as yet, you have not attempted to do. The measure, as a matter of fact, is purely a patchwork one. Its main object is to give something to the public house keepers, but it has a fringe designed to conceal that object, which is of the most illogical character. If you will not give the whole of this money to education, divide it between the publicans and the children, but do not let it go forth that the one thing dear to your heart is the adequate payment of the public house keeper. Last night the President of the Local Government Board said he objected to giving away money for any other purpose because we have already passed a Resolution indicating that the money is all to be devoted to one object. But there are alternative objects before the Committee; and is it to be said that, whenever alternative proposals are put forward in a measure and the House chooses the first of these, it shall not be competent to go on to the second and propose as a compromise that both objects shall be secured? The only other objection to my proposal is one which it does not lie in the mouths of the Government to make. The President of the Local Government Board last night stated distinctly that there is an objection to handing over this money to a National Council—as was proposed in the case of the Principality of Wales—as distinguished from a Local Authority. His righteous soul revolted against anything that might seem even distantly to savour of Home Rule. I do not think it reasonable, but I can understand the right hon. Gentleman's objection. It is true the Government have not given us National Councils for Ireland, Wales, or Scotland, but there is one thing they have done: they have given us County Councils, and have told us that those bodies are admirably well adapted for dealing with these matters. When the Government first brought in the Local Government Bill, under which the County Councils are now operating throughout the length and breadth of the land, they themselves declared with great effusion and earnestness that this licensing question of all others was the one the County Councils were fittest to deal with, and it does not lie in their mouths to object to conferring the powers I propose on these Councils. We know why they backed out of their original proposal, as they did out of the Wheel and Van Tax and out of their proposals as to sugar; but we say to them, "You have now an opportunity of doing to a limited and tentative extent that which you were anxious to do in 1888. Give to the County Councils—your own offspring, the children of your own bringing up—the very duties and responsibilities which your leading men in 1888 declared that it was a right and proper thing to entrust them with." This proposal is not unreasonable and not illogical. I offer the Government the opportunity of doing this in the interests of temperance. If there is one thing more than another which conduces to temperance, it is a good, sound education; therefore, I claim that my Amendment is in the interest of education, and that such being the case, it should commend itself to the Government. It will please us, as it will be something like a rift in the cloud, and will give us an opportunity of escaping from the consequences of a Bill which, between ourselves, is an abomination. It will be very much to the benefit of the people—which is a thing you care more about than pleasing us. It will be in favour of the County Councils as showing your confidence in them, and, lastly—and this is the strongest reason of all—it will be in favour of yourselves. If this be carried I verily believe that it will disarm the opposition to the Bill from this side of the House almost entirely. I, for one, should be prepared to say that, bad as the Bill is, I would listen to the pathetic appeal of the right hon. Gentleman the leader of the House, who not only urges, but entreats us not to oppose a measure which we believe to be horrible. By accepting my Amendment the Government will take from us the opportunity of saying what we undoubtedly shall say throughout the country in the absence of such an Amendment, namely, that when in the stress of their difficulties we offered them fairly and openly this opportunity of saving themselves from getting entirely in the hands of the publicans and of enabling the County Councils to do something useful with this money, they declined to allow it to be spent usefully, or on any thing which would war with the interests of their pets—the publicans. I do not look at this matter from a Party point of view, although I declare that from such an aspect I wish you would refuse this Amendment, because, in that case, the gain to us would be very great. Already the rift between ourselves and some of our friends who used to work with us earnestly and energetically in times gone by is beginning to close. Already in that section of our Party which has left us there is another rift beginning to manifest itself more and more clearly. Already the consequences of this absolutely insane attempt at legislation has been that you have been flooded with Petitions to an extent almost unparalleled. When you have an opportunity of escaping from your folly you will not seize it. It will be better for us as a Party if you persevere with your Bill, if you continue to bring back to our standard right through the length and breadth of the land hundreds and thousands of men who voted against us at the last Election, but who will never do so again as long as this Bill is not only fathered, but is pushed through by main force, although the force is becoming less and less main force with every Division. You will do to us as a Party more good by pressing forward this Bill than we can do for ourselves by anything we can devise. It will be in vain for you to talk of obstruction. The country will sanction, and will be delighted with any amount of legitimate obstruction which we can put in the way of the passing of this measure, and we shall put such obstruction in the Bill's way. Behind all your bravado we know what your intelligence teaches you, and I ask you, for your own sake as well as for the sake of the country, to accept this Amendment while there is time.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 19, after the word "mentioned," to insert the words "or if the county councils shall so determine, any part of the said sum of £350,000 may be applied in England in relief of the School Board rates, or of the fees payable by or on behalf of the children in elementary schools aided by the State in such proportion as the county councils may determine."—(Mr. Waddy.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'or if the county councils shall so determine' be there inserted."

(9.5.) THE SECRETARY OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. LONG, Wilts, DEVIZES): The proposal of the hon. Member for the Brigg Division is one on behalf of which a great deal might be said on its merits, but the Committee is not now concerned in discussing free or assisted education on its merits. The hon. Gentleman has given the Committee his views on the present condition of the working classes in reference to the cost of the education of their children, and has suggested to the Government that it would be desirable if a portion of this fund could be devoted to purposes of assisting education in the country. Well, the Committee is aware of the fact that announcements have already been made in reference to the question of assisted or free education, and I venture to submit to the hon. Gentleman that his proposal will not go any considerable distance towards relieving the working classes from the difficulties under which they labour in this respect. But I do not propose to discuss the question of free education now. Whether it be good or bad, I look forward to the opportunity Parliament will have of considering the question upon adequate and definite proposals. But I would suggest to opponents of these clauses who are fond of making references to the increasing difficulties of the Government in connection with this measure—statements easily made in regard to this or any other measure—that they should consider their own position. I have a very shrewd suspicion that hon. Gentlemen opposite are getting into far greater difficulties themselves, because, in their extreme desire to attack the Bill, they approach it from so many different points that it is impossible for them to be united, except in a general spirit of hostility to the Bill. One of the chief arguments advanced against the measure is that the sum of money proposed is ludicrously insufficient for the purpose of extinguishing licences. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) gave us last night the result of some interesting calculations he had made, by which he arrived at the exact sums which he said would be distributed to various districts. But this money is to be spread over the whole country; there is no special share to town or village, forming an unit in the whole area over which the sum is to be distributed. But the contention is, that the money we propose for the purpose is ludicrously insufficient, and, therefore, our proposal ought not to be entertained by Parliament. Well, but surely it is 10 times more insufficient for the purposes the hon. Member for the Brigg Division has recommended. He does not even propose that the whole sum of £360,000 should be devoted to the subject of his Amendment. Even if Parliament were to accept the hon. Member's proposal, and the County Councils were to act upon it, what would be the practical result? In certain parts of the country, in a very limited number of cases, there would be assisted or free education, while everywhere else the present system would prevail. I therefore submit, in the first place, that the money is inadequate for the purposes of the hon. Member, and, in the second place, even were the hon. Member's proposal accepted, it would do very little good for the cause he has at heart, namely, free education. The good it would do would make no real mark on the difficulties; it would only accentuate those difficulties in a great many districts by the relief afforded in a very limited number of cases. The hon. Gentleman said the Government had already proposed to devote a certain portion of this money to assisted education in Scotland; but the hon. Gentleman will remember that distinction has already been made in the case of Scotland in the Local Government proposals passed by the House dealing with Scotland. Everybody knows the conditions of education in Scotland differ from those which exist in this country, and the proposals in the Bill with regard to Scotland make no greater distinction between this country and Scotland than already exists. Does any hon. Member who supports this Amendment ask us to believe that the proposal is really made in the interest of the Bill? ["No."] I am glad to have that admission; it is what I expected and desired. Undoubtedly, the desire of hon. Members opposite is to wreck this Bill. ["No; to improve it."]

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermonth): Only the Compensation Clauses.

MR. LONG: Of course, I mean to wreck the licensing clauses. We are justified in the belief that the Amendment is directed to the wreckage of those clauses rather than to the improvement of the measure. Our desire is not in that direction. In the course of his speech the hon. and learned Member for Brigg spoke of the want of intelligence on the part of members of the Government; but if our intelligence is to be estimated by our acceptance or non-acceptance of this Amendment, I am afraid we must continue under his displeasure, and be liable to the description he has given. The proposal contained in the Amendment would only have a very partial effect, and would serve no particular end. The money available is totally inadequate to secure the object aimed at by the hon. Member for Brigg. Without saying a word against the principle of freeing the poorer classes from the burden of school fees I must, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, oppose this Amendment, because it is directed against the Bill, and because, if adopted, it would not effect the object which it pretends to have in view.

(9.10.) MR. STOREY: The hon. Gentleman has indulged in the usual "Pecksniffian" statement that occupants of the Front Bench opposite are burning with anxiety to secure the advantages of education to the poorer people of this country.

MR. LONG: I said I had no desire to contest in any way the sentiments expressed as to the advancement of education.

MR. STOREY: Now, I am disposed to test these allegations. Are the Government really anxious for the cause of education or not? Here is a chance—here is a sum of money which is now at the disposal of the Government, or may be, and the Government have the alternative of providing a fund for the endowment of public houses, or of employing the money, or part of it, as my hon. Friend proposes, for the payment of school fees of poor children in our large towns. The hon. Gentleman says the amount of money in question being ludicrously insufficient, as we allege, to endow public houses—

MR. LONG: No.

MR. STOREY: The hon. Gentleman surely does not remember what he said. That the amount of money being, as we allege, ludicrously insufficient for the endowment of public houses—for the purpose proposed in this Bill—therefore, it is much more insufficient for the purpose of providing for the fees of poor children.

MR. LONG: The hon. Member attributes to me a form of words I did not use. I said an argument used by hon. Gentlemen opposite was that our proposal ought not to be accepted, because the money was inadequate for the purpose; and I said that if hon. Members made that a ground of objection to our proposal, then much more did such an objection apply to the proposal in the Amendment. I did not adopt the suggestion that the amount of money is ludicrously insufficient for the purpose we propose.

Mr. Long

MR. STOREY: Quite so; the hon. Gentleman said the inadequacy was greater in regard to this Amendment. On that I wish to meet the hon. Gentleman with figures. Although the £350,000 will be inadequate for the object the Bill proposes, it would be fairly adequate for the purpose suggested in the Amendment. For instance, the amount to be allocated to the town of Sunderland would be about £1,200 a year, and this, though ludicrously inadequate for the purpose of buying up public houses, would pay the school fees of 1,500 children out of the 12,000 children in Board schools—a number which fairly represents the proportion whose parents require assistance in this matter. So, I say, this sum, paltry as it is, would break the back of the practical difficulty we have in Sunderland, a difficulty, we feel most keenly in bad times, and which is present even in good times. It is a most unpleasant thing for poor parents to go before the School Board, in some instances to go before the Board of Guardians, to plead for exemption from the payment of their children's school fees. All the answer we can give them when they complain is, "It is the law; we have no other method by which you can get relief." But here is a method. The Government have the money in their pouch, and to our request the only answer they will give is that the amount is ludicrously inadequate. I show you an instance in which the amount is not insufficient, and it is my belief that the amount placed at the disposal of County Councils throughout England would be adequate, in many instances, for the purpose we have in view. Let me ask hon. Gentlemen to look at this matter from the point of view and position of a northern artisan. What would be the idea among his fellows if such a man, having an increase in his wages barely sufficient for the maintenance of his family, devoted that increase to such extravagances as that class fall into, instead of devoting it to improving the food and condition of his wife and family? He would be censured for his folly and want of thrift. Yet the Government, with this money at their disposal, insist that it shall be used in a manner that is universally condemned by the working classes. It is to be used in utter defiance of the opinion of all the people concerned. I will not go so far as to prophecy what any particular County Council may do; but I will say, from my knowledge of feeling in the North, and I think other Members will confirm me, that, generally speaking, County Councils will not use this money which is to be forced upon them for purposes such as the Bill indicates. The Government have public money at their disposal, and worthy objects on which to employ it. They know that the object to which they propose to apply it is one with which the County Councils in large districts will have nothing to do, and yet they try deliberately to force on Parliament the employment of the money in this particular direction. For my part, I have been taught ever since I was young that when you get a surplus of money you ought to spend it wisely and worthily, and for the best objects. We do not regard the Government object as a good object, and we consider the alternative objects suggested in this Amendment as more valuable. So much for the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Brigg. You, Sir, were good enough to tell me that the particular Amendment which I have suggested was one that must fall with the Amendment of my hon. Friend. I confess I do not quite see why that should be so; but one must not compete with masters of legions, and I, therefore, accept the ruling which, doubtless, in good time you will give. But I hope I shall be in order in explaining that the Amendment I wished to propose was not in antagonism to that of my hon. Friend—it was rather supplementary. It sought to provide that, if the County Councils so determined, the money might be employed for the establishment and maintenance of free libraries and museums. As an argument against the Amendment of my hon. Friend, it might be urged that the County Councils have at present nothing to do with education, although we hope that shortly those duties will be entrusted to them. But it cannot be denied that the County Councils have the right—and the sole right—to deal with the question of museums and libraries. I apprehend there is no Member in this House who would not be willing to see a free library in every town and in every village, and a public museum in all the large centres of population. What prevents that end being attained at the present time is not the lack of willingness on the part of the people, but a lack of funds at their disposal. It may be alleged that on numerous occasions in the past the rate-payers of towns have, on a poll, decided against the establishment of a free library. I confess with shame and sorrow that that has sometimes been the case, and, that being so, I think it is incumbent on Parliament to do what it can to improve the mind of the people on this subject. Still, considerable progress has been made in this matter. I hold in my hand a Return made as long ago as February, 1885, which shows that at that time there were no fewer than 99 places in England where free libraries had been established. Since that date there has been a very large increase in the number of places in which they have been established, and, probably, there are in England at the present time more than twice 99. In Scotland, in 1885, there were only 11 places in which there were free libraries, and in Ireland only four or five, but doubtless in the two sister islands there has also been a considerable improvement. How does the law stand as to the money which the Municipal Authorities may employ for free libraries. They are limited to expending 1d. in the £1 on the rateable value. I never could see why the Legislature should have imposed such a limit, and I think that as the Government have so much superfluous time and energy at their disposal they might utilise it in removing that limit. At present, as I have said, municipalities can only spend 1d. in the £1.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Member, but I may point out that the sum has been altered in some cases, and notably in the case of Birmingham.

MR. STOREY: I was just going to reinforce my argument by drawing attention to the case of Birmingham. It is a fact that a few years ago Birmingham, and several other municipalities, by special local Acts, extended the limit of a 1d. rate, and many others would have been, no doubt, as likely to do so had not my right hon. Friend, who is nothing if not extremely accurate in his dealings with the Committee charged with such matters—I mean the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton—induced them to agree with him that none of the Committees dealing with private Acts should in future give to municipalities any power exceeding the powers of a general Act of Parliament. Now, what is the case in Sunderland, which I have the honour to represent in this House? Sunderland, which was one of the first towns in the country to adopt the Free Libraries Act, is considerably hampered by that limit of 1d., and cannot buy the more expensive books they think necessary. A penny in the £1 there produces £1,700 a year. We built out of the rates a very handsome library building, and, after paying the interest on the Sinking Fund and other charges, we are seriously crippled. Our people read the books with avidity, and if the Government would only give us the money they are now going to so vilely misuse we would show what a progressive Radical town in the North can do. The Town Council of Sunderland will not apply 1d. of this money to the purposes of buying up public houses, which they have another way of getting rid of, and the result will be that the Government will be putting this money by in a stocking, and it will be used for no beneficial purpose whatever. We know quite well that we are not discussing this matter for the sake of argument. We do not expect to be argued with. We do not want to be argued with. We know exactly what is being meted out to us. We may argue and we may convince the consciences of hon. Members opposite, but we know that, by-and-by, they will vote us down. For my part, I give the Government fair notice that we shall continue to oppose this Bill. I call the action of the majority in voting us down without argument, brutally un-Parliamentary. By discussion you may take the words of the complaint and condemnation out of our mouths. But you sit still. You listen to what we say; you may think in your hearts that what we say is right, but you add—you supporters of the Ministry add—"We must vote with the Government." If you treat us in this way, I give you fair notice, you shall never get a vote until you compel the Division by the power vested in the Chair. And then, of course, we shall be twitted with obstruction.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. STOREY: If we are twitted with obstruction on these grounds, I shall frankly reply that I have obstructed in this matter, and that I will obstruct. When I once make up my mind, and state a thing, hon. Members know I generally mean it. I have obstructed this Bill, and I will obstruct it by every means in my power, and the Front Opposite Bench have nothing to do with this action of mine.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member must address himself to the Amendment.

MR. STOREY: The proposal of this Amendment is to secure the spending of this money for the education of poor children, instead of for the endowment of public houses, and I was complaining that the Government had not argued this matter. This question was not before the country at the last General Election; it was not even mentioned in the Queen's Speech. So far as we know, the great body of the people are opposed to it, and I think it is the duty of independent Members like myself to force matters until the Government are compelled to go back to the constituencies whom they are so deceiving.

*(9.50.) MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I have no doubt that the hon. Member who has just delivered a speech, characterised by no great delicacy of language, has passed much time in, but has not derived much improvement from, free libraries and museums. In the town I represent may be found one of the best institutions of the kind in the North of England. I wish the hon. Gentleman would have delivered such a speech as we have just heard before an audience of the working men of that town. I do not think it would have been well received.

MR. STOREY: I will come whenever the hon. Member invites me.

*MR. POWELL: If his own political friends will invite him I will do my best to secure for him a fair hearing. He has complained of the inadequacy of the sum at present devoted to the maintenance of free libraries. Now, we have in Wigan a splendid library, the first collection of books being the result of private beneficence. The building in which it is stored was a gift, and yet, notwithstanding that double munificence, the amount of 1d. in the £1 was found to be inadequate; last year, therefore, the borough came to Parliament and the limit was extended to 2d. This is being done by other boroughs year after year, and it is a duty which the Police and Sanitary Committee is frequently called on to perform. Now, there is a Bill before the House, introduced by the right hon. Baronet the Member for the University of London, which has for its object the extension of the limit; and I should like to know what assistance the hon. Member opposite has given in its promotion. Has he used his influence with any of his friends to prevent its progress being objected to after midnight? So long as he remains passive in that matter I think we are entitled to interpret his views on this Amendment in the light of his conduct in regard to that Bill. I wish to see the Bill of my right hon. Friend carried. I wish to see free libraries established throughout the length and breadth of the country. Great progress has been made in the past, and I hope still greater progress will be made in the future. This seems to me to be a dilatory Amendment. It is devised for the purpose, I will not say of wasting time, but of consuming time. I do not think the cause either of free or of assisted education would be strengthened by the adoption of this Amendment. Such a course would have the effect of throwing local funds into confusion. Hon. Members have said that the County Councils in Wales, and in the North of England, will not use this money for the extinction of licensed houses. No prophecy could be more uncertain, and I believe that if the Bill becomes law its provisions will gradually be put in force throughout the country, and that the cause of temperance will be advanced. Much has been said in the course of this Debate on the subject of free and assisted education, but it appears to me that hon. Members opposite only become energetic on this matter when the Government are seeking to push forward their Bills. Now, Sir, I think the House would do well to allow the Prime Minister to develop the scheme he has already shadowed forth. It is only reasonable that, having suggested a scheme on this subject, he should be allowed to give form to it. I do not understand whether the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman opposite is intended to be specifically in the interests of the rates, or of the children, or of the schools; whereas every person who is dealing with the question of education ought to say distinctly and definitely what he proposes to do when he is asking Parliament to devote money for educational purposes, letting us know clearly whether it is in relief of rates, for the benefit of the children, or for the advantage of the schools, as forming part of a great educational institution. Unless you set clearly before your minds the objects for which the money is to be granted, your scheme must be vague, shadowy, and unreal, and must necessarily fail. In regard to the question of rates, nothing can be more calculated to stir up strife than to give County Councils the power of applying public money in aid of the rates for educational purposes, especially where there are two systems of education, which have been, and are, the cause of much difference of opinion. I am sure it is in the interests of education that the two systems should exist, side by side, and that there should be a wholesome rivalry, without which the voluntary schools must perish. But here we have a scheme to enable County Councils to apply money entirely for the School Board schools, without any corresponding aid to the voluntary schools. This is the first time that such a proposal has been made. To adopt such a system would be to inflict great wrong on the voluntary schools, and would be strongly resented by those who have hitherto laboured in the cause of education. It was only the other day there was a chorus of applause from every part of the House in favour of the action of my right hon. Friend the President of the Council, who was then said to be an enlightened man and a pioneer in advancing the cause of education. Now, however, this chorus is at an end, and we are being condemned, as we have been before, for neglect and apathy in regard to the education of the country. Nevertheless, in the course of this controversy we on this side of the House have ever been the first to endeavour to advance the cause of popular education, and I believe we are in the front now. We shall certainly not be deterred from the course we are taking on this subject by the kind of obstacles which are raised by this Amendment. We regard the question of education as our own, we are proud of the work we have done in past days, when we were leading the way in this matter, and knowing all this, and being conscious of our present sincerity, we shall not be deterred from opposing a proposition which we believe to be inopportune in its initiation, uncertain in its results, and calculated rather to hinder than to advance the great work of education.

(10.5.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby):

I do not rise to speak at any length on this subject, but I think the House ought clearly to understand the issue raised by this Amendment. The last speaker has made the singular appeal that we should leave this question of education in the hands of the Prime Minister, in consequence of the speech he made five years ago. Well, we all know that when a person takes out a patent the rule is that he ought to give the public the benefit of it, or not be allowed to maintain his patent-right. Considering that the speech made at Newport by Lord Salisbury was made as long ago as 1885, and that nothing has yet come of it, we may, perhaps, be forgiven if we infringe the patent-right of the Prime Minister, and suggest that we can now take out a patent-right for ourselves. The House has, undoubtedly, but contrary to our opinion, determined that a portion of the money or the whole sum provided by the Bill shall, if the County Councils think fit, be applied to the purchase of public houses; but we assert, and I do not think hon. or right hon. Gentlemen opposite will deny the assertion, that a great number of the County Councils will not use the money for such a purpose. You know that the London County Council would not so use it, and that no County Council in Wales will apply it in this way. I think you may also assume that no County Council in Scotland will so apply it, and I may take it, on high authority, that the County Council of Derby will not so use it. Indeed, I doubt whether you will find anyone in this House, if you were to poll the assembly, who would say that he thinks the County Council of the district to which he belongs would use the money for such a purpose. I do not know whether, even in the wilds of Wiltshire and the neighbourhood of Stonehenge, where there are very few public houses, the County Council would be disposed to apply the money in this manner. And I doubt whether, even in the district of the Under Secretary (Mr. Long), where the squires and brewers govern the country, they would give the power to use the money for this purpose. All, however, I ask you to admit is, that there are a considerable number of County Councils who would not apply the money for the purpose intended by this Bill. Therefore, I ask, can there be anything more reasonable than that you should give an alternative to those County Councils who do not like your proposal? Is it rational to say to those bodies, "Here is a sum of money. You shall use it for this purpose. If you do not approve of that purpose you shall not use it at all?" I ask the right hon. Gentleman, the author of the County Councils, is it rational to treat County Councils in this way? Why, Sir, it is treating them with contempt; it is saying to them, "You are no judges of the interests of the community of which you have charge. We have determined what you shall do; we dictate to you a public policy, and if you do not adopt it the money we offer you shall lie idle." Now, the hon. Member for Brigg proposes to say to these bodies, "Here is so much money, we will authorise you to devote it, if you think fit, to the interests of the brewers and the publicans, but you may also devote it to another purpose, should you desire to do so." I have read a good many of the speeches made in the country by the Under Secretary to the Local Government Board, and I may say of him that a more thorough going publicans' and brewers' man I do not know. I think he is a sincerely convinced publicans' man; in fact, a more upright and downright or outright liquor man I cannot imagine. No doubt he is so from profound moral conviction, and, from the language he holds, his belief in good liquor is the foundation of all his speeches. Therefore, I read this Bill a good deal more with the mind of the Under Secretary than with that of the President of the Local Government Board. But I cannot help thinking that this Bill would enable the publican minded man to have it all his own way. What I say is, let the education minded man have his chance. Well, Sir, I want to make it quite clear to the Committee what the issue is on what we are about to vote. The Committee is going to vote on the one side for the public houses, and on the other side for the village schools. That is the point at issue. We demand for the County Councils that they, at least, shall have the opportunity of applying this money to educational purposes, if they think fit. I appeal—not to the Chancellor of the Exchequer; he is what I should call a vested-interest-minded man; he judges of these great moral questions, as we have already been told in witty language, by the Standard of Consols—I am appealing to the President of the Local Government Board, who looks at things from a rather more common sense point of view, who appreciates the fact that there is a Party in this country who prefer the interests of education to the vested interests of the publicans. I ask him whether he will not afford his own children, the County Councils, their own choice between education and liquor. We do not insist on education. There are some people who think education is dangerous and mischievous. I believe that in Wiltshire they think it takes children away from the plough and raises wages. These are views which I know are still held in the more enlightened and Conservative parts of the country. But there are places where these views are not held—where the population is large, and the people prefer education. All we now ask is that the County Councils shall be allowed to make their choice. I do not wish to detain the Committee any longer. I am quite ready that the vote shall be registered, and that the country shall understand that it is between the public house and the village school.

(10.16.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I am not going to follow the right hon. Gentleman through the whole of his speech. I wish, in one or two sentences, to point out the utter hollowness of the right hon. Gentleman's contention. The right hon. Gentleman has before him the declaration of the Government that next Session—[Opposition cries of "Oh!" and "Next Session!"] The Government and their supporters have listened patiently to the rigmarole of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby; they have even allowed him to use most insulting expressions; and the moment there is to be a reply, hon. Members opposite, who are so temperate, cannot control themselves. The right hon. Gentleman knows that the Government are pledged to introduce a measure next Session [ Opposition cries of "Oh!" and "Next Session!" ] I am surprised that it is impossible to conduct an argument with any degree of regularity. The Government are pledged to bring in a measure next year with regard to assisted education, by which fees in elementary schools will be paid; and now the right hon. Gentleman wishes to set up the plea that it is a question between the village school and the public house. The right hon. Gentleman never thought of the village school or of any department of education before the Government introduced the proposals now under consideration. Education is not one of the specialties of the right hon. Gentleman. The village school will be provided for next Session, but the Government welcome the declaration which has been made, because we see that the Party opposite are about to pledge themselves to give £350,000 of public money to elementary schools aided by the State. The Government welcome this declaration, made for the first time by the Liberal Party, of a desire to devote this money to all schools aided by the State, for the Amendment contains no distinction between denominational schools and other schools. The hon. Member for the Brigg Division, in his eagerness to attack the Government and establish a bogus contrast between the public house and the school, has blundered into an Amendment by which he and his Dissenting friends, who are pledged up to the hilt not to give a farthing to denominational schools, propose to give £350,000 to all State-aided schools. Hon. Gentlemen opposite, in their keen desire to prove the wickedness of the Bill, are accepting a principle which they have denounced for years. There will be an interesting Division. Hon. Members on this side of the House will vote for the application of the money to the diminution of public houses—a principle which has been advocated by the Liberal Party generally. On the other hand, hon. Gentlemen opposite will vote for the application of the money to the relief of school fees, which the Government have promised to remit next year; and they will vote for an Amendment embodying a principle which all those Dissenting bodies who have condemned this Bill have protested against with equal emphasis and loudness.

(10.25.) MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): The right hon. Gentleman finds fault with my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby, and says, forsooth, that we are now for the first time showing our zeal for free schools. Yes; but my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby, in 1885, strongly and widely advocated free schools at the moment when the Chancellor of the Exchequer was fighting his election at Edinburgh expressly on the ground of his inveterate hostility to free schools. And yet the Chancellor of the Exchequer taunts my right hon. Friend with inconsistency, forgetting his own attitude on this very question! I was amused to see the Pharisaic air with which the Chancellor of the Exchequer asked the Committee how it was they had any doubts as to the views of the Government, because they had pledged themselves. The House has had a pretty good example to-night of the value of the Government's pledges. They have been pledged for four years to Local Government for Ireland, and yet that measure is put off, certainly till 1892. What security is there that next year, as in the present year, the Chancellor of the Exchequer will not interpolate into the Government programme some measure which is not in the Queen's Speech, and which neither the House nor the country, still less the right hon. Gentleman's followers, expected or desired. No, Sir, we shall certainly vote for the proposal of my right hon. Friend. We shall vote for it without the slightest compunction or idea that we are losing any boon which Her Majesty's Government now find it convenient to offer, but which, judging from the attitude of the right hon. Gentleman himself upon the question, we can have very little confidence will be carried out on the lines we pursue.

*(10.28.) MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): I protest against the Chancellor of the Exchequer's presumption that we are committing ourselves, by the words of this Amendment, to anything like what he pretends. We are merely voting for a principle which is already established in Scotland. However, speaking for myself, I would rather every shilling of this money went into the parsons' pocket than go to the purchase of public houses. On the old motto, "Of two evils choose the least." We think that we are choosing the lesser of two evils. But the words of the Amendment are clear enough. We desire by it to entrust popularly-elected Bodies, namely, the County Councils, with the distribution of this money for the purposes of elementary education. Well, we have no hesitation at all. The vote is between this money going for beer or books, and

I am going to vote for books. I rise for a specific object, and I will say it in as few words as I can, and without giving unnecessary offence. Are you hon. Members going to vote for "beer" with your hands perfectly clean, and are you satisfied that you ought to vote at all on this matter? On Petty Sessional Benches, when there are questions of licensing, members who are connected with the brewing trade leave the Bench. I ask the Government whether they are prepared to tell the House how many hon. Gentlemen on the opposite Benches have their hands steeped in this trade? I have received letters from the west country, on the strength of which I ask for this Return. A letter from a constituent of one of the occupants of the Government Bench says that that Member is interested in a brewery to the extent of £35,000, and is the owner besides of public houses. I hold in my hand another letter from a constituent of a Cabinet Minister, saying that that right hon. Gentleman is a trustee or a director of a large company owning 153 tied houses. Then I challenge the hon. Member for Wigan to say that he has no interest in public houses.

*MR. F. S. POWELL: If the hon. Member is referring to me, I may say that, as far as I am the owner of houses of that kind, I have always kept them under my own control.

*MR. WINTERBOTHAM: All I desire to say is whether hon. Members who are interested in property of this kind ought not to act on the same principle as Magistrates, who, when they are personally interested in a question brought before them, leave the Bench. And I do not hesitate to give my own opinion that hon. Members opposite whom this legislation will benefit pecuniarily ought to refrain from voting, and that if they did, this unhappy Bill would be quickly defeated.

(10.32.) MR. WADDY: I should not have said a word in reply if it had not been for the ill-advised attack made on me by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who, with his usual candour, read only the half of the Amendment, and represented it as the whole. Having done that, the right hon. Gentleman was good enough to refer to me as one among a number of Dissenters who are now committed to proposals which they have never hitherto accepted. With an ignorance that belongs, I suppose, to Chancellors of the Exchequer with regard to matters of this kind—although they are omniscient with regard to matters of another kind—he says that the religious body to which I belong passed a certain Resolution. I beg to tell him that the religious body to which I belong never resolved in the direction the right hon. Gentleman indicates, but resolved exactly the opposite. He is entirely wrong in his facts, and is entirely wrong in the conclusions he draws from them. The only other observation the right hon. Gentleman made upon which I wish to make a remark was that we should not pass this Amendment, because the Government are pledged to produce a certain Bill hereafter. In reply to that, I would say that, although the Government may have pledged themselves to introduce a Bill, from our experience of their pledges we have no right to expect that they will fulfil their promise, unless it relates to a measure for the benefit of someone from whom they have a reasonable expectation of receiving votes. They will get no votes from poor children who would be benefitted by free education, therefore we must not be too sanguine of a redemption of their pledges in this regard. We should put no more faith in the pledges of the Government than we do in their power as prophets, when they foretell where they will be or what power they will be exercising next year.

(10.36.) MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): We have had some very interesting arguments from the other side of the House as to why we should vote in favour of the Amendment of the hon. Member for the Brigg Division. We first had an interesting speech from the hon. Member for Wigan, who showed his great zeal for free libraries by refusing to do anything to help them, because, forsooth, a certain Bill that he is interested in has met the fate that many of our Private Bills have met on account of the 12 o'clock Rule. And then he objects to any of this money going to relieve him of the necessity of passing the Bill, which he is anxious to see placed on the Statute Book. Then we were accused by the hon. Member of new-born zeal in favour of free or assisted education. He said he had not heard much about the matter, but if he will make inquiries he will find that early in the Session an interesting discussion took place on free education, initiated by the hon. Member for Rotherham, on an Amendment to the Address, when the whole of this side of the House went into the Lobby in favour of free education. And the hon. Member also knows that hon. Members on this side of the House have freely expressed an opinion in favour of this money being devoted to purposes of education, instead of being frittered away in the manner proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. There is, I may say, a very strong opinion outside the House that many of the Members opposite who vote in favour of the Government proposals have some very distinct reason for the zeal they exhibit. No doubt the Bill is in favour of the great brewers, and I think that the observations of the hon. Member for the Cirencester Division require some answer. I find that a newspaper which represents the brewing interest, amongst other things of a like nature, referring to a new issue of Bass & Co's. stock, £910,000 in 5 per cent. debentures, offered to the public at a premium of £12 for every £100, says—

"We suppose it will be used like the last debenture issue, that is, in an extension of the London and tied trade. The wisdom of this admits of no argument, and its result is seen in the enormous increase of this trade for the last 12 months."

That is the sort of thing you are doing, that is what hon. Members mean when they talk about protecting "the poor publican's widows and orphans—" building up enormous profits for these large Brewery Companies. It is simply a matter of greasing the fat sow over again in the person of the great brewers. I could almost wish that the Government would pursue its course, because I am firmly convinced it is a course most objectionable to the majority of the people of the country. There will be a time when the people will have an opportunity of pronouncing upon the policy of the Government, and, for our part, we hope that that opportunity will be given as speedily as possible. I have great pleasure in supporting any Amendment which will devote this money to a legitimate and useful purpose, and I believe sincerely that if the Government accept the alternative of this Amendment it will not wreck their Bill, but will prove beneficial to them and to the people at large.

*(10.45.) MR. JAMES ELLIS (Leicestershire, Bosworth): I can speak as to the vast amount of good which can be effected by the utilisation of small amounts of money in our rural districts. I know a case in which £100 a year was left to be spent for the benefit of a village, and where the legacy has been productive of a vast amount of benefit to the locality. But the money to be given to the localities under this Bill is worth absolutely nothing. It is said that there is only one "bottomless pit," but I know of two others in addition to the one ordinarily referred to, and they are war and drink. I hold the latter to be the worst of the two, and I submit that in subsidising it, as is now proposed, infinite harm will result. Your money will be worse than thrown away; whereas, if spent in the manner suggested in the Amendment, it will be productive of a vast amount of good in almost every direction.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Question be now put."—(Mr. Ritchie.)

(10.47.) MR. STOREY (sitting with his hat on): I wish, Mr. Courtney, to ask for your ruling on a point of order: whether a gentleman charged publicly in this House, and sitting on the Front Bench, with having a pecuniary interest in this question should be allowed to vote? I beg to point out that I was prevented from rising to a point of order by the President of the Local Government Board prematurely moving the Closure to end the discussion.

(10.48.) THE CHAIRMAN: It is not a point of order on which I can pronounce. I am unable to ascertain the accuracy or inaccuracy of the statements made.

(10.48.) MR. STOREY: May I point out that the hon. Member for Wigan distinctly said he was the owner of a public house? And I find that under Sections 211 and 212, as I read them, if he had been in a Town Council he would not have been allowed to vote.

Ayes 230; Noes 201.—(Div. List, No. 142.)

(11.10.) Question put accordingly.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 209;
Noes 248.—(Div. List, No. 143.)

(11.20.) MR. STOREY: I rise, Sir, to move that you report Progress, and ask leave to sit again. I do so for the purpose of having the Speaker in the Chair, so that the House may at once be able to consider and inquire into the allegations which were made by an hon. Member on this side of the House (Mr. Winterbotham) during the Debate, and which have been left absolutely unanswered by right hon. and hon. Gentlemen whose conduct was impugned. The allegation of my hon. Friend was that a Member of the Cabinet was directly interested in the liquor traffic, and that another hon. Member (Mr. Long) on the Government Bench, who is conducting the Bill, was also directly interested in it, and that, notwithstanding that, they continued to vote for this Bill. [Ministerial cries of "Whitbread" and "Stansfeld."]

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order.

MR. STOREY: Now, Mr. Courtney, how absurd an interruption surely is. When I made that assertion, hon. Members opposite called out the name of a brewer on this side of the House, but has that brewer voted for his own interest? Hon. Members on our side of the House who are interested in this traffic have either voted against your Bill, or they have had the decency to stay away. The Standing Order to which I direct the attention of the House reads as follows:—

"No Member is entitled to vote upon any question in which he has a direct pecuniary interest, and the vote of any Member so interested will be disallowed."

And then Standing Order, No. 212, is as follows:—

"By Resolution, 27th June, 1844 (Instruction to the Middle Level Drainage Bill Committee), the Rule of this House, relating to the vote upon any question in the House, of a Member having an interest in the matter upon which the vote is given, applies likewise to any vote of a Member so interested in a Committee."

The question I have to ask—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I have had some doubt as to whether this is a point which should be considered with Mr. Speaker in the Chair—Mr. Speaker has no knowledge of what goes on in Committee—and I have found a reference to an express case. If the matter is considered at all, it should be considered by the Committee itself. It would, therefore, be out of order to move to report Progress, in order that this question should be considered with the Speaker in the Chair.

MR. STOREY: Then I shall simply repeat my Motion, that you do now report Progress, in order that we may consider the question in Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN: If I reported Progress the Committee would at once be separated. That is not the appropriate Motion. The Motion, if a Motion is to be made, must be that the vote of such and such a person be disallowed on account of his having a direct pecuniary interest.

(11.24.) MR. STOREY: Then I will go to the root of the question, and move that the vote of the right hon. Baronet the President of the Board of Trade (Sir M. Hicks Beach) be disallowed, that the vote of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Local Government Board (Mr. Long) be also disallowed, and that the vote of the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. F. S. Powell), who informed the House that he is the owner of public houses, shall also be disallowed.

(11.25.) THE CHAIRMAN: Now that the subject has assumed a definite shape, I think I may give an opinion from the Chair. There is authority which expressly bears upon it. The Motion for disallowing the vote which a Member has given in a Division must be made on the ground that that Member has a direct pecuniary interest in the vote. It must be made, as it has been laid down by a predecessor of my own in the Chair, on the ground that the Member has a private pecuniary interest, and one not relating to a question of public policy. I think, on that ground alone, it would be incompetent to make such a Motion as has been made; but, looking at the fact that the action of the County Councils, in respect of the extinction of licences, is not an action forced upon them, but, as has been said, in many cases County Councils would not act upon it at all, the interest which any Member could take in the action of a County Council hereafter is so contingent and so foreign to the direct pecuniary interest contemplated by the Order that I think the Motion is not in order.

*(11.27.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): As the hon. Member thought fit to mention my name, I should like to ask him on what authority he did so? I desire to say I have not a single share in any Brewery Company, but that I am the owner of a single village public house which brings me in £20 a year.

MR. STOREY again rose, and was greeted with loud cries of "Withdraw."

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! If the hon. Gentleman has any observation to make no doubt the Committee will be glad to hear him, but it is evident the discussion could not be continued.

(11.28.) MR. STOREY: The observation I wish to make is this. I singled out the name of the Member of the Cabinet because I understood—[Cries of "Order!" and "Withdraw!"—]—I will take my own time. Of course, there is no doubt about the name. It is that of my hon. Friend who made the statement in the House, and no doubt he will speak for himself. As far as I am concerned I say at once frankly that I withdraw what I said, and frankly apologise to the right hon. Gentleman; and I shall only be glad, for the credit of this House and for the sake of decency, if I can have the same opportunity with regard to the hon. Gentleman whom I also mentioned.

*(11.29.) MR. WINTERBOTHAM: I ask the kind indulgence of the House in a matter of personal explanation. I hold in my hand a letter which I had with me when I made my speech. I stated then that I had a letter from a gentleman of repute—[Cries of "Name!"—]—charging a Cabinet Minister—["Name!"] I am first of all going to tell the House, if hon. Members will allow me, what the letter states. I decline, without the consent of the writer, to give the name; but I shall be happy to show it to any gentleman on the Front Bench as a proof of bona fides. Having stated what the charge is I shall accept gladly the word of either of those two gentlemen that the statement is not true, and will apologise willingly for having brought their names before the House. The first charge is, that the right hon. Gentleman who spoke last "is a Director or Trustee, or both, of the firm of Messrs. Agg-Gardner & Co., brewers, Cheltenham." My correspondent mentions the name Sir M. Hicks Beach. The next charge is—[Ministerial cries of "Charge!"] I beg pardon; I withdraw the word. [HON. MEMBERS: "Charge?"]

THE CHAIRMAN: Hon. Gentlemen will be good enough to allow the hon. Member to proceed.

*MR. WINTERBOTHAM: I withdraw the word, and I substitute the word statement. [VOICES: "Allegations."] The second statement refers to my hon. Friend the Under Secretary to the Local Government Board, and it states that he has a considerable pecuniary interest in the firm of Messrs. Robert Long & Co., brewers, Marlborough. I again repeat that I will show this letter to any hon. Gentleman opposite who would like to see it; but I do not think it would be right for me, nor, I think, would hon. Gentlemen opposite wish me, to mention the writer's name without his consent; and I repeat that if my correspondent is in error I shall gladly accept the word of either of those two hon. Gentlemen, and shall gladly apologise for having brought their names before the House.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: With reference to the statement just made, I have to say that when my hon. Friend, whom I have known for many years, the Member for Cheltenham, converted his brewery into a Limited Company he asked me, as a personal favour, to become a Trustee. I did so; I am a Trustee for the shareholders of that Company. Yet, if the County Council bought up every public house belonging to that Company, not one single penny would go into my pocket.

MR. LONG: As far as I understand the assertion of my hon. Friend opposite, it is that I am a partner or interested in the concern of Messrs. Robert Long & Co., of Marlborough. Robert Long, of Marlborough, is my brother; I naturally am extremely interested in him. I am desirous to see my brother's affairs prosper, and to assist him in any way I can; but I am not a partner nor a shareholder, nor am I in any way interested in the concern.

MR. RITCHIE: I think it right, as an allegation was made in the course of the Debate that my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Local Government Board was more responsible for this Bill than myself, and as his name has been mentioned in connection with this matter, to say that my hon. Friend had no part whatever either in the inception or in the preparation of this Bill, and was not aware either of the Bill or the propositions in the Bill until it was printed.

*MR. WINTERBOTHAM: I willingly apologise to the right hon. Gentleman for being the cause of his name being brought before the House. At the same time, I desire to point out that my correspondent said "a Trustee or Director, or both," and therefore there is no inaccuracy in my correspondent. If there is any blame it belongs to me. I am sorry [Interruption and cry of "Order!"]; but I am bound also to point out that the statement of my correspondent as regards the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Local Government Board was not that he was a partner at all, but that he had a pecuniary interest in the firm of Robert Long and Co. However, I understand him to deny that he has any pecuniary interest in the firm.

MR. LONG: I do not know, of course, how far terms may be strained. I am extremely anxious not to mislead or to be misunderstood. I can assure the House that I feel very acutely the uncomfortable position in which I have been placed by this allegation. There is a matter that did not occur to me, and I think I am justified in saying that when my hon. Friend opposite made reference to this matter to me in the House the other day, I understood him then to say that his information was in the direction that I had a large pecuniary interest in a brewery concern. This I denied, and I think my hon. Friend will bear me out that I then told him I wished it were true, that I should be very glad if it were, and that nobody would rejoice more than I should, and I told him it was true that I was a shareholder in a Brewery Company, and did not refer to this matter of my brother, because I did not know it was referred to at all. I have no pecuniary interest in it at all. All I have done to my brother I have done to other members of my family; I have lent him some money. I suppose this is not the first time transactions have passed between relatives of that kind. I think it necessary and right to state this, because it might be said afterwards that I had an interest in having lent money to my brother in his concern. All I can say is that that is the extent of my interest. I have now put the House in possession of the whole information.

(11.40.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): The Amendment I have to propose is to provide that the residue of the English share of the Local Taxation Duties should be distributed "Among the several counties and county boroughs in proportion to the amounts which the Commissioners of Inland Revenue shall certify to have been received by them in the then last preceding financial year on account of licences granted by them in respect of on-licences of premises in such counties and county boroughs."

I think the Committee would be in a false position if we attempted to discuss this Amendment this evening. The President of the Local Government Board laid upon the Table of the House last night a most important Return showing how the sums appropriated to Local Taxation account were distributed in the last financial year, and that Return is now in the printer's hands. It is impossible to discuss the Amendment until we have this Return before us; and, therefore, I venture to suggest not that the clause should be postponed, that would be a foolish suggestion, but that the words after "fund" should be omitted, in order that the words "hereinafter provided" may be inserted; so that when we have had the opportunity of studying this Return and checking it, a subsequent clause can be brought up to regulate the principle on which this money should be distributed.

MR. ROWNTREE (Scarborough): In order that the question of boroughs may not be prejudiced I would ask that the words be inserted after the word "distributed."

Amendment proposed, to leave out all the words after the word "distributed," in page 1, line 20, to end of clause, and to add the words "as hereinafter provided" inserted.

Amendment agreed to.

Question proposed, "That Clause 1, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

(11.45.) MR. STOREY: I desire to move that the clause be left out of the Bill. I do so for several reasons, some general and some specific in their nature. I do so, first of all, on the general ground that the Government received from the country at the General Election no authority to deal with this question. They are creating a precedent and establishing a principle which, though the pecuniary dimensions of the present measure may be slight, will ultimately involve the country against its will in a large expenditure of money. Besides, the country has not even had a few months in which to consider this important question. If the Bill is considered of such extreme importance, surely the Government might have done the House the honour of mentioning it in the Queen's Speech; but for the first time in the history of recent Parliaments it is found that, whereas the Speech from the Throne mentioned several important measures, in this case the attention of the House is forcibly directed to a question which has not been mentioned therein, and the other important measures which have been mentioned are set aside. I believe that the people of the country, by an enormous majority, are dead against this measure; and I deny the moral right of this Government to force such a Bill through the House of Commons in face of the expressions of public opinion against it. We do know something of public opinion on the subject, for this is not the first time the Government have proposed some such measure as this, not the first time the Government have tried to benefit their friend the publicans. A similar attempt was made in 1888, and we know how public opinion went then. Public opinion, so far as we have had opportunity to judge, has not changed. We see this in the Press, in public meetings, in Petitions to this House. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board has told us that people who have signed these Petitions do not understand the precise points of the question as to which they sign the Petition; and, if I mistake not, he, or one of the right hon Gentleman's colleagues, said this in reference to the great Wesleyan Body.

*MR. RITCHIE: I do not think I ever referred to Petitions. What I did refer to was the passing of resolutions, and it was on the terms of these resolutions I made the statement.

MR. STOREY: I have looked through a considerable number of Petitions, and, in my judgment, the gentlemen who prepare and sign them understand precisely the points upon which they appeal to the House. The Primitive Methodists, for example, recently held a meeting at Sunderland, and discussed the Bill. They sent a Memorial to Parliament representing 190,000 members, more than a quarter of a million of adherents, and 1,000 ministers, protesting against the proposals of the Government to pay takes for withdrawing licences from public houses. That Petition seems to be very much to the point. ["No."] Not to the point?

*MR. RITCHIE: No.

MR. STOREY: The Bill does not pay public money for the withdrawal of licences? Well, I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman means to trip me up on some purely technical term—

*MR. RITCHIE: No; I have no wish to do that. I only want to make myself understood. The hon. Gentleman will observe the expression "compensation for licences withdrawn." I only want to be understood. I do not mean a merely technical objection—the expression seems to imply that a licence being refused, compensation would be given, whereas when licences are withdrawn by the Licensing Authority the publicans have no title to compensation or any payment under the Bill.

MR. STOREY: The right hon. Gentleman is quite right; mine was not the proper way of putting it, but I have made reference to the resolution I was referring to, and I find that the Primitive Methodists in this resolution, which I find represents the opinion of some 195,000 members, and 580,000 adherents, protest against the "Payment of public money for the extinction of licences which are only granted for a year, believing, as we do, that to create a property in licences is unjust to the tax payers."

Here, then, it is evident there is no misapprehension of the proposals in the Bill. Indeed, it is not easy to deceive the people of this country on public questions of this character. You may do it for a week, I have known a Government do it for a month, but the natural shrewdness of the people soon discovers the truth. The right hon. Gentleman tried to make out a case in opposition to our statements of the result of public meetings, and gave instances of votes being carried at public meetings in favour of the Government proposals. He referred to Gateshead, a borough I know pretty well—and let me say of Gateshead, as of other towns, that I should not be surprised if votes were carried at public meetings in favour of the Government, knowing, as I do, the conditions that obtain in large towns, and the number of persons interested in the licensed victuallers' trade. We, the opponents of this Bill, engage the largest hall in the town, and invite free attendance without tickets; naturally, the trade is interested. But what are the methods employed by the drink traffic to get a vote in favour of the Bill? In Sunderland, for instance, when a public meeting was called by the Mayor, a circular was issued among the licensed victuallers, saying—

"Being a member of the trade, your presence, with four or five other friends, is most particularly needed. . . . You will have no difficulty in inducing four or five, or even more, of your customers and friends, to accompany you and vote for your just claim to compensation."

That is the great meeting to which the right hon. Gentleman referred, and at which the Times and other newspapers stated that opinion was pretty evenly divided, whereas the Mayor declared that the resolution against the Bill had been carried by a large majority.

It being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

TRAMWAYS ORDER IN COUNCIL (IRELAND) (SOUTH CLARE RAILWAYS) BILL.—(No. 301.)

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

ELECTORAL DISABILITIES (NAVAL, MILITARY, AND POLICE) BILL.

(NO. 146.) COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

(12.5.) MR. T. M. HEALY : This is a Bill in which a number of us take a great deal of interest. Now, the Government say that they are anxious to facilitate the business of the House. Will they agree to refer this Bill to a Select Committee, so that its scope may be widened? The right hon. Gentleman has promised to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Chelsea, but there are a number of other questions of a somewhat technical nature which will have to be raised. This is not a contentious Bill; and I hope that this suggestion of mine will be adopted.

(12.6.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): This Bill was brought in at the request of hon. Members on both sides of the House, in order to deal with a great hardship. The necessity for it has also been called to my attention by many Revising Barristers. A discussion on it at this stage would be quite out of order; but I would suggest that, by acting in concert, the difficulty may be overcome in a way which would obviate the necessity of acting on the suggestion of the hon. Member.

(12.7.) MR. T. M. HEALY : Will the Government go further than they are doing in accepting the Amendment of the hon. Member for Chelsea? If not, I must object to further progress.

Committee deferred till Thursday.

AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS BILL.

(No. 154.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

PARLIAMENTARY PROCEEDINGS.

Copies ordered—

"Of the Parliamentary Proceedings Adjournment Bill (Session 1848), of the Parliamentary Proceedings [Lords] Bill (Session 1869), and Extracts from the Reports of Select Committees relating to such proposals."—(Mr. Jackson.)

Copies presented accordingly; to lie upon the Table, and to be Printed. [No. 233.]

MOTIONS.

COUNTY COURTS ACT (1888) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Milvain, Bill to amend the Law relating to the Practice of Registrars and other Officers of the County Court, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Milvain, Mr. Gully, Mr. Henry H. Fowler, and Sir Albert Rollit.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 334.]

GERMANY AND AFRICA.

On the Motion for adjournment:—

(12.15.) MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield): I wish to ask the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether, in view of the importance of the despatch to Sir E. Malet issued to-night, he will cause a map to be placed in the Library, showing exactly the limits of German influence in East Africa, and the territory to be acquired by this country?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON : I am sure the Secretary of State will be glad to have a map placed in the Library; but I should not like the House to assume that all the territories that are to be placed under the sphere of influence of this country are at present in the German sphere. The agreement provides a delimitation of the respective spheres, and for the most part deals with regions not hitherto defined.

MR. T. M. HEALY : I hope the map will explain what a sphere of influence is.

House adjourned at a quarter after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 18th June, 1890.

Mr. SPEAKER was in his place shortly after 12 o'clock, but there was not a sufficient number of Members in attendance to form a quorum. At 12.22 attention was called to the fact that 40 Members were not present. After the usual interval, Mr. SPEAKER counted the House, and found that 40 Members were present.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

HERRING FISHERY (SCOTLAND) ACT (1889) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 196.)

Lords Amendments to be considered forthwith; considered, and agreed to.

DIRECTORS' LIABILITY BILL.—(No. 300.)

CONSIDERATION. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to the Bill [11th June], on consideration, as amended.

And which Amendment was, in page 1, line 22, to leave out the words "of fact."—(Mr. Edmund Robertson.)

Question again proposed, "That the words 'of fact' stand part of the Bill."

Debate resumed.

*(12.30.) MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): If the House will look at the Bill, I think it will be found that the introduction of the words "of fact," in Clause 3, makes the Directors personally liable for inaccurate and misleading statements, but imposes a limitation upon their defence that is not contained in the liability itself. In other words, the defence is less extensive than the liability.

Question put, and negatived.

*(12.32.) SIR R. LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): I beg to move the
VOL. CCCXLV. [THIRD SERIES.]

Amendment which stands in my name on the Paper, namely, to insert after the word "fact" in Clause 3, page 1, line 22, the words "in the prospectus or notice." I would point out to the House that the Amendment must be taken in connection with another Amendment which comes in later on, and to which it would probably be out of order to refer at any length now. The object of the Amendment is to relieve Directors and others responsible for the issue of prospectuses from the liability which might otherwise attach to them for the appearance of untrue or misleading statements or memoranda incorporated in such prospectuses in a case where the untrue or misleading nature of the statements is not material or relevant to the undertaking of the company. As the clause has come down to the House from the Grand Committee, it appears that a Director or any other person who allowed his name in any way to be connected with a prospectus would be responsible for the statements contained or even referred to in it, and that his whole fortune and reputation might be at stake, even in cases where a company is floated in a legitimate and proper manner for developing the resources of India or the colonies or any foreign country remote from England. In such cases it is manifest that the Directors and others who are responsible for the issue of a prospectus must frequently, to a large extent, rely upon documents and official statements published in India, Australia, or elsewhere, where the property is situated. They must very often rely upon the statements of local experts, and the object of my Amendment is this: that while the Directors and others shall rightly be held responsible for any statements which they actually quote which are relative or material to the matter dealt with, it would be absurd to make them responsible for every immaterial statement which may appear in any obscure corner of any report or memorandum quoted or referred to which may have nothing whatever to do with the property which is being dealt with, and which the utmost care of a Director would not enable him to check in every minute particular. I think it would be improper to lay down that every person who attaches his name in any way to a prospectus issued by a company should be liable to the terrible extent provided by this Bill.

*MR. WARMINGTON (Monmouth, W.): I rise to order. The question of the liability of Directors has already been discussed and decided. The question now for consideration is the defence which a Director may have to offer.

*SIR R. LETHBRIDGE: Quite so. The point which I am now raising is that this Amendment is necessary in order to extend the defence of the Director. Of course, I am in the hands of the House.

*MR. SPEAKER: I think the hon. Member is out of order.

*MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): The effect of the Amendment is to limit the defence. Surely, the hon. Member cannot mean that.

*SIR R. LETHBRIDGE: In deference to your ruling, Sir, I will withdraw the Amendment.

(12.38.) MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth): I have now to move, in line 22, at the end of Clause 3, to insert "or other person named therein." The addition of these words, which apply to the authenticity of a statement, will become more apparent when we come to consider the next clause.

Amendment moved, in page 1, line 22, after the word "expert," to insert the words "or other person named therein."—(Mr. Kimber.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(12.40.) MR. WARMINGTON: I am sorry that I am unable to accept the Amendment. A Director has no right to use information supplied by a person who is not in a position to give accurate information.

*(12.41.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: The Amendment of the hon. Member is far too vague, and would make nonsense of the clause. It would justify the issue in a prospectus of information obtained from a person picked up in the street.

(12.42.) MR. E. ROBERTSON: The scheme of the Bill is that you are to be responsible for every statement you make unless it is a statement made upon the authority of an expert. What my hon. Friend opposite asks is that a Director is to be responsible unless he has made the statement on the authority of anybody else.

MR. KIMBER: The answer is—

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member has no right to reply. Does he press the Amendment?

MR. KIMBER: No, Sir.

*(12.43.) MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): I confess the words the hon. Member proposes to add seem to me vague, and might be misleading.

*(12.44.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I quite agree that the words proposed by my hon. Friend behind me could not possibly be admitted into the Bill. I think the question will be more properly raised when we come to Sub-section B.

*SIR R. FOWLER (London) gave an explanation of what Mr. Kimber had said.

(12.46.) MR. SALT (Stafford): I think the words proposed by my hon. Friend are too wide. It should be upon the authority of an expert or of some person duly qualified to give the information. If at any time this Bill should become an Act, I am afraid that the word "expert," taken in its most narrow sense, might be very inconvenient. If it is to be taken in a wider sense it ought to be so defined.

*(12.47.) SIR R. LETHBRIDGE: Will it be in order to substitute for the words "person named therein" the words "other reasonable authority?" It seems to me that some words of that kind are needed in order to extend the definition of the clause. The term "expert," in one of its meanings, is well understood. He is recognised as a person who understands the subject upon which he writes; but I hope the hon. and learned Member in charge of the Bill will see the necessity of defining in some way the larger meaning of the term. Perhaps he will consent to the re-committal of the Bill in order that the point, which is an extremely important one, may be threshed out.

MR. KIMBER : I propose to withdraw the Amendment and to submit another which will meet the difficulty.

(12.48.) MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin) : The words in Sub-section B appears to have been overlooked. The defence will only be available, if it can be shown that the Directors believed that the report as to value was made in good faith, and that the person making it was competent to give an opinion—in other words, that the person making it was an expert.

*(12.50.) MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.) : I would ask the hon. Member for Wandsworth (Mr. Kimber) not to press the Amendment. The object of the Bill is to put an end to a system under which Directors are able to evade their liability. In my humble judgment anything that tends to fritter away their liability under this part of Clause 3 would be mischievous.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(12.51.) MR. KIMBER : I beg leave to move, instead of the Amendment which I have just withdrawn, the substitution of the words after the word "expert," "or any person, firm, or authority whose name, address, and description are stated in the prospectus." In that case all persons, before they subscribe, would know exactly the authority upon which the statements contained in the prospectus were made.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 22, after the word "expert," to insert the words "or of any person, firm, or authority whose name, address, and description are stated in the prospectus;"—(Mr. Kimber.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.) : I rise to a point of order. I want to know whether this Amendment is not absolutely identical with the one which we have just decided.

*MR. SPEAKER : There was no decision on the first Amendment ; it was withdrawn.

*MR. BARING (London) : I think the Amendment is much too wide. What is wanted is that the Directors shall have made all reasonable inquiry and examination and should have had reasonable ground for believing the statements made to them. If they make statements on the authority of somebody else, that somebody else ought to be quoted and ought to be an expert.

*(12.55.) SIR R. LETHBRIDGE : The Amendment clearly proposes to put before the investing public the exact authority upon which a particular statement is made. It is proposed that not only the name, but the address and description of the person, or firm, making the statement should be given to the public, who will thus have an opportunity of ascertaining for themselves what the weight of the authority quoted in the prospectus is. I do not see why the whole responsibility should be thrown upon the Directors personally. If they give the name, address, and description of the person who supplies the information, they will afford the public every facility for ascertaining its authenticity for themselves. That is, I think, all that in fairness can be demanded.

(12.56.) MR. ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney) : I trust that the House will do nothing to weaken the responsibility of Directors, who are sometimes composed of a noble Lord, with one or two hon. Members of this House, and an hon. Gentleman who has spent most part of his life in India or some other distant part of the world, and who, on returning to this country, joins a company solely for the sake of the fees, knowing absolutely nothing about the business he undertakes to direct. I am afraid that if this Amendment is carried it will do a great deal to destroy the good that is contained in the Bill.

(12.58.) SIR G. CAMPBELL : I agree in substance with the remarks of the hon. Member, and also in the conclusion which he has drawn. At the same time, it must not be forgotten that a person who has returned to this country from India or from some other distant quarter of the globe has often a good deal of spare time upon his hands.

(1.11.) MR. HANBURY (Preston): I have an Amendment to propose at the end of line 27, in Clause 3, and it is to insert the words "and not misleading" after the word "true." These words are, I think, necessary if we wish to make sense of the clause. We have substituted the word "true" for the word "inaccurate" in line 18, and we also draw a broad distinction between a statement which is untrue and one which is misleading. This proviso says that although the Director may have made a statement which is untrue or misleading, yet if he can show that at the time he made it he had good grounds for believing it to be true, he shall not be held responsible. Having drawn that distinction, I think we ought to add the words I have suggested. If a man makes a misleading statement he ought to be called on to prove he did not think it to be misleading at the time he made it.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 27, after the word "true," to insert the words "and not misleading."—(Mr. Hanbury.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(1.12.) MR. KELLY: I would suggest that the words should be "not intentionally misleading."

(1.13.) SIR H. DAVEY (Stockton): I opposed the introduction of the word "misleading" last Wednesday, but was not successful. I agree, however, with my hon. Friend that, in order to make this clause consistent, some such words as he suggests should be inserted. I think this object would be better obtained by using other words. Whether a prospectus is misleading or not is a fact to be ascertained. A Director may not believe it to be misleading, and yet he would come under the law. I would, therefore, suggest the addition of the words "and the same was not calculated to mislead."

(1.14.) MR. HANBURY: I will withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 27, after the word "true," to insert the words "and the same was not calculated to mislead."—(Mr. Hanbury.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(1.15.) SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: I must move as an Amendment to the Amendment, the insertion of the word "that," so as to make it read "and that the same was not calculated to mislead." It seems to me to make a great difference, as we want to secure it shall be the Director's belief that the statement was not calculated to mislead.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, after the word "and," to insert the word "that."—(Sir Roper Lethbridge.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'that' be there inserted in the proposed Amendment."

(1.16.) MR. KIMBER: He has to prove it was not calculated to mislead.

*SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: No.

MR. KIMBER: No man ought to be bound to prove a negative. He may prove what was his belief.

*(1.17.) MR. TOMLINSON: I think the word "that" is necessary to make the clause clear.

(1.18.) MR. COURTNEY: It really makes no difference. I think the clause will accomplish its object. The sub-section provides that unless the Director proves he made reasonable inquiry, and had reasonable ground of belief that the statement was true, and was not misleading, he may be held liable.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I entirely concur. I do not see how one can get out of that construction of the section.

*(1.19.) SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: Of course, if the interpretation given by the Chairman of Committees is accepted, I am quite content. But I do venture—

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N): I rise to a point of order. Unless the hon. Gentleman is going to withdraw the Amendment he is not entitled to make a second speech.

*MR. SPEAKER: I understood the hon. Member was explaining his reasons.

*(1.20.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: The question is not what any Member of this House may think the right construction but what will be the view taken by a Court of Law. Although the construction of my right hon. Friend is, no doubt, right, I think it would be better to insert the word "that."

*(1.21.) MR. J. M. MACLEAN (Oldham): What is the opinion of the framer of the Bill? Does he accept the interpretation of the Chairman of Committees? A question may be raised in a Court of Law as to whether a Director is liable not for his belief, but for some fact as to the misleading character of which he could possibly have no information. Our object, as I understand it, is to make a Director answerable for anything in the way of foul play on his part; therefore the words of the clause should be distinct. Will the framer of the Bill tell us in what way he intends the clause to be interpreted?

*(1.22.) MR. WARMINGTON: I think the view of the Chairman of Committees is correct, and that it will be quite sufficient to add the words after "true," "and not misleading."

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. HANBURY: I withdraw the words "the same was not calculated to mislead." It seems to be the general opinion that the original words are more desirable. I, therefore, propose to use the words, "and was not misleading."

*(1.24.) SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: Does the framer of the Bill agree, then, that the clause means the Director believes it is not misleading?

*MR. WARMINGTON: Certainly.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 27, after the word "true," to insert the words, "and was not misleading."

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

(1.25.) Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 2, after the word "valuation," to insert the words, "or certificate or other document."—(Mr. Kimber.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: It seems to me it would be rather dangerous for the House thus to extend these words.

*(1.26.) MR. WARMINGTON: I cannot accept the Amendment. The report or valuation of any engineer, or valuer, or accountant, or expert, sufficiently cover all that is necessary, and to add the words suggested in the Amendment would simply fritter away the whole force of the Bill.

*(1.27.) SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: Will the clause as it stands cover such a case as the quotation of an Official Report to a Colonial or the Indian Government? These Reports are frequently quoted, and, certainly, they cannot be said to come under the category of Reports of engineers, valuers, accountants, or other experts, yet I do not see why they should not be equally privileged. Surely they should all be on the same footing. I hope my hon. and learned Friend will accept the Amendment.

*(1.29.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: I do not think the words of the Amendment would cover the case of such documents.

MR. COURTNEY: I should like to call attention to a point that occurs to me as one deserving of consideration in regard to this matter. Sub-Section A of the clause says—

"Unless he proves with respect to every such inaccurate or misleading statement of fact, not purporting to be made on the authority of an expert."

Now, suppose an untrue or misleading statement does purport to be made on the authority of an expert, where is that placed? Is it supposed to be under Sub-section B? I think not. Sub-section B says—

"From any Report, or valuation of any engineer, valuer, accountant, or other expert, that it was a true and fair statement of or extract from the Report or valuation."

But it might be made in any other form, and I think we cannot say that Sub-section B extends to everything not covered by Sub-section A. I should have supposed Sub-section B would have said, "With respect to every statement or extract purporting to be made on the authority of an expert," and so forth. In that case it would prove entirely valid. I cannot see that there is any liability on the part of a Director who makes an untrue or misleading statement which purports to be made on the authority of an expert. I should like to know what the hon. Member in charge of the Bill thinks on that point.

*(1.32.) MR. WARMINGTON: I am bound to say that the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman would be an improvement. Would it not be well to let Sub-section B run in this way: "With respect to every statement or extract purporting to be made on the authority of any engineer, valuer, accountant, or other expert." That would carry out the meaning of the suggestion just made, and I wish to ask the hon. Member opposite whether he will withdraw his Amendment and consent to the substitution of these words?

MR. KIMBER: I should be glad to withdraw my Amendment in favour of that suggested by the hon. and learned Member; but I shall then propose after the word expert to extend the protection of the clause to documents or statements made by persons other than experts.

(1.33.) Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 2, to leave out the words "a statement of, or an extract from, any Report or valuation," and insert the words "made on the authority."—(Mr. Warmington.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

*SIR R. LETHBRIDGE: I may say that I do not see any great difference between what appears in the clause and what is proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman; at the same time, I think that an Amendment which does alter the whole tenour of a very important and material clause ought hardly to be sprung on the House in this sudden fashion? I think the hon. and learned Member should give the House a little further information and explanation of what would be the result of this Amendment, and that it really demands from the House a little more consideration than has yet been accorded to it. I would add that in this, as in several other respects, the Bill appears to have come down from the Standing Committee in rather a chaotic condition. I would suggest that the hon. and learned Gentleman should move in the interests of his own profession the reconsideration of the Bill, so that it may be presented to the House in a form in which it may be planned to stand permanently, or, at any rate, in such a form that the House will be in a position to adjudicate on questions such as this. It is, I think, a little too much to ask us to accept an alteration in the wording of an important part of the clause, under the circumstances, like the present. I repeat that I do not, on the face of it, see any great difference between the Amendment now proposed and the words that already appear in the clause. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen laugh, but there may be certain pitfalls in these legal phrases which we who are outside the mystic circle of the law cannot at the moment comprehend. The House will probably admit that a lawyer will see dangers and pitfalls which an ordinary layman would not be able to recognise. I can hardly trust my own judgment in this matter, and should like to have the opinion of the hon. and learned Member for Stockton, as well as of other Members of the House, who are recognised authorities on such questions, as to what would be the precise effect of this Amendment, which, whether important or not, is clearly, on the face of it, a proposal to effect a considerable alteration in an important clause.

*MR. S. WILLIAMSON (Kilmarnock): I think the meaning of this Amendment so clear that it might almost be understood by a child, and, for my part, I shall give it my support.

*(1.36.) SIR R. FOWLER: I only rise to say that this Bill, as I suppose, received consideration upstairs, and no doubt there are advantages in the discussion of such matters in Committee rather than in the House; but as the House decided to send it to a Grand Committee, by whom it has been dealt with, and then considered by the House, with you, Sir, in the Chair, I can hardly concur in some of the remarks of my hon. Friend.

*MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: I would point out to my hon. Friend opposite that it is rather unwise in him to refuse this Amendment, because it distinctly tends in the direction for which he is contending.

*MR. TOMLINSON: I earnestly hope the Amendment will be accepted, as I think it will be an improvement on the Bill as now framed.

*MR. J. M. MACLEAN: I would point out that the words "report or valuation," which the hon. and learned Member proposes to omit, occur again and again in the clause, and I would ask whether he proposes to leave them out altogether; because it seems to me they are important words to retain. Moreover, the substitution of the words "made on the authority" seems to me to have a very wide scope. We are here legislating to prevent Directors from being parties to misleading statements, and we ought, therefore, to be very clear that the language of this Bill is not in itself misleading. I should be glad if the hon. and learned Gentleman will tell us how he proposes to amend the subsequent portion of the clause.

MR. SALT: I would remind the House that we have got to the word "valuation" in line 2 of page 2, and we are now asked to go back to the beginning of the whole line, a step which ought not to be taken without good or special reason. With regard to the hon. and learned Gentleman in charge of the Bill, I have only to say that being in charge of the measure, there is no one more capable of explaining it; but I think that in regard to such an Amendment as this, he ought to give us a clear and distinct statement as to what it is intended to do, not only in regard to this part of the clause, but also in relation to the subsequent portions of the Bill. There can be no doubt that the Bill is an extremely difficult one to deal with, and any hasty and ill-considered Amendment might have consequences very different from those for which the measure is designed. I would also remind the House that it passed its Second Reading with little, if any, discussion, not only as to details, but also in regard to principle. It was then sent upstairs to the Grand Committee, where it is said to have been thoroughly thrashed out; but the result of that thrashing out appears to have been that it has now become necessary for the House to thrash it out on the Report, when, instead of following the rule appertaining to Committees of the whole House, hon. Members interested in the measure can only speak once. The result is that there must necessarily be a great deal more speaking by more hon. Members and more points raised than would otherwise be the case, because it is not in the power of those who best understand the Bill to follow up their remarks on any one point. No doubt, the objects of the Bill are exceedingly good, and I, for one, do not wish to oppose the Amendment proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman in charge of the measure; but I do hope that, with the permission of the House, he may have the opportunity of explaining what will be the effect of this Amendment if it be inserted.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I confess, Sir, that, in my opinion, the hon. and learned Gentleman in charge of the Bill was a little premature in accepting the Amendment suggested to him by the Chairman of Committees. What, I ask, was the shape in which this Bill was sent down by the Standing Committee? It was that under the latter portion of Clause 3 a Director was to be liable, on the one hand, to pay compensation unless he could prove one of two things, either that he had made, in respect to any untrue or misleading statement not purporting to be made on the authority of an expert, reasonable inquiry and examination, or that he had reasonable ground to believe, and did believe, at the time of the allotment of shares, that a statement purporting to be an extract from a Report or valuation of an expert was true, and was made by the expert whose name it bore, and further, that the Report or valuation was made in good faith, and that the person making it was competent to make it. Now, Sir, the hon. and learned Gentleman in charge of the Bill, in response to a suggestion made by the Chairman of Committees, proposes to leave out from line 2, page 2, the words, "A statement of or an extract from any Report or valuation." I would point out that a "Report or valuation" is a tangible thing, and that it makes a difference if we alter this Sub-section by striking out these words, and merely inserting in their place the words "made on the authority." I think the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Monmouthshire (Mr. Warmington) ought to tell us how, in proposing to leave out the words I have quoted, he intends to frame the rest of the clause.

SIR H. DAVEY: I think, if my hon. and learned Friend persists in accepting the Amendment suggested by the Chairman of Committees, the result will be to throw the clause into inextricable confusion. I do not say the clause is drawn up in the best possible way, but, as it stands, I do not think it will do much harm. Therefore, I would rather concur in the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and urge upon my hon. and learned Friend that the clause should be allowed to remain as it stands in the Bill.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I was a member of the Committee which considered this Bill, and I wish to state that we were not able to thrash out the details as is done in Committee of the whole House—a thing which, in my opinion, is absolutely necessary in regard to measures such as this. I think we should hardly have been induced to enter upon the discussion in which we are engaged but for the high authority of the Chairman of Committees, and I regard him as a very high authority. At the same time, after what has been said, I hope my hon. and learned Friend who is in charge of the Bill will not press the Amendment, in—asmuch as it seems to be the opinion of several eminent authorities that it is open to serious objection.

*MR. WARMINGTON: Under the circumstances, I will, with the permission of the House, withdraw the Amendment. When I accepted it, I did not see exactly how it would work in regard to the latter part of the clause, in relation to which I think it might create some confusion. I, therefore, ask leave to withdraw the Amendment. ["No, no."]

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I hope the House will allow the Amendment to be withdrawn. In my opinion, its effect upon the clause would be that, with respect to every misleading statement purporting to be made on the authority of an expert, the Director would be absolutely liable, unless the authority is contained in the Report or valuation, and in that case the exception would apply.

*MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: I may be allowed to say—

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and learned Gentleman has already spoken on this Amendment.

*MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: I was about to speak on the question of the withdrawal of the Amendment.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and learned Gentleman has no right to speak on this question again, save by leave of the House.

*MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: Perhaps the House will allow me to say that if this Amendment be carried, the words "every statement" would apply not only to every statement made in writing but also to every oral statement.

MR. KIMBER: It was on the consideration that this Amendment would be accepted that I withdrew my Amendment. It seems to me that the hon. and learned Gentleman's Amendment is one that ought to be accepted, and that the principle enunciated by the Chairman of Committees is correct, namely, that where a statement is made by a Director on the authority of an expert, the Director ought to be protected. The only alteration necessary after accepting the Amendment would be the striking out of the words "Report or valuation" in other places. If line 2 of page 2 is left as it is, it seems to me to be open to all sorts of objections, which would not apply to the general words suggested by the Chairman of Committees.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I wish to ask you, Sir, as a point of order, whether the Amendment, which was only temporarily withdrawn to permit another Amendment to be moved, can be renewed if the present Amendment be withdrawn?

MR. COURTNEY: I wish to point out with respect to one portion of the clause that, as it stands, in respect of every statement purporting to be made from any Report or valuation of an expert the Director would have to prove that the expert made it, and that he had reason to believe the expert made it in good faith, and was competent to make it. The whole question seems to be narrowed to this, whether the defence should be limited to statements purporting to be made on the authority of an expert when such statements occur in a Report or valuation, but not in any other document though made by the same class of persons. I do not wish to embarrass the discussion of this Bill any further, but I must dissent to our reverting to the original form of the Bill.

*MR. SPEAKER: In reply to the hon. Member for Northwich, who asked a question on a point of order, I may state that the Amendment which has been withdrawn, under the circumstances stated, can be renewed.

MR. MURPHY (Dublin, St. Patrick's): I would put it to the House, how would it be if we were to leave out the words "Report or valuation," and insert the words "statement or extract" in the last line but one of the sub-section?

MR. GROTRIAN (Kingston-on-Hull, E.): The liability under Sub-section A only goes to statements not made on the authority of an expert, so that under that sub-section a Director will be relieved of liability in regard to any statement made on the authority of an expert; but under Sub-section B the liability is limited to statements on the Report or valuation of an expert. The question is whether it is the wish of the House to widen the liability under Sub-section B, so as to make it run more in accord with the full exemption under Sub-section A. On the other hand, I may say the Bill was thoroughly thrashed out before the Grand Committee, and I believe it would, on the whole, be better to allow Sub-section B to stand as it now is, rather than attempt to doctor it, as is now proposed.

*MR. SPEAKER: Is it your pleasure that the Amendment be withdrawn?

Several hon. MEMBERS: No.

(2.29.) Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

(2.31.) Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 3, after the word "accountant," to insert the words "banker, mercantile firm, or official authority."—(Mr. Kimber.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(2.34.) MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): On a point of order, I wish to ask you, Sir, whether this Amendment ought not to have been moved, if at all, on Sub-section A?

*SIR R. LETHBRIDGE: On the point of order, I would point out, on the authority of the Chairman of Committees, that the 1st sub-section does not cover every possible case.

*MR. SPEAKER: As far as a question of the order is concerned the Amendment may be moved.

* (2.36.) MR. S. WILLIAMSON (Kilmarnock, &c.): I hope my hon. Friend will allow the Bill to remain as it is. Lots of people call themselves "bankers" who are not entitled to the name. "Mercantile firm" is very wide, and so is "official authority." I think the word "expert" covers all that is necessary.

* (2.37.) SIR R. LETHBRIDGE: Surely it is quite conceivable that a large class of documents which ought to be covered by the clause could not be classed as "Reports or valuations of engineers, experts," &c.

*MR. WILLIAMSON: Yes, the word "expert" will cover them.

* (2.38.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: I venture to ask what is a "mercantile firm," and, still more, what is an "official authority"? If the people referred to possess the knowledge which alone entitles their statements to credit they will come under the head of "experts."

*(2.39.) MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I hope the Amendment will not be accepted, because there are many people connected with financial undertakings whom it would not be desirable to include in the excepting clause, and yet who describe themselves by the words used in the Amendment.

*MR. KELLY: I hope my hon. Friend will not press the Amendment.

*(2.40.) MR. WARMINGTON: I cannot accept the Amendment, and I should like to impress on the House that this matter has been discussed in the Grand Committee on Trade, of which the Mover of the Amendment was a Member. He did not attend. I dare say he had reasons for his absence; but I ask the House to stand by the Bill as it is.

*MR. TOMLINSON: I would point out that if the Amendment be adopted, it will be necessary to introduce other words also.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*(2.41.) SIR R. LETHBRIDGE: I beg to move after the word "expert," in line 3, of page 2, to insert "or other document vouched by the name, address, and description of the author." I wish to point out to the hon. and learned Member in charge of the Bill that no provision is made in any part of it for the protection of Directors from misstatement in official documents, published on the faith of the Government of a colony, or a Local Government in India, or a Foreign State. If the hon. and learned Member can point out that such protection is afforded I shall not, of course, put the House to the trouble of dividing on this Amendment. But I do wish to obtain some solid assurance, either from the hon. and learned Member, or from some of those authorities whom the House is in the habit of following on a point of this kind. It will be in the recollection of the House that two or three of its leading authorities, whom we look upon as competent to guide us in the choice of the phraseology to be used in such cases, absolutely differed on a recent occasion as to the language that ought to be employed. I confess I was induced by the support given by the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Committees to one phraseology to vote in favour of it, because I thought, and I think still, if I had such authority as that for my decision, I could not be wrong. I think we should ask for a full assurance from those leading Members of the House who are competent to advise us on this point, whether, as the Bill stands now, there is any protection afforded to Directors and others when mis-statements are made in Reports which they feel justified in regarding as true, but which turn out to be untrue. I refer to cases in which a Director has made full and careful inquiry, but in which it is absolutely out of his power to go into every hole and corner, as it were, of the statements in a Memorandum. I do not see why the Directors should be penalised for an obscure mistake or mis-statement, whilst those persons, who ought really to be punished for it—usually the promoters, whose names are not shown on the face of the prospectus—are not touched by a single line or word of the Bill. I do not find in the measure a single word that refers to promoters. The Bill is utterly incomplete, and its chaotic condition is shown by the fact that, on a recent Amendment, the Chairman of Committees, and the author of the Bill were absolutely opposed to each other, and the House divided in a muddled state, without comprehending the point put before them. The result was the retention of words and phrases, which, on the high authority of the Chairman of Committees, are misleading and wrong.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 3, after the word "expert," to insert the words "or other document vouched by the name, address and description of the author."—(Sir Roper Lethbridge.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(2.47.) MR. WARMINGTON: My first objection to the Amendment is, that it will not make common sense of the clause, and my second—although I am not one of the high authorities to whom the hon. Gentleman referred—is that the words should remain as they are. I consider it rank heresy to say that official statements are not made by experts. I should have thought that every official person who has special knowledge is an expert.

*(2.48.) MR. BRADLAUGH: It is inconvenient, after the time that this Bill has been on the Paper, that Amendments should be sprung upon us in such a way that it is impossible to give them full consideration. I understand that this Amendment would simply make nonsense of the clause. One argument used in support of this and other Amendments is, that the Directors ought not to be made liable for this, that, and the other misrepresentation made by the promoters. I would point out, however, that without the Directors the promoters would be unable to get credit from other people. The Directors become Directors for profit, and they ought to be responsible for the statements made.

*(2.50.) MR. S. WILLIAMSON: I think this Amendment might afford extra protection to the promoters and Directors of bogus companies, but that it would not carry out the objects of this Bill. Suppose a tea planter in India thinks he has discovered a gold mine and puts himself into communication with promoters with the object of starting a company. If under this Amendment he gives his name, address, and description, that will free the Directors, who are possibly men of straw for all the statements put forward in his name.

*(2.57.) SIR R. FOWLER: I would point out that Directors do not always become such for purpose of profit. There are many companies started for purely philanthropic purposes, and the Directors of which take no fees.

*(2.52.) SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University): Of course, if, as has been said, Directors are men of straw, it is clear that no provision inserted in this Bill will force them to make restitution. I am afraid, however, the Amendment will not carry out the object with which it is moved, and I would venture to suggest that the hon. Gentleman should not press it further on the present occasion. At the same time, I really would ask Her Majesty's Government to consider in "another place" whether the word "expert" covers everything that is necessary. Let me give an illustration. Some friends of mine wished to invest in property in America, and they sent out a distinguished expert to investigate the title, and he also made a Report on the question of the land. No doubt he is an expert on the legal question, but I think it might, perhaps, be argued in the Law Courts that he is not an expert on the question of land. If a man of high character and good judgment makes a Report, I think a Director ought not to be liable in such a case; but, under the Bill as it stands, the Directors could not refer to the Report on the one point without rendering themselves liable on the other.

*(2.54.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I am disposed to agree with that which has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman opposite as to the advisability of carefully considering the word "expert" before this Bill passes into law, but I do not think the example he gave was a very good one. No doubt the gentleman he referred to would be an expert with regard to the legal title of the land, but I do not think he could be regarded as an expert on a matter of which he has no special knowledge. I will undertake that the matter is fully considered by the Lord Chancellor and the Attorney General before the Bill passes into law.

(2.55.) MR. GROTRIAN: I think my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir R. Lethbridge) is needlessly alarming himself. He asks for protection in a case in which there is an official Report or a Report from some Government Department. If such a Report were misleading, the Director would simply have to show that he had reasonable ground to believe, and did believe, that the statements were true. Can it be assumed for a moment that any Judge would direct or any Jury find that, in regard to an official Report or a statement issued by a Government Department, a man had not reasonable ground to believe in its truth? I am myself a Director of many companies, and I shall be glad to assume the responsibility that will be thrown on me by this clause. I think a Director should not attempt to shirk any reasonable responsibility.

(2.58.) MR. CHANCE: I am sure the object of the hon. Member who has moved the Amendment is not to enable Directors to shirk the responsibility. I think the Bill is imperfect in this respect, that it renders it necessary to make the Director a defendant, and to subject him to the cost of defending an action when the persons taking proceedings would be willing and prepared to strike directly at the person who is really guilty of the fraud. I do not think this Amendment carries out the hon. Member's object. I hope it will be withdrawn, and that the Government will consider the question in "another place."

*(3.0.) MR. J. M. MACLEAN: I do not think we can have too many safeguards to protect Directors from being unjustly treated under this Bill. Let the Committee consider what the object of the Bill is. It is to do away with limited liability altogether, so far as Directors are concerned. It throws upon Directors unlimited liability. I grant that the Bill has been watered down a good deal, but still it is left to Judges and juries to say whether a Director has taken reasonable precautions to find out that statements in the prospectus were not misleading, and one knows that Judges are often disposed to be rather harsh in the treatment of capitalists, and that juries are occasionally apt to be even vindictive when Directors were brought before them by disappointed shareholders. This is a remarkable Bill, for it is really a Bill making the liability of Directors unlimited both in point of fortune and time. Under it a shareholder who has been a partner with a Director may be able, five or six years afterwards, when he has lost his money, to come into Court and make the Director liable. When penalties of this kind are sought to be imposed on Directors the House should inquire very carefully into every word in the Bill. The hon. and learned Member for Monmouthshire (Mr. Warmington) is very fond of telling us that this Bill was thoroughly threshed out by a Grand Committee upstairs; that this is only a formal stage; and that it is wrong that we should raise any discussion. The present discussion shows the great inconvenience of referring a Bill of this kind to a Grand Committee, whose proceedings are only reported in the most abbreviated form. I venture to say there is not a Chamber of Commerce in the country, and hardly a dozen men of business, who are aware of what Parliament is doing in the way of imposing this unlimited liability on Directors. The truth is, that the Bill has been framed by lawyers familiar with the seamy side of company promotion for the purpose of protecting private capitalists and shareholders. This is a Bill directed against the most beneficent movement of modern times, the introduction through limited liability for cheap capital into Industrial Companies—a movement now going on so rapidly that I believe, before the end of the century, we shall hardly have any private proprietors of large industrial undertakings. The Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) has said, "Oh, we ought to have no mercy on Directors, because they may mislead shareholders."

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I do not think I said that. I said, in answer to the argument used by the Mover of the Amendment, that if it were not for the Directors the promoters would not be able to get the money from the public, and that, therefore, the Directors ought to be made responsible for the statements made.

*MR. J. M. MACLEAN: But shareholders also go into companies. Are they to have no responsibilities? I complain that this Bill relieves shareholders from all kinds of responsibility. Why should this be? Why should we remove all responsibility from shareholders for the purpose of throwing the whole of it on Directors? It seems to me that the Bill goes much too far in that direction.

(3.7.) MR. ISAACSON: I was sorry to hear the speech of the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Maclean), for it is well-known that it is the shareholders who have suffered from the losses of companies. The Directors have suffered a minimum amount of the loss; they have suffered the loss possibly of their annual fees, but the shareholders have lost their capital. I have known cases in which also statements have been made by Directors who have evidently been urged by the promoters to make them, and in which the public have been induced to subscribe capital solely and wholly upon those statements. I hope the promoters of this Bill will continue to make it as drastic as possible for the protection of the public, for it is only the public who have to be considered in this matter.

Question put, and negatived.

*(3.9.) SIR R. LETHBRIDGE: The next Amendment which stands in my name is after "and," in line 5, page 2, to leave out the words "that the report or valuation was made by the person whose name it bears, and." I wish to bring the words in in a subsequent part of the clause, and to make them governed, as the other qualifications are governed, by the statement that he has reasonable ground for believing that the report or valuation was made by the person whose name it bore. It seems to me absurd to make such an anomalous and invidious distinction between the various forms of statements as is here made. As the Bill stands, every person responsible for the prospectus guarantees that the statement or extract from the report or valuation was true and fair, and he also guarantees that the report or valuation was made by the person whose name it bore. Then there is the question as to whether the report or valuation was made in good faith, and that the person making it was competent to make it. In this case, the Director is relieved from liability if he had reasonable ground for believing that the report or valuation was made in good faith, and that the person making it was competent to make it. Why on earth is this invidious distinction made between the various classes of statement? This is only another instance of the slipshod and careless way in which this Bill has been allowed to come down from the Grand Committee. In regard to the last two points raised, the President of the Board of Trade has given us the assurance that measures will be taken to alter the phraseology in another place. It was solely upon that pledge that I did not press my Amendment to a Division.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: What I undertook was that the word "expert" should be considered by the Government. I do not undertake that the word should be altered.

*SIR R. LETHBRIDGE: I quite understood that, and that is all I ask in regard to the present Amendment. I challenge the hon. and learned Member in charge of the Bill to give any sensible or rational explanation why a Director should be made to absolutely guarantee in its entirety the fact that the report or valuation was made by the person whose name it bore, while, on the other hand, he is only to guarantee his belief that the person making the report or valuation was competent to make it.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 5, to leave out the words, "that the report or valuation was made by the person whose name it bears, and."—(Sir Roper Lethbridge.)

*(3.16.) MR. BARING: But for the hon. Gentleman's phenomenal loquacity, I could have wished that he had been on the Committee upstairs. I doubt very much whether his presence would have conduced to the transaction of business, but it might have saved us time here. There is a distinct and proper reason for the variation in these terms. It is the bounden duty of a Director to know that the report is made by the person who purports to sign it, but it is not always possible for him to know that that person is competent to make the report.

*SIR R. LETHBRIDGE: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. Gentleman—

*MR. BARING: I have done.

*SIR R. LETHBRIDGE: With the permission of the House I—

MR. BARING: I object.

(3.20.) MR. KIMBER: The House would do well to remember that the property reported upon may be situated thousands of miles away. How is it possible in such circumstances for a Director here to know that the valuation is a genuine one, or that the signature to the report has not been forged, or that the person employed is a competent person? Words ought to be inserted in the clause providing that the Director has taken the best means at his disposal to ascertain the authenticity of the report.

(3.21.) MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Newington, W.): It is ridiculous to suppose that any gentleman in England can prove that a document sent from a place 1,000 miles away was signed by the person whose signature it bears. We may require him to do so, but, fortunately, the law is interpreted by Judges who possess a fund of common sense, and no Court of Justice would put the interpretation upon the Bill which my hon. Friend supposes. If a signature is duly attested in the Courts of Law of the country in which the person signing the report resides, the fact would be received as a sufficient answer on the part of the Director, who believed the report so signed.

*(3.22.) MR. GAINSFORD BRUCE (Holborn): Who are to be responsible? The Directors, who certainly have some means of information, or the innocent shareholders, who have no means of information, and who have been misled by an inaccurate or misleading statement? We are dealing with a case where a prospectus contains a statement that a report is made by a particular person. It turns out that the report is a forgery. I submit that the Directors who have put their names to the prospectus, and who have certainly means of ascertaining whether the report is genuine or not, should bear the loss consequent upon their mistake, rather than the innocent shareholders.

*(3.23.) MR. TOMLINSON: My hon. and learned Friend forgets that what this Bill proposes to do is to place unlimited liability on the Directors, and the Court would have no power to relieve them. It seems to me that in a case where the Directors took every means to ascertain the genuineness of a document and still are deceived it would be very hard to make the Directors liable.

(3.24.) SIR H. DAVEY: According to this Bill, as it at present stands, it would be incumbent on the Director to prove not only that he took every reasonable means to ascertain the authenticity of the signature, but that the signature was de facto that of the person signing the report. Where a Director has believed on reasonable grounds that the report was made by the person whose name it purported to bear, and it subsequently appeared that the signature was a forgery—although he could not have any reasonable means of ascertaining the fact—it appears to me to be absolutely monstrous that this Director should be rendered liable for hundreds of thousands of pounds, which may have been subscribed on the faith of the prospectus. The Amendment proposes to require the Director to prove that he took reasonable means to ascertain the authenticity of the signature, and satisfied himself that the signature was authentic. Of course, he may be mistaken by a clever forgery, like anybody else, but I think that if he has taken all reasonable means to ascertain the authenticity of the signature, and has satisfied himself of its authenticity, he should not be rendered liable in damages for a single shilling.

*(3.26.) MR. WARMINGTON: The question is whether, when companies are started and prospectuses are issued on the strength of a report, with the object of obtaining money from the public, the Director ought not to satisfy himself that the report came from the person whose name it bore, and have evidence at call, if need be, to show that the report bore such name?

*(3.28.) MR. BRADLAUGH: It is not altogether a question whether the particular report is or is not signed by the person whose name it bears. Before a Director can be made liable the report must contain a statement which is either untrue or misleading, and on the faith of which a shareholder has invested his money. In the bulk of cases in which law suits have been brought against Directors, it has been found that there were three or four Directors in league with the promoter. I think that in these circumstances the Director ought to be held responsible in law.

(3.30.) MR. CHANCE: It appears to me that it is proposed to put a Director in the position of an absolute guarantor.

Now, that ought not to be the position of a Director. A Director is simply a pioneer for the shareholders. He does not say, "I want to sell something," but he says, "I want you to join with me in buying something from a third party; I want you to join me as a partner." Therefore, a Director ought not to be called upon to guarantee as facts matters about which he cannot be absolutely certain. There is no rule of law which makes a vendor absolute guarantor of title; and if a man sells land he is a guarantor only to the limited extent of the covenants.

(3.34.) MR. C. J. DARLING (Deptford): An additional argument for the Amendment is that a Director would not be excused if it turns out that he himself has been deceived by a downright forgery, even although he is the greatest pecuniary sufferer. It appears to me that the House would not be justified in inflicting this great hardship on directors or anybody else. This clause provides that the Director must satisfy himself that the Report or valuation was made by the person whose name is attached to it; that he must satisfy himself it was made in good faith and by a person competent to make it. Even if he does that, he still remains liable if he is deceived, although he may have believed it to be true. It is nonsensical to reply that the Judges are men of common sense, and would not mulct a man in damages and costs in a case in which he had been grossly imposed upon. The Judges have to administer the law as it is, and not as it should be; and if the hon. Member for Stockton himself were on the Bench he could not avoid deciding against a Director in such circumstances. I do hope the hon. Member for Monmouthshire will see his way to accept the Amendment.

*(3.38.) MR. S. WILLIAMSON: Of course, if the Amendment is accepted, I shall be prepared to assent to it; but I do not see how a forged document could be used as the basis of a company without the grossest carelessness on the part of the promoters. I do not see how such a document, if not genuine, could be made a basis for launching a company without much carelessness.

(3.40.) MR. COURTNEY: I would point out that if the Amendment is accepted, the Directors or promoters will still be liable, for they will have to prove that they had reasonable ground for believing that the document was signed by the person whose signature it bore, and that he was a competent person to make the Report. The arguments are strongly in favour of the Amendment. It is not reasonable to expect a person to prove that he ascertained beforehand that a document signed in a foreign country was genuine; and if he took all reasonable pains to satisfy himself, he did enough to save himself from further liability. I hope that the Amendment will be accepted.

(3.42.) MR. SALT: There are many companies, as hon. Members know, connected with foreign countries and the colonies, and in connection with these documents are sent home from abroad, and are embodied in the prospectus, in order to enable the investor to see what is offered. But it seems to me that if the words of the clause are retained it will be almost impossible for a man with credit to lose to endorse any of these statements coming from abroad.

(3.43.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I am very suspicious of these attempts to find loopholes by which Directors may escape. A case rarely arises in which, with good faith, a Report of an expert is put forth and subsequently turns out to be forged. Still, I shall not object to the acceptance of the Amendment, if it will not involve us in a mesh of consequential Amendments.

*(3.45.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: This is, of course, a very difficult point, but I think that if a Director has done his best to make himself reasonably certain that a Report is genuine, and if after that it proves to be a forgery, it will be impossible, under the clause, for the Court to exonerate him, and that would be going too far. I am inclined to think that the Amendment might be accepted if the words "after reasonable inquiry and examination" are inserted in the clause. If the House shows a desire to sanction this alteration, I hope the hon. Member for Monmouthshire will see his way to accept it.

(3.46.) VISCOUNT GRIMSTON (Herts, St. Alban's): Would it not be sufficient to insert words providing that a Director shall take reasonable means to ascertain that the Report was signed by the person whose signature it purported to bear?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I think it would be better to put it in the other form.

*(3.46.) MR. WARMINGTON: With the acceptance of the House I will accept the Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to.

(3.47.) Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 6, after the word "that," to insert the words "after reasonable inquiry and examination."—(Sir Michael Hicks Beach.)

Question, proposed "That those words be there inserted."

(3.48.) MR. CHANCE: These words would compel Directors not only to make reasonable inquiry, but to ascertain as to the competency of the person making the report. That would be a very difficult matter.

*(3.49.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I do not know anything into which Directors ought more to make inquiry than the competency of the person sending a report on the faith of which the public are asked to subscribe.

MR. CHANCE: Yes; but according to the clause not only must he reasonably believe in the report, but he must prove he has actually inquired into it and held some sort of examination. How can Directors be expected to examine as to the competency of an expert in minerals?

(3.50.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): It is important that Directors should not simply take the report of any person without finding out what are his qualifications. Some such provision as this must be inserted, or a Director might profess himself simply satisfied with a name, and not seek to find out the qualifications of the person whose name is attached to the report.

*(3.51.) MR. A. BROWN (Shropshire, Wellington): It might be that the person who made the report was not a competent person, but I see how that is provided against by the last words of the sub-section.

*(3.52.) MR. J. M. MACLEAN: What is the difference between Sub-section A and Sub-section B? One refers to a statement made by the Directors themselves on their own authority, and, in regard to that, it is perfectly right that they should be called upon to make reasonable inquiry and examination into those statements before publishing them. But Sub-section B refers to statements made by experts, and it is provided that before issuing these statements the Director shall have reasonable ground for believing that the person who made the report was competent to make it, and that it was made in good faith. I think the words suggested by the right hon. Gentleman efface the distinction between the two sections, and ought not to find a place in this Bill.

(3.53.) SIR H. DAVEY: I really do not think this is a question on which the time of the House should be expended. All that is desired is that a Director should do what is necessary in order to form a just belief. He must make a reasonable inquiry and examination for the purpose of satisfying himself on that head, although I do not think, strictly speaking, that the words are necessary. I hold that the Amendment may well be accepted, as I do not think it would impose any greater burden on Directors than they ought to bear.

(3.54.) MR. MURPHY: I think the words "and examination" convey a distinct meaning that an examination has been made by a third person. I move that those words be omitted.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, to leave out the words "and examination."—(Mr. Murphy.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'and examination' stand part of the proposed Amendment."

*(3.55.) SIR R. LETHBRIDGE: I think that this Amendment is very necessary. I will ask the House to consider what would be the effect of leaving in such words as "due inquiry and examination," in the case of a forged signature to a document that has come from abroad in a way that may induce Directors reasonably to believe that it is true. How, in the case of a document coming from India, could Directors guarantee that the signature of the person whose signature it purported to be was genuine. I think that that is laying a most intolerable burden on the shoulders of Directors. I agree that we should insist on Directors and other responsible persons taking every reasonable care that the statements put forward are accurate, but in many cases, such as I have mentioned, it would be impossible to have more than reasonable grounds for believing; it would be impossible actually to verify the signatures. I do hope that the right hon. Gentleman will withdraw that portion of his Amendment which has been objected to. I do not think that the word inquiry even is needed, because the other provisions of the Bill render such inquiry imperative. I think this proposal puts too heavy a burden on the shoulders of Directors, and that it will tend unduly to relieve promoters of liability.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK: I shall support the Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman proposes to throw on Directors, not only the responsibility of inquiring, but of examining into the competency of an expert. What can they do more than inquire? Surely the words "inquiring into" are sufficient. I should like to ask what is meant by "examining into" which is not covered by "inquiring into"?

*MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: I do not think that the words "and examination" carry the matter any further; but, as a long time has been spent over the point, I hope the House will come to a decision.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I move the insertion of the words merely to stiffen the language of the Bill.

MR. KIMBER: It is said that this Amendment will tend to enlarge the responsibility of the Director; but it does not do so. The words already in the Bill have, in my opinion, a much wider scope than will be the case if those words are amended as proposed. The words in the Bill are that the Director shall prove "that he had reasonable ground for believing," and I think that any Court would be able to exercise a sound and clear judgment as to whether he had or had not reasonable ground. Therefore, to insert "after reasonable inquiry and examination" would be absolutely to limit the inquiry. I object to the insertion of these words altogether.

MR. CHANCE: I think a proposal to insert "after reasonable inquiry," merely, would be a perfectly reasonable thing. An examination as to the signatory of a report or valuation cannot be unreasonable; and, therefore, so far I should be inclined to support those words. But do they not also apply to the competency of the person making the report or valuation? This being so, the Director is to be required to prove not only that he had reasonable ground to believe that the report was made by the person named, but that that person was also competent, so that the Director is to set himself as a sort of licensing authority and to make inquiry into the competency of every expert. I hope the hon. Gentleman will withdraw the words "and examination."

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

*SIR R. LETHBRIDGE: The next Amendment standing in my name is simply consequential to that already adopted. But perhaps I may be permitted to vary the words I have placed on the Paper, in accordance with the terms suggested and approved by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, and, as I take it, also by the hon. and learned Gentleman who has charge of the Bill. I would, therefore, propose, after the word "faith," in Clause 3, page 2, line 9, to insert the words "by the person whose name it bears."

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

*SIR R. LETHBRIDGE: There is another Amendment I desire to move, in order to raise a question which ought to be decided by this House before parting with this clause. I propose, in Clause 3, page 2, line 11, to leave out the words—

"Or unless he proves that he had not consented to become a Director of the company, or that, having so consented, he withdrew his consent before the issue of the prospectus or notice, and that the prospectus or notice without his authority or consent."

I move this omission because I wish the House to decide what is really meant by this very badly-drafted Bill. [Laughter.] I think this is already shown by the numerous alterations and amendments made in the Bill, and although hon. Members laugh at my suggestion, I wish to raise the point—What will a Court of Law understand by the word Director, as it is used throughout this clause? Who is a Director? I respectfully urge on this House that the Bill does not touch certain persons who are really responsible for mis-statements and bogus undertakings generally. That is to say, the promoters of companies whose names do not appear on the face of the prospectus. It simply applies to those who do so appear as Directors, and, therefore, I want it to be set out very clearly who are to be considered Directors. A man is not a Director, and would not be held to be one by any Court, if he has not consented to become a Director, although his name may appear on the prospectus. If this be so, I simply say that the words I propose to omit are simply surplusage and verbiage. Beyond this, a man who has consented at one time provisionally to become a Director, but has subsequently withdrawn his consent, before the issue of any prospectus or notice, can no more be a Director than any other person having nothing whatever to do with the company; ipso facto, he is not a Director. I hope we shall hear from the hon. and learned Member in charge of the Bill some definite statement as to who are really to be rendered liable under this measure—whether he means those who have fraudulently or otherwise affixed names to a prospectus which ought never to have had those names upon it, or whether he means those who are really the promoters of the company?

Amendment proposed, in page 2, Line 10, to leave out from the words "make it," to the end of Clause 3.—(Sir Roper Lethbridge.)

Sir R. Lethbridge

Question proposed, "That the words from 'make it,' to the word 'before,' in line 13, stand part of the Bill."

**SIR J. LUBBOCK*: I think if the hon. Gentleman who has proposed this Amendment will look carefully at the clause he will see that it applies to.

"Every person who is named in the prospectus or notice as a Director of the company or as having agreed to become a Director of the company either immediately or after an interval of time, and every person who has authorised or is responsible for the issue of the prospectus or notice."

Obviously, therefore, the words which it is proposed to omit are necessary and I hope, therefore, that the hon. Member will not think it necessary to press this Amendment.

**SIR R. LETHBRIDGE*: After what has just been said I ask leave of the House to withdraw this Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

**MR. KELLY*: I beg to move, in place of the Amendment standing in my name, the following Amendment:—

Clause 3, page 2, line 13, after the word "consent," to insert these words, "or has given proper public notice that he has sent in his resignation and has ceased to be such Director."

I do think it would be a most unfortunate thing, if in seeking to bring about a remedy for one evil, we should create a much greater evil. If the result of this Bill were to be that it would become almost impossible for any honest man to become the Director of a company, the House will, I think, agree with me in saying it would have been much better if this Bill had never been brought into the House at all. Perhaps the House will be somewhat surprised to know that there are cases in which a man has acted as a Director, and yet has never taken on himself the office of Director. The question as to whether a man has or has not in fact become a Director is one to be determined by the circumstances of each case. If this Bill only referred to ordinary cases of first issues, there would be no point in the observations I am making; but are there not many cases in which a prospectus, when first issued, is bona fide, but in which, subsequently, a majority of Directors, finding they cannot induce the public to take up a second or third set of shares or debentures and so subscribe a sufficient sum to get the necessary works for a mining or a railway undertaking done, agree to issue a fresh prospectus containing untrue or misleading statements. Take the case of a railway abroad, in regard to which a majority of the Directors agree to overstate the fact as to the extent of the completed line. A Director who had been a party to the original prospectus might decline to be a party to the subsequent one, and it is obvious that he ought to be able to divest himself of responsibility for a statement the truth of which he doubts, and for which he refuses to vouch. That is a case which is a common one; but from the words of the clause as they now stand, that if a man becomes a Director and acts for a number of years, he cannot withdraw from the position as I hold he should be able to do if he wishes. A man may be a Director for five years; every one of the other original Directors may cease to be Directors—there may not be any other person living from whom he can withdraw his consent to be a Director. Therefore, I submit that there should be some limitation adopted in the clause. Directors who wish to be honest should have the power of withdrawing from a Directorate the moment transactions take place that they repudiate, and they should be allowed to put an end to their responsibility as Directors. So far as I understand the facts, there is considerable doubt as to that which constitutes the act of ceasing to be a Director. A man may cease to be a Director in his own intention—that is to say, he may send in his resignation—but I am not sure whether his responsibility will not continue if his co-Directors refuse to accept his resignation. The cases must be decided according to their varying circumstances. Two things must be clear: first, that the act of a Director sending in his resignation is bonâ fide, and that he intends it to be acted on; and, secondly, that he intends no longer to be in the position of a Director, or to do any act which a Director alone can perform. I do not wish to labour the point, and I am bound to say that possibly the first part of the Amendment is very vague, but it is susceptible of easy modification. I understand that an hon. Member, who has an Amendment lower down, is not prepared to move it; and I think he is wise in refraining, because it seems to me it would be a most dangerous Amendment for the House to accept. I do not think it would be right to say, in the case of a man who had lent his name to a concern, and on the strength of whose name many shareholders had been induced to come forward with subscriptions—I do not think it would be right to provide that in such a case he should be able to escape all liability by giving notice of his intention to leave the Directorate three days before allotment. I think a Director should be required to give such notice as would be proper and reasonable under the circumstances. It would be idle to seek to protect the public by allowing a Director to give three days' notice of his intention to resign his directorship before the allotment of the shares, and advertising the fact in a paper circulating in a district in which the registered office of the company is situated, as proposed by the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dundee. This seems to me to be obvious, for this office might be in Wales, when the great bulk of those subscribing for the shares might reside in London. I hope that whatever view the House may take of the Amendment, it will not seek to whittle the words down so as to make the notice a merely technical one, and such as would never be likely to be brought to the knowledge of those who had subscribed for shares.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 13, after the word "consent" to insert the words "or has given proper public notice that he has sent in his resignation and ceased to be such director."—(Mr. John Kelly.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(4.40.) SIR R. LETHBRIDGE: Before this Amendment is put to the House, I think it is clear that we should ask the hon. and learned Gentleman in charge of the Bill whether, broadly speaking, he accepts the view of the Mover of the Amendment; secondly, I think we may fairly ask from the hon. and learned Gentleman who has moved the Amendment what he means by the word

"proper?" "Proper public notice" is a very vague term, and I suppose we might say in regard to it Quot homines, tot sententie—every man has his own idea of what is a proper public notice. This is really a very serious and important point. Public notice given by a Director of his having ceased to be a Director invariably means, I take it, the wrecking of the company to which he is attached. There can be no doubt that if a gentleman who is prepared to be a Director has obtained information before the company goes to allotment which convinces him that some fraud is contemplated, he will resign without a moment's hesitation, and notify the fact in such a way that investors will not be misled by the fact of his name appearing on the prospectus. There is no doubt about such a case as that; but I imagine that if this Bill passes, in the future a Director, when he sees that he has to examine every statement made in a prospectus, and that for the authenticity of every obscure document that may be referred to in the prospectus he is liable to the extent of his whole fortune, will hesitate very seriously before allotment before he allows his name to appear in connection with the enterprise, however sound and genuine it may be. What is he to do in such a case? The hon. and learned Gentleman who proposed the Amendment said that in such a case the Director should give proper public notice that he has sent in his resignation. That means that, because he has been associated with other gentlemen in an enterprise that may be of the soundest possible character, but is not quite certain on some obscure point, and, therefore, is legitimately and properly anxious not to have any connection with it, he is bound to wreck that enterprise. The question is a difficult one, and I think the point raised by the Mover of the Amendment should be arranged for, but I do not think it will be met by the acceptance of these words. I hope that before the Bill passes into law the right hon. Baronet the President of the Board of Trade or the hon. and learned Gentleman in charge of it will devise some means of meeting the important point raised. I do not think the Amendment should be accepted in its present form.

Sir R. Lethbridge

(4.45.) MR. MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr): I think the difficulty could be got over by providing that the prospectus should bear on the face of it the names of all existing Directors.

*(4.45.) MR. WARMINGTON: I admit that there may be something in the point raised by the Mover of the Amendment, but I doubt whether it is possible to provide words to meet it without doing an injustice. I would suggest to the hon. Member that, having received this acknowledgment of his point, he should allow it to be dealt with when the Bill is in the House of Lords.

(4.47.) MR. KIMBER: I hold that some such Amendment is required. A Director of a company may, after the issue of the prospectus, learn something, owing to the fact of the company being advertised by the prospectus, which may make it his bounden duty as a man of honour to retire. If this Bill passes without Amendment in this connection it will be out of the power of the Director to do so. I think that a locus penitentie should be open to the last moment. For instance, it ought to be competent for a Director to retire if he thinks that the allotment has been made upon an insufficient contribution. He should be allowed to do so at any time before the actual allotment, provided notice is given to the person making application.

(4.50.) MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I confess I have not followed the argument, but it seems to me there is nothing to prevent any Director who has discovered anything about the company which may influence his action from resigning. ["Yes there is!"] No, not from resigning; but there is to prevent him getting rid of any liability he has incurred. What is the liability which affects a Director in his position? It arises only in case he has been a party to a false statement which has misled other people, or in case he has not taken sufficient pains to ascertain if a statement to which he has given currency is true or false. If he finds it to his interest to go out of the company, I have no objection; but I am extremely unwilling that he should, at the same time, get rid of liability due to his own misconduct or tactics; his misconduct if he sanctioned a false statement; his tactics if he neglected to make sufficient inquiry into the accuracy of a statement. The hon. and learned Gentleman did not, perhaps, give us the full particulars of the case he put before the House. He spoke of a Director who formed a company and afterwards resigned on information which he did not have previously. Well, everything depends on whether he was a party to any statement in the prospectus which was false. If he was no party to such a statement, he would not be liable; he might resign, and no liability would attach to him if he had made reasonable inquiry and examination into the statement, and satisfied himself it was not false or misleading. But if the Director was a party to a false statement, and if some shareholders could show that he was led to join the company by this false statement, and if he could show, at the same time, that the Director had not made reasonable inquiry into the truth, then the Director ought to remain liable.

*(4.53.) SIR R. FOWLER: I am sorry my hon. Friend (Mr. Kimber) did not give us a little more information on the case he mentioned. As I understand, the noble Lord had private information that induced him to retire from the company. I should have thought his first course should have been to call his co-Directors together and put forward his information saying, "After this I object to going on, and our duty is at once to return the money paid and cease to advertise the company." Then the liability would be simply for the expenses of advertising, consulting solicitor, and small initial expenses. But, as the clause stands, it would seem to be a hard case for the noble Lord if he, having taken this course and having put the matter before his colleagues and his colleagues deciding to go on and make themselves liable, he hereafter should be involved in the same liability with them. That is a case the House ought to consider.

(4.55.) MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.): I agree with the criticism of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. The liability of a Director is up to the time of the issue of the prospectus or notice. This Bill does not interfere with the liability of a Director in respect of any subsequent publication of the prospectus, but merely up to the time of notice. It seems to me a Director is absolved under reasonable conditions, if he did not consent to the issue, or if he can prove that, having consented, he withdrew his consent before the issue of the prospectus or notice, and that such notice was issued without his authority or consent. It seems to me that no Director will be liable unless, in fact, he consented to the issue of the prospectus, or remained a Director, knowing that the prospectus was being issued, and that it contained a false statement. The hon. Member opposite has discussed the situation of a Director who subsequently became informed of a matter which, if he had known, in the first instance, he ought not to have sanctioned the issue at all. Such a case remains regulated by the Common Law and is not interfered with by this Bill. ["No!"] That is my opinion. If he allows his name to remain, and allows the thing to go forward with his name as a voucher, without attempting to prevent it, then he is liable. I am inclined to think that in moving this Amendment there is some confusion in the liability which arises on the first issue and subsequent issue of notices upon which the Director allows his name to appear and which is not dealt with by the Bill.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*(4.58.) SIR J. LUBBOCK: Before we leave Clause 3, I should like to point out that no limit of time of liability is provided. It is reasonable there should be some limit, for it might be possible to prove circumstances within a reasonable time, but not after the lapse of years. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider whether a clause should not be introduced limiting the time within which actions should be brought under the Bill.

*(4.59.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I shall be very happy to consider that point, but I apprehend a limit is provided by the Statute of Limitations. Of course, it may be urged that that limit should be reduced, but that is a point upon which I can express no opinion at present.

(5.0.) MR. BRUNNER: I would suggest the insertion of the words "or resigned" after the word "consent."

It cannot be said that a Director who may have been a Director four or five years, or even more, can have been considered to have withdrawn his consent if he wants to retire before the issue of the prospectus or notice. A second prospectus asking for money from the public is a very common thing, and a Director may desire to withdraw before the statement or prospectus is put before the public. Such a case is not provided for by the words in the Bill. I should like the hon. Member in charge of the Bill to consider this point.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 13, after the word "consent," to insert the words "or resigned."—(Mr. Brunner.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and negatived.

(5.2.) Mr. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I wish to raise the point mentioned in the Amendment of which the hon. Member for Dundee has given notice, where a Director has resigned his office three days before allotment, and has advertised such resignation in newspapers circulating in the district where the registered office of the company is situated. It is a different point to that which has been raised, and, I think, a material point; it deals with a man who, having become a Director, comes into further information between the issue of the prospectus and the allotment of shares. I think that a man who sends in his resignation before the allotment is made ought to be protected by some such words as these.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 13, after the word "notice" to insert the words, "or that, having been a Director, he has three days before allotment resigned his office, and has advertised such resignation in a newspaper circulating within the district in which the registered office of the company is situated."—(Mr. Baumann.)

*MR. SPEAKER: With the difference of the three days, the Amendment is substantially one upon which the House has decided, and is, therefore, not in order.

MR. KIMBER: May I ask if the words I propose "or before allotment" would be in order?

*MR. SPEAKER: I think the hon. Member may move that Amendment.

Mr. Brunner

(5.4.) Mr. KIMBER: I will do so. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham dealt with the case of a Director having placed his name on a prospectus, and having neglected to use means to satisfy himself of the accuracy of a statement therein, but that was not the case I put. I put the case of a Director having taken every means to satisfy himself, and who afterwards came bond fide into possession of information which may not go to falsifying the statement in the prospectus, but may be a material truth which should be made known to the persons making application. I quite agree with what has been said by the hon. Baronet as to the duty of such a Director, and it would be my advice to him that he should, as a matter of courtesy to his Colleagues, put the matter before them. But if they do not act as he would have them, he is at the mercy of his Colleagues, who may be the nominees of the promoters, and they may proceed to allotment, and he, though he may have tried to protect the allottees, may be prevented by the state of the law. He can resign, but he cannot escape the consequences attaching to himself, with the other Directors; he is still under the liabilities the Bill provides. The hon. and learned Member for Dumfries says that he is protected under the Common Law, but I dispute that proposition. He is committed to the statement in the prospectus issued, and the advertisements continue, on the faith of which men may take shares. I say distinctly he is not protected by Common Law.

MR. R. T. REID: I said his liability is under Common Law.

MR. KIMBER: The Bill makes a man responsible for any omission or false assertion, any omission of a material truth, and if a man having incurred responsibility is not allowed to get out of that responsibility, under such circumstances as I before detailed to the House, that is adding a gross injustice to the others contained in this Bill. I shall divide in support of the Amendment I now move.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 13, after the word "notice," to insert the words "or before allotment."—(Mr. Kimber.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'or before allotment' be there inserted."

*(5.9.) SIR R. LETHBRIDGE: Before the question is put, I think we have a right to be informed exactly as to the point we are here enacting. Does the hon. and learned Member in charge of the Bill mean to assert, that after a Director has attached his name to a prospectus, in firm belief in its bona fides, arrived at after thorough inquiry, and that then, if he obtain fresh information before allotment, and takes every possible step to act on such information, withdrawing his name from the Directorate, and giving public notification of the fact; does the hon. and learned Member mean to tell us that, notwithstanding all this, that Director shall be held liable for all his Colleagues or the Board may do in proceeding to allotment and carrying out the purposes of the Company in an improper manner? If so, it seems to me that to state such a proposition carries a negative with it. I hope the hon. and learned Gentleman will tell us what is his real intention. I would suggest to him that he might fairly accept the Amendment, which seems to me to be but simple justice.

*(5.2.) MR. WARMINGTON: I cannot accept the Amendment, nor do I accept the views of the hon. Member who moved it as to the objects of this Bill. The Bill makes no Director in any degree liable for statements in the prospectus, unless he has neglected his duty. If a Director is party to an untrue or a misleading statement, he is open to an action; but if he can prove that, after careful inquiry, he believed such statement was true and honestly made, he is not liable to penalty. The allottee must show that he subscribed on the faith of the statements in the prospectus, and if this is shown, why should not the person who can be held responsible for the prospectus be liable to the consequences? That is the whole of the Bill.

*(5.12.) SIR J. LUBBOCK: The case contemplated in the present Amendment is that of a Director who ascertains that he has been misinformed, and goes to his brother Directors and says, "Manifestly, we ought not to go on with allotment," makes this known as well as he is able by advertisement in the newspapers, and resigns his connection with the Board, but his Colleagues, against his remonstrances, proceed to allotment. The words in the Bill still leave him liable, though he has done everything in his power to make known the facts that have come to his knowledge, and to protect the shareholders from loss. This is a very hard case, and it is a point Her Majesty's Government would do well to consider when the Bill goes to another place.

(5.15.) The House divided:—Ayes 64; Noes 281.—(Div. List, No. 147.)

It being half after Five of the clock, Further Proceeding on consideration, as amended, stood adjourned.

Further proceeding to be resumed on Wednesday next.

RATING OF MACHINERY BILL.

(NO. 6.) COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

*MR. MILVAIN (Durham): I would ask the hon. Member for Cirencester, seeing that he has a direct pecuniary interest in the passing of this Bill, whether he can see his way, after the episode of last evening, to withdraw it?

*MR. SPEAKER: There is notice of an Instruction to the Committee, but the Instruction is not moved. The Instruction is irregular, because it is in a mandatory form, and as it is not moved I have no alternative but to leave the Chair at once.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): I do not know whether I may say by way of personal answer—

BOILER EXPLOSIONS ACT (1882)

AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 339.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*SIR W. HOULDSWORTH (Manchester, N.W.): I may, perhaps, be allowed a word of explanation. By the Act of 1882 provision was made for formal investigation by the Board of Trade into boiler explosions, and that power has been used beneficially by the Board of Trade. There are certain bodies exempted from these promises [Cries of "Objection."] I think I might be allowed to explain—

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): We are not allowed that.

Second Reading deferred till to-morrow.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT (NEW CODE.)

Copy ordered, "of Estimate of the probable additional Expenditure caused by the changes in the New Code, 1890." (Sir William Hart Dyke.)

Copy presented accordingly; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 346.]

MOTIONS.

PUBLIC HEALTH (SCOTLAND) ACT (1867)
AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Stephen Williamson, Bill to amend "The Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867," in relation to Hospitals for Burghs, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Stephen Williamson, Mr. Shirees Will, and Mr. Donald Crawford.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 345.]

HELIGOLAND.

On the Motion for adjournment,

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I should like to get some assurance from the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs as regards the cession of Heligoland to Germany. Are we to understand that a Bill will be brought in soon to effect this very desirable purpose, which I may mention I brought under the notice of the House four years ago? I then advocated the cession strongly, but received a most direct snub from the present Administration for my interference. A similar answer was given here a few days since, but I have great pleasure at finding that Lord Salisbury has adopted my proposal.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): It is stated in the Despatch from Lord Salisbury, a copy of which is in the hands of hon. Members, that a Bill will be presented for the purpose. When that Bill will be brought in is a question that should be addressed to the Leader of the House, not to me.

DR. TANNER: Are we to understand also that Gibraltar will be given up to Spain?

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): When will the Despatch and other Papers in relation to these arrangements be circulated?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Two hundred copies of the despatch have been sent to the Vote Office, and have been distributed, and every hon. Member will shortly receive a copy. I can say nothing about further papers.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I presume that is the Despatch which appeared in the newspapers this morning?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Yes; a number of copies were in the Vote Office last night.

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

CENTRAL LONDON RAILWAY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>d</sup>."
—(The Lord Sudeley.)

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: My Lords, I hope you will make a little allowance for a Bishop intruding into a matter of a description with which Bishops are not generally supposed to be concerned. It is not usual for any Bishop to oppose a Railway Bill, because the settlement of such matters is, generally speaking, left to those who are more intimately concerned with material questions. Bishops who are mostly concerned with spiritual and moral questions, do not usually take any part in them. But I am sure I shall have the indulgence of your Lordships in taking a part in this case, because I take that part on the ground of danger to St. Paul's Cathedral, which is not only dear to the citizens of London, but to the Church and the whole of England. The Bishop of London may naturally be supposed to watch with very careful jealousy anything which may possibly endanger a fabric which we all admire very much and value so highly. The proposal in this case is to carry a railway from Bayswater to Cheapside, underneath Oxford Street and Holborn, to the corner of Newgate Street, and there it approaches very near the Cathedral of St. Paul's. The railway itself is at a greater distance than the station will be, but the station which it is proposed to have at the corner of Newgate Street as proposed, will come within about 70 yards of the north-east corner of the cathedral.

I think the exact distance is 225 feet—consequently it becomes a matter of very serious consideration how this will affect the stability of the cathedral, as it now stands. Now, my Lords, we have very distinct evidence indeed of the kind of foundation on which St. Paul's Cathedral rests. We know by the researches made by Sir Christopher Wren, the architect of the cathedral, that there is a considerable quantity of brick-earth at the surface, and that when you have got below that, you very soon come to sand and gravel, then below that is what Sir Christopher Wren called "a beach," and then a little lower still we come to the London clay. Now, the sand and gravel which I have mentioned are known to be water-bearing strata. They are full of water up to some height in the strata. The top of the sand is said to be tolerably dry, but the bottom of the sand and gravel is certainly not, and the real danger which threatens St. Paul's Cathedral is that the water may be drained off from this sand and gravel and, consequently, that the sand and gravel, may sink down to a lower space than it occupies at present. Your Lordships are, I suppose, quite aware that of all the things we know water is one of those which it is most difficult, if not absolutely impossible, to compress into a smaller space. You can compress sand and gravel without any great difficulty if you use weight enough, and you can compress even tolerably hard rock if you get weight enough upon it, but water, as far as we know, can hardly be compressed at all. The drawing away of the water from this sand and gravel will, therefore, leave the sand and gravel subject to compression by the weight above them, and the weight above them in this case is an enormous weight—it is the weight of the whole of the vast edifice; and, therefore, my Lords, I think it must be admitted that if there would be a danger of that kind in any case, it is quite certain there must be danger in this case. The danger, of course, is precisely this, that when you have anything like a withdrawal of water which lies underneath the foundations, the subsidence is not always equal. It cannot be. The foundations subside more in one part than in another, and the result, of course, is that your building is unequally supported. Anybody can see that the danger from that is very serious, and that in all such cases, you will have subsidences, cracks, and possibly the actual ruin of parts of the structure. My Lords, it is this danger that all those who are concerned in the safety of St. Paul's are anxious about. The promoters of the Bill have just laid a statement before the House, and it appears from that statement that they are prepared to say there is no danger whatever. They say there is no real risk to St. Paul's. But let me point out, in the first place, that it is not quite sufficient for them to say there is no real risk, unless they are prepared to point out how this argument which I have put before your Lordships' House is to be met. I have gone carefully through the evidence, and I must say that I cannot find any answer to this argument. Then, my Lords, I have to observe in the next place that these are certain cases adduced in which a railway has gone very near a great structure without doing it any very great damage. In support of this Bill it is urged that the Metropolitan District Railway runs within 70 feet of Westminster Abbey, and that it has done no damage to Westminster Abbey; also that it runs within 20 feet of Westminster Hospital, and has done no damage to Westminster Hospital. That, of course, would be relevant enough if the depths were at all comparable with one another, but the fact is that the foundations of Westminster Abbey go down from the surface, probably 15 feet, while the District Railway is below the surface just 18 feet, and, therefore, whatever drainage would be caused by the Metropolitan District Railway would be a drainage of a depth of three feet only. That sums up the mischief that can possibly be done to Westminster Abbey by the District Railway. The withdrawal of the water from that three feet might conceivably do mischief; but it is not at all surprising that we should find no such mischief has been done when we consider that it is only from so small a depth of strata that the water has been withdrawn. But the rails of the Central London Railway would be 53 feet below the bottom of the foundations of St. Paul's Cathedral. There is a vast difference between taking the water away from merely 3ft., and taking the water away from 53ft. of strata; and we cannot at all argue that because a shallow railway has been run close to Westminster Abbey without doing any harm you may, therefore, run a railway to the depth of 53ft. close to St. Paul's Cathedral, and do no harm whatever to that great structure. It is plain in each case that the railway will only drain away the water down to its own depth, and that if you are affecting only 3ft. you may do little or no damage at all. I am not quite clear, my Lords, that no damage has been done to Westminster Abbey, because I believe the evidence of the Clerk of the Works is that there has been some slight damage done, although as yet it is not very much. But to drain away all the water that may lie at this depth of 53ft. is a very different thing indeed, and the danger must be estimated in a totally different manner. Then it is stated that the railway would be carried through the London clay. It will be, no doubt, to a great extent, carried through the London clay, but it will very likely come above the level of the clay in various places. We cannot at all guarantee that the bottom of it will not be above the clay just at this part, and, therefore, the suggestion that the clay will hold the water which is above it, and protect the strata from sinking, does not apply in this case unless you can prove that at this point the water would lie altogether below the level of the railway itself. Even then you would have a great deal to show in order to prove that the London clay has no chinks or fissures in it, through which the water could penetrate. But, of course, my Lords, to have a railway constructed at that depth is more likely to be dangerous, although one at a considerably further distance might possibly be tolerably safe. But that is not all; it is proposed to put between the railway and St. Paul's Cathedral a large station, which, of course, must run down to the same depth as the railway itself; then there must also be shafts sunk down to that level, and all this is to be done within 75 yards of St. Paul's. Of course it may not come quite so close as I have mentioned, but the plans indicate the construction of a station which is to come within that distance. It is obvious, on the face of it, that even if it were possible to carry the railway, considered by itself, so near to St. Paul's without risk, to make this station and these shafts close by is entailing a risk of a very much more important character, a risk so serious that I do desiderate a better answer from the engineer than simply the ipse dixit of a man who says there is no danger to be apprehended. But, my Lords, that is not the whole matter. The engineer who has charge of this work is the Engineer also who has charge of the construction works of the London and Southwark Subway, and that subway is being constructed in the very same manner in which this railway is proposed to be constructed. Well, the engineer, when he gave his evidence in support of the Bill for the London and Southwark Subway, stated that that subway would do no mischief to surrounding buildings; but, my Lords, the subway has done mischief almost all along its extent. I have a list here showing many cases where houses have been injured. In 15 different cases mischief has been done, and, in particular, we have had injury done to St. James's Church, Kennington. That church is almost destroyed by the railway coming close to it. The engineer, afterwards, when he was asked whether the subway had not damaged the church, replied that the church was very slightly built, and that it was not at all like the solid masonry which Sir Christopher Wren took care to put into St. Paul's Cathedral. That answer, I think, my Lords, is of some importance upon this proposal, and we may say of that engineer's opinion in our view of it valeat quantum. But it is to be observed that this engineer, who had previously expressed himself as convinced that the subway would not at all hurt the property along its course, now gives, when it is clear that it has hurt the adjoining property, a totally different account of the matter, and says that the cause of the damage was that the injured building was not substantial enough. Against the fact that the statement made by the engineer was directed to the fact of the church being of rather unsubstantial construction, I put the fact of the enormously greater weight of St. Paul's Cathedral. My Lords, you have not here to consider the mere weight of an ordinary church. This is, no doubt, a very different thing, and when you have to consider such a weight as that of the vast edifice of St. Paul's Cathedral, you know for certain that the amount of pressure which will be existing in the case of that structure to squeeze the water out through any outlet which is provided for it, will be incalculably greater than the pressure exerted by the weight of such a comparatively small building as St. James's Church. It is said, my Lord, that this railway is to be constructed on an entirely new method. It is to be constructed upon the atmospheric pressure principle, and it is said that the atmospheric pressure used will be such as to prevent the water from escaping. Well, at any rate, we ought to have very clear evidence that it is possible to do so. In the case of the subway, they did not succeed in preventing mischief. They did succeed, to some degree, in preventing this perpetual leakage of water, but then your Lordships must consider that the subway is a tube of only 11 feet diameter, while this railway tunnel is nearly three times that diameter—its actual diameter is, I believe, 29 feet. Then there is the space for this station besides to be excavated. It may be quite possible to do with a tube 11 feet in diameter what it is quite impossible to do with a tube 28 feet in diameter. Every mathematician knows perfectly well that the amount of pressure which comes from the surface in such a case is not merely in proportion to diameters of tubes, but that it is very much larger in proportion as the diameters increase; and with regard to the pressure which will have to be resisted here, certainly there is no evidence yet to show that it can be resisted at all. We have the instance of the subway now being constructed in America under the river Hudson at New York. There they have had accidents occurring. Only in January last the tunnel they were making collapsed and killed 20 people, and we do not know yet whether it will be found possible for them to go on with that subway. At any rate we ought to be quite sure what we are doing before we sanction the introduction of this at present experimental method of dealing with such a case as this. The London County Council have had a proposal before them for making a subway which they were to authorise. But they declined to authorise it until they had had further experience, because they believed that the experiments were not sufficiently conclusive at present to justify them in accepting the belief of the engineer that this could be done without any serious risk. Now, it may be said that we have great experts declaring that they have looked into this, and that they are quite sure there is no risk of damage being done, but when your Lordships have these facts before you, you see here is one of these great engineers giving evidence of one kind at one time, and of another kind at another time, saying first that he is sure no damage will be done by the construction of the London and Southwark Subway, and then saying, when the damage is done, that it is the fault lies in the construction of the building which is damaged, and that it is not the fault of his subway in damaging it. I think your Lordships will agree that this kind of assertion on the part of engineers is not, as it does not seem to me to be, at all satisfactory. An engineer has been employed to look into the matter, from our point of view, and he was very anxious to put before the other House the case of Westminster Abbey, because he knew that something has been said about the circumstances of that case as bearing upon the present instance, but that was ruled to be irrelevant there. Certainly it is rather remarkable that it should be ruled irrelevant before the Committee of the House of Commons, and that yet the promoters of the Bill should cite that instance in favour of what they propose to do. My Lords, this is not a matter, surely, which ought to be decided upon mere speculative grounds. You ought not, surely, to run any risk of serious damage to such a fabric as St. Paul's Cathedral, unless you are quite sure. There are cases, of course, in which it is reasonable to say—“Here is a most important commercial undertaking, which will be of commercial advantage, and which will facilitate business, something which does contribute largely towards the commercial prosperity of the city, and, therefore, we must run a little risk, and if there be a doubt we must give the commercial undertaking the benefit of the doubt.” But can you say that in such a case as this? Surely, if there be a doubt in this case, my Lords, you ought to give the benefit of that doubt to the Cathedral of St. Paul. If anything were done to wreck that great monument of Christian architecture, can we conceive any greater discredit to the Parliament of this country than that it should have consented to bring very serious ruin upon such a structure, in order that people might save 15 minutes in coming from Bayswater to Cheapside? I cannot conceive, if the importance of the matter is duly weighed, that those who really feel the gravity of so dealing with such a structure will be willing to consent to this in a case where, certainly, we have no distinct proof of safety, but where we have, on the contrary, very distinct evidence that the experiment has not always been successful, and, when that is the case, it is too much to say we should allow such an experiment to be made now at the cost of what we value so much, of what we admire so highly, and of what we look upon as one of the glories of the Metropolis of England. I appeal to your Lordships to support me in resisting a speculation which may have such disastrous consequences as this, and I will ask anyone who feels disposed to vote on the other side, to think for a moment what he would feel if this Bill were to pass and he were a year hence to see that some very serious damage had been done to our great cathedral, seeing that he himself had had some hand in allowing it to be done. I appeal specially to your Lordships because I am the Bishop of that cathedral, and charged, therefore, with the duty of representing its fortunes in this House, and I am only doing my duty to the very best of my very imperfect ability in stating as clear a case as I can why we should hesitate, and hesitate long, before we agree to such a fatally hazardous experiment.

Amendment moved, to leave out the word “now,” and add at the end of the Motion the words “this day six months.”
—(The Lord Bishop of London.)

*VISCOUNT POWERSCOURT: My Lords, the opposition of the right rev. Prelate to this Bill goes to the principle of the Bill. I think that in a case such as this, as the right rev. Prelate has said, it requires great consideration; but I think your Lordships will agree that it is better not to oppose such a Bill on the principle involved in it. In successive Sessions different Bills with the object of improving the Metropolitan underground communications have been thrown out on various pleas. In one year objection was raised on account of injury to the trees in Hyde Park although the railway was to run under the roadway and 50 feet under the surface. In this case it is stated that the nearest point of the railway will be 250 feet distant from the Cathedral. I should doubt very much if any settlement of earth which could be caused by making a tunnel at that distance, could possibly affect the foundations of that magnificent structure. Your Lordships all know perfectly well the extraordinary way in which the great traffic of London has increased, and the congestion in the thoroughfares of Piccadilly, Oxford Street, and other places is apparent to everyone. I think it is unnecessary to say more to show the absolute necessity of some improvement in the means of the railway communication in the centre of the Metropolis. The scheme has been strongly supported in another place, and although, of course, as the right rev. Prelate says, we have not had the Bill before us in this House yet, still I think that there is a strong case for reading the Bill a second time, and for referring it to a Select Committee. The right rev. Prelate cited the case of a church in Kennington, where he says that the London and Southwark subway went close to it, but I think the distance of 250 feet, which is stated to be the nearest point here cannot be said to be very close to the Cathedral. There is no Member of your Lordships' House who would be more unwilling than myself to see any damage done to our great cathedral, but I must say I think the right rev. Prelate has not made a case of throwing out the Bill on Second Reading.

*THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE: My Lords I desire to say a few words for the purpose of contributing a little support from my own experience to the case made by the right rev. Prelate. For 10 years of my life I had the custody of a cathedral not so important as that of St. Paul's, still one of our most glorious and historic cathedrals; I mean the cathedral of Ely. It so happened that about 35 years ago, I think, some improvements by way of drainage were carried out in the city of Ely. That was a great improvement, no doubt, to the whole town and for the comfort and health of the inhabitants; but it so happened that the cathedral of Ely stands upon a bed of sand, and the sand being saturated with water very much in the manner that has been described in this case by the right rev. Prelate, the effect of that drainage was, among other things, to let out a great deal of the water from the sandy stratum and to draw away the water from underneath the cathedral. When I was Dean of Ely Cathedral we had a great deal of trouble with regard to cracks and evidences of settlement appearing in different parts of the cathedral. I had a good deal to do with the expenditure in underpinning and making good the defects where there had been subsidences, and there was very great expenditure entailed by the delicate process of rebuilding flying buttresses. I am not sufficiently scientific to absolutely state the truth of what I now suggest, but the Clerk of the Works who had charge of the building, and in whom I had very great confidence, always attributed the difficulties which we experienced with regard to the cathedral to the fact of the drainage, which had taken place a few years before. I think myself that was very probably the cause. Certainly we had settlements and cracks in the building, which gave us a great deal of trouble, and no other cause was ever suggested except that which I have mentioned. Now, I think, my Lords, the phenomena which we experienced in Ely were exactly the same as may be anticipated here. If you drain away the water from the strata below, you will drain away a good deal of the support, and have, of course, cracks and subsidences in the superincumbent edifice. As far as the case of the cathedral goes, I myself feel very much disposed to support the right rev. Prelate, and I think the speech which we have just heard from a noble Lord tends very much to support the argument which preceded it. Because, what did the noble Lord opposite tell us? He gave us figures which entirely agreed with those mentioned by the right rev. Prelate, and all he did in addition was to say that he doubted very much that any mischief could happen. We ought not to allow St. Paul's Cathedral to depend upon a doubt; we must have certainty or something very much approaching certainty, before we can consent that the grandest, and, in some respects, the most important ecclesiastical building in the kingdom, a building with which the pride of the nation is bound up more than with any other, should suffer the smallest probability of having to undergo any risk.

*LORD SUDELEY: My Lords, the Motion of the right rev. Prelate seems to me to be one which is most unusual upon a Bill of this importance. It is, I believe, almost without precedent, and I venture to think that the right rev. Prelate has not made out his case. My Lords, what are the facts of the matter? This Bill is not a Bill which comes up to your Lordships for the first time. It is a Bill which comes up from the other House, having been thoroughly investigated in Committee. It has been most thoroughly debated upon two other occasions, and certainly it seems to me that if your Lordships refuse to allow it to go to a Committee you are liable to be charged with a grave act of discourtesy, and I venture to think it will be a course which it would be most unusual for your Lordships to adopt. The right rev. Prelate has undoubtedly made out, from his point of view, a strong case. He has spoken with deep conviction, and none of your Lordships can doubt that he has done so, feeling that it is his duty to make that protest; and he has made out, on the part of the opponents, undoubtedly, a case which, if it is true, is very strong. But, my Lords, it does seem to me, if the right rev. Prelate is correct in all his views, that is the very reason which would induce your Lordships to send it to a Committee of Inquiry. Surely, if he is right, in his own interest and in the interest of those who oppose the Bill, it is far better that the matter should be thoroughly threshed out; and if there is any danger to St. Paul's Cathedral, it should be shown at once, and then we shall hear no more about it. But, my Lords, what are the facts of the matter? The right rev. Prelate has based his opposition entirely on the ground that there is a danger to St. Paul's from the construction of this railway. This question came before the Committee of the other House; it was most thoroughly gone into by that Committee, and they had before them three great engineers, Sir John Fowler, Sir Benjamin Baker, and Mr. Greathead. Those three engineers proved to the satisfaction of the Committee that there was not the slightest danger to the foundations of St. Paul's Cathedral. The right rev. Prelate has gone somewhat into an engineering discourse. He has stated, in the first place, that you cannot liken this in any way to the case of the Metropolitan District Railway which was made near Westminster Abbey. My Lords, it is somewhat interesting to remember that about 25 years ago in that matter a very similar discussion occurred. It was then shown that the Metropolitan District Railway would be constructed within 70 feet of Westminster Abbey and within 23 feet of Westminster Hospital, and that enormous danger would accrue to the foundations of those structures. But your Lordships are aware that no harm whatever has arisen. The right rev. Prelate says that was a totally different case, and that, in that case, the Metropolitan District Railway was only constructed at a very shallow distance from the surface, whereas, in this case, you are to have a railway 53 feet below the surface, and that, therefore, there is very great danger of damage from the drainage of the water. But, my Lords, if you are to consider the question in that light, you must remember the facts of the case. The proposal in this Bill is not that you should go into any stratum which would cause danger, but that you should go through the blue clay. The right rev. Prelate speaks of the tube through which this railway is to pass as being of far larger diameter than the London and Southwark Subway, that, whereas that has only a diameter of 11 feet, this is to be a tube of 29 feet diameter. Well, my Lords, as a matter of fact, I think the right rev. Prelate is entirely wrong in his statement. The two tubes are certainly only 11 feet each in diameter. Though I think there is very little necessity for me to go into the facts, still, as the right rev. Prelate has mentioned this matter I think I ought to make some reference to it. My Lords, the proposal under this Bill is that the railway should go within 250 feet at its nearest point of St. Paul's Cathedral; not 70 feet, as it was in the case of the Metropolitan District Railway in regard to Westminster Abbey. You have the highest engineering authorities saying there is not the slightest danger. My Lords, I think that shows, at any rate, there is another side to the question, whether right or wrong I will not say, but it certainly shows there is another aspect of the question which justifies an investigation before one of your Lordships' Committees. The noble Lord who spoke before me referred to the congestion of the traffic. The whole object of this Bill is to relieve the congested traffic in this great Metropolis. There can be no doubt, as probably any of your Lordships who take an interest in the matter are aware, that the traffic in London is growing to a most fearful extent. The number of omnibuses and cabs, which are increasing day by day, has become a great danger to all pedestrians; and I think, if there were no other ground for supporting this Bill, your Lordships would hardly refuse to give it a Second Reading when you consider that important point. I think it must be admitted that everyone who has watched the growth of our traffic must come to the conclusion that before long we must either have overhead railway accommodation or further underground railway communication. What I venture to suggest to your Lordships is this: that come what may, this Bill should now be read a second time, and that it should then be referred to one of your Lordships' Committees, where the measure can be thoroughly threshed out.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I should like to say when I mentioned that the diameter of the tunnel was to be 29 feet, I meant that it would be so at the station and that the excavation for the station, and shafts would be an additional danger; that is to say, that the station would be, as regards distance, an addition to the tunnel.

THE EARL OF MORLEY: I am sure your Lordships will not be surprised at the objection which has been taken by the right rev. Prelate, who watches over the fabric of St. Paul's Cathedral, or that he has taken the somewhat unusual course of moving the rejection of the Second Reading of this Bill from a strict sense of duty. I quite sympathise with, and I am sure your Lordships will share in, his anxiety to protect the grand fabric of that Cathedral from every risk of danger. But, my Lords, the question is, are we in a position to judge whether this is a risk or not? I listened to the rev. Prelate's speech and to the testimony that he produced to your Lordships. All that, no doubt, is very interesting engineering and geological evidence, which cannot be tested here, but which could be tested before one of those tribunals to which your Lordships refer Bills of this description. I will not express the slightest opinion as to the validity or invalidity of the reasons which the right rev. Prelate has alleged for saying that the construction of such a railway would be a risk to the fabric of St. Paul's; but I do maintain very strongly that it would not be right for the House to diverge from its usual practice on this occasion and to reject this Bill on Second Reading without giving both the promoters and opponents of it an opportunity of being heard before a Select Committee. The Bill was fought very thoroughly before the House of Commons; a Committee of that House sat very nearly a month, I think, considering it, and then the Bill was sent up with certain Amendments and certain safeguards, as was considered, to your Lordships' House. I do not for a moment anticipate what the decision of a Select Committee might be, whether it might conclude to pass the Bill or not, or, if it did pass the Bill, whether or not it might think fit to introduce certain other safeguards in it; but this I do say, that it would be a very unfortunate course to take, especially after what has occurred in another place, if your Lordships did not give an opportunity for further investigation.

*THE EARL OF MEATH: My Lords, I am sure we must all sympathise with the right rev. Prelate who has introduced this Motion. The right rev. Prelate is at the head of the Diocese of London, and not only is he at the head of the Diocese of London, but he is a very eminent leader of the Church of England, and he would not have been performing his duty if he had not, with the feeling which he entertains, brought this question to your Lordships' notice. But, my Lords, I doubt very much whether he has proved his case. I myself think he has not done so, and the only point in which I differ from my noble Friend Lord Sudeley is that Lord Sudeley said he thought the right rev. Prelate had made out a strong case. Now, I cannot make out how Lord Sudeley could say that he had made out a strong case, inasmuch as the right rev. Prelate has not given us a single engineering authority to bear out what he has stated. He has referred to the opinions of eminent architects; but, on the other hand, the promoters of this Bill have brought forward as evidence the opinions of two of the greatest engineers the world knows—Sir John Fowler and Sir Benjamin Baker. Those men would not risk their reputation—a reputation which is dear to them—by telling the Committee of the House of Commons there is not the smallest danger in what the company propose to do if they had thought there was danger. Sir Benjamin Baker went so far as to say that even if there were an open cutting made there would be no danger to the foundations of St. Paul's Cathedral. My Lords, we have heard a great deal about St. Paul's Cathedral being erected on sand and gravel strata. But the promoters tell us that the tunnel is to run through the clay below. If the arguments of the right rev. Prelate are worth anything, they would go to show that the deeper the tunnel is driven the greater is the danger to be apprehended. He told us there was a parallel instance in the case of the Metropolitan District Railway running near Westminster Abbey; but that it was so near the surface that no danger had been incurred, and that, in fact, the danger increases with the depth to which you go. I am unable to give an opinion upon this question; but I do not think your Lordships are able to give an opinion upon it either. The whole question is one which I think ought to be discussed in Committee, and not in this House. We ought to have before that Committee the evidence of the greatest engineers we can find, and, of course, if it can be proved to the Committee that there is danger to the structure of the Cathedral, there is no one, I suppose, in your Lordships' House who would not immediately vote for throwing out the Bill. But I say it would be wrong for this House to go directly in the face of what was done in the House of Commons, where there was no Division even taken upon it. Its opponents were so few that there was not, I believe, a third person in the House to oppose it. My Lords, greater means of communication are wanted in this Metropolis. We have only to go along Oxford Street to see the congested state of the traffic there. There are only three ways of relieving it. One is by overhead communication, as they have in New York, which I do not think would be permitted in this Metropolis. Some of your Lordships may have travelled by the overhead railway in New York, and, though it may be exceedingly convenient to those who may desire to travel by it, it undoubtedly lowers the value of the houses below and makes privacy impossible in them. I am perfectly certain that the shopkeepers in Oxford Street, who, as I understand, are now opposing this Bill, would be the last to desire to have a railway passing down their thoroughfare; we know that the road is already so very much congested that it is almost impossible for the cabs and omnibuses to pass along it. If neither overhead nor surface communication are available to us, the only way of relieving the traffic is by an underground railway. The population of London has increased during the last 24 years some 60 per cent., and I believe that the number of passengers who travel annually has increased some 700 per cent. The Committee of the House of Commons were quite alive to the necessity of proceeding with great caution, and they put into the Bill a clause by which no action was to be taken, and, indeed, no money was to be raised until three months after the City and Southwark subway had been completed, so that there might be some experience obtained before any steps were taken to make this underground railway. I should have liked individually if the Committee had forced the company to pay some compensation for the monopoly of the sub-soil, but that is a matter for Committee, and therefore is one which I will not introduce here. I think, also, that the arguments of the right rev. Prelate were entirely arguments which ought to have been introduced in Committee, and I hope, therefore, your Lordships will not assent to the Motion of the right rev. Prelate.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): My Lords, the question before your Lordships is so interesting and important, that perhaps I may be pardoned for suggesting a course which, if taken, might possibly meet the views of all the Members of your Lordships' House. It seems to me that, besides the interested parties in this matter, if one may call them so—that is to say, those who have the custody of the Cathedral—there is a very large interest outside among the public, who have a great regard for that building as an ornament and grace to the Metropolis. It seems to me, if we let this Bill go in the ordinary course before a Committee; if that Committee were called upon to make a special Report to us, in case they may find that the Bill may be safely passed without fear of harm being done to St. Paul's Cathedral, they should lay before us the grounds on which they have come to that conclusion. At present we are discussing the Bill entirely in the dark. I do not know anything of what passed in the House of Commons, nor have I had the means of making myself acquainted with it, and I suppose none of your Lordships are in a better position in that respect than myself. I am quite sure, however, that if we had the Report of a Committee before us, we could then judge whether or not the grounds on which the Committee had proceeded were such as we could endorse or approve, and in that way we should be able to vote with knowledge on the Third Reading. If, on the other hand, a Committee of your Lordships' House should conclude that there was no ground for going on with the railway, and if they saw no reason to pass the Preamble, the Bill would not come back to us. But if it does come back, it is very desirable, I think, that it should come back upon a Special Report upon which the House could act with knowledge.

*THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, in rising to support what has been said by the noble Viscount opposite, with regard to referring the Bill, I would only suggest that it does not require a special Report from the Committee. What I think would answer all purposes is, that there should be an Order to the Committee that the evidence before it, including the printed notes of the arguments, should be circulated among the Members of this House, and in that way we should have the whole case before us and be able to form a judgment upon it.

*EARL FORTESCUE: My Lords, I only wish to say a few words upon this Motion. Many years ago, when there were urgent whips and great canvassing among Members of Parliament for the purpose of passing or rejecting Bills on Second Reading—Railway Bills particularly—and a Committee was appointed to consider the private business of the other House, I had the honour of being a member of that Committee. At this distance of time I have the liveliest recollection of the impression which I then carried away; that is, how extremely undesirable it was that, except in cases where the clearest principles were at stake for either House of Parliament to attempt to discuss points of engineering science, or to deal with matters which could only be satisfactorily dealt with before a Committee. The evils of the other system are palpable, and the conclusion which I entreat your Lordships to come to is, as there is no question of principle involved here, to give this Bill a Second Reading, and then to let it go before one of your Lordships' Committees, where it can be freely discussed and scrutinised and evidence taken upon it.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: My Lords, I do not know that I should not be wise to accept the advice of the noble Viscount to refer the Bill for a special Report as to the absence of danger. I should, of course, reserve to myself the right of opposing the further progress of the Bill, if it should appear to me that the decision of the Committee was not quite in accordance with the wisest course.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn: Bill read 2<sup>d</sup>, and committed: The Committee to be proposed by the Committee of Selection.

HELIGOLAND.

QUESTION.—OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY: My Lords, I desire to ask the noble Marquess

a question of which I have given him private notice. I understand it is not his intention to make any statement to the House to-day with reference to the Agreement, published in yesterday's papers, which has taken place between this country and Germany in regard to the cession of Heligoland. I understand that he is not in a position to make a complete statement on the subject to-day; and, that being so, I would venture to ask him the question for the purpose of obtaining information. It is this—Has he, before agreeing to the cession of Heligoland, consulted the Military and Naval Authorities in regard to the expediency of such cession? I would further ask him if any steps have been taken, or are in contemplation, to ascertain the wishes of the Heligolandiers themselves with regard to that transfer? I would also ask, though I have not given the noble Marquess notice of the question and therefore he will deal with it as he thinks best, when and where the Heligoland Transfer Bill will be introduced, and when we may expect to have further Papers on the subject?

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, with respect to the first of the questions of the noble Earl, I have to reply that before coming to the decision which we have communicated to your Lordships we made ourselves acquainted with the opinions of those professional advisers who were in a position to give us advice upon the subject. The matter is more naval I should say than military. There are certain military points, but the naval question is the predominant one. With respect to the second question of the noble Earl, my answer must be in the negative. The plébiscite is not among the traditions of this country. We have not taken a plébiscite, and I see no necessity for doing so. At the same time, we have good ground for believing that if there has been expressed in past times any objection on the part of any of the inhabitants of Heligoland to this transfer, it has been mainly connected with the fear of a conscription; and if the noble Earl will read the Despatch which has been laid upon the Table he will observe that we have taken the precaution to stipulate that no person alive at the time of the cession shall be subject to obligatory military or naval service. With regard to the third question of the noble Earl as to the introduction of the Bill, I thought it would have been introduced into the House of Commons, but I see no objection to introducing it into this House. I doubt whether it can be laid on the Table until the Convention is signed, because naturally the Bill must refer to that. The Bill is necessarily a short one. With respect to Papers, I do not know what Papers the noble Earl speaks of; but, of course, any papers that we are able to lay before the House we shall be happy to place upon the Table. I presume the Convention is the principal Paper.

SETTLED LAND BILL.—(No. 99.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, I need detain your Lordships but a few moments in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, because it is so much a matter of detail that no doubt it will have to be considered in Committee. I should imagine there will be no objection to the Second Reading of the Bill. It has been prepared by the Incorporated Law Society, and is the result of the experience which has been obtained in the working of the Settled Land Act. Certain questions have arisen which it is desirable to settle, and it is considered expedient to give several powers which were not given in the first instance; but none of them are matters of very great gravity, or make any considerable change in the law. I do not propose to take your Lordships through every clause in the Bill, but merely to mention its principal provisions. Doubts have arisen where a rent-charge on the disentailment of an estate is created in favour of an eldest son when he is a disentailing party, whether that instrument is to be considered for the purposes of the Settled Land Act as constituting one instrument, together with the settlement proper, or whether it is to be regarded as an incumbrance. I think there is no doubt it was intended to be treated as part of the settlement; but doubt has arisen, and the 1st clause to which I will refer, Clause 4 of the Bill, removes that doubt, and provides that it shall be treated as one instrument. Under the Settled Land Act there is power on a sale under the Act to reserve an easement, but there is no power to do so when it is an exchange or partition, and not a sale. The same power is now reserved equally in that case. The next provision is to enable a tenant for life to carry out a contract which has been entered into by his predecessor in title. Before the transaction can be carried out under the contract, a sale may be made; but, pending its completion, if the vendor dies the proceedings would at present have to be taken all over again. Under this clause power is given to continue the proceedings and to convey the estate. Then the next provision makes this alteration: At present a lease can only be granted by the tenant for life after notice has been given to the Trustees of the settlement. The 7th clause in the Bill enables a lease, if it is for 21 years or less and at a rack-rent, to be made by the tenant for life without notice to the Trustees. Then there is a provision relating to the mansion house. Your Lordships are aware that there is an exception from the power of the tenant for life to sell under the Settled Land Act in that respect; he is unable to sell the mansion house. The 9th clause leaves that generally untouched, but it provides—exceed one hundred acres in extent, the house is not to be deemed a principal mansion house within the meaning of this section.”

The next provision is one on which some question may possibly be raised. At present the tenant for life can sell land that is settled for the purpose of expending the money for which the land is so sold upon improvements as defined by the Settled Land Act. The 10th clause of the Bill proposes to enable a tenant for life to raise money by mortgage for those same purpose instead of selling a portion of the estate. Sometimes the sum required is very small, and the difficulty of selling a small portion of the estate for the purpose of raising the necessary money is great. It would be a very considerable convenience to the tenant for life, and an advantage to the estate itself if such sum could be raised by mortgage, instead of by the sale of a portion of the real estate. It does not alter the mode in which the money is to be applied. It would be useful also for another purpose. At present, if there are mortgages and charges upon an estate, a tenant for life may sell for the purpose of paying them off, but he could not remortgage the estate for the purpose of consolidating the mortgages and, perhaps, raising the money required for the purpose at a lower rate of interest than that payable under the existing mortgages. Your Lordships are aware that many estates may be charged with mortgages bearing interest considerably in excess of the rate at which borrowing could now take place, nevertheless the tenant for life is precluded from making a fresh borrowing for the purpose of paying off mortgages, though he could do so at a lower rate of interest. This clause is intended to give him that power. Then, the next provision is merely a matter of machinery, and I need not trouble your Lordships with it. The 12th clause extends in some measure the improvements upon which settled money may be expended; one is the construction of bridges which are necessary for the purpose of the estate, which are not now included; and the next provision enables the money to be expended in putting the estate into a condition in which it may reasonably be let to the best advantage. Then the 13th clause enables the Court, if it thinks fit, where money has been paid into Court, to order payment of it out to the Trustees. At present, when money once gets into Court, it cannot be got out again; whereas, under this provision, the Court may order it if it thinks fit. There is only one other clause with which I need trouble your Lordships. That provides that where there are no Trustees of the settlement within the meaning of the Act the persons here named shall be the Trustees. The persons named in the Bill are those who, when application is made to the Court, are the people who would be appointed. This provision is only to save the necessity of applying to the Court in each case to appoint Trustees, and it does not make any substantial change. It is only for the purpose of avoiding the expense of an application to the Court. Now, those are all the provisions of the Bill with which I need trouble your Lordships. No doubt they will have to receive more consideration when in Committee, and I trust your Lordships will give the Bill a Second Reading.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I am bound to say that, with regard to the greater part of this Bill, I am entirely in accord. I think a great many of its provisions will be useful amendments of the law. But there is one matter which I should like to refer to for a moment in regard to the 10th section of the Bill. That seems to me to be absolutely inconsistent with the whole policy of the Settled Land Act. By that Act, as your Lordships are no doubt aware, the tenant for life may, acting, as it were, for the person next in remainder, because he is improving the estate for him, sell portions of the estate for the purpose of obtaining money to enable him to carry out improvements. But the policy of allowing a tenant for life to mortgage for such purposes appears to me to raise very serious questions indeed, and I doubt whether so great an alteration should be made except upon a full discussion of the question after the Bill has been referred to Committee. It appears to me there are plenty of purposes for which a tenant for life may improve the estate, and he has power to raise money by sale for that purpose; but this Bill would give additional powers which ought to be very carefully considered before your Lordships agree that the tenant for life should be able, not only to sell part of the estate so that the next in remainder shall come into possession of an improved property, an estate increased in value, but that the next in remainder may possibly find he has come into possession of an estate encumbered by mortgages, which, if he could have been consulted, he would not have agreed to. That, my Lords, seems to me to raise a serious question of principle which your Lordships should look at and consider carefully apart from any question upon mere details; and I should think that the proper time to do so would be when the Bill comes back, if the Bill should come back from the Committee unamended in that respect. It would be then for your Lordships, sitting in Committee of the whole House, to consider that question.

*EARL BEAUCHAMP: My Lords, I should like, as an ignorant and humble layman, to ask the noble and learned Lord for a little information with regard to the 9th clause, Sub-section 3. That clause appears to exempt from the restrictions originally imposed by the Settled Land Act, 1882, two classes of houses; one where a house is usually occupied as a farmhouse, and the other where the site of any house and the pleasure grounds, and park, and lands usually occupied therewith, do not together exceed 100 acres in extent. When that is the case, as I read the Bill, those two classes of houses are capable of being sold, at the will of the tenant for life. If that be the right interpretation, it appears to me this Bill strikes at the root of the restrictions imposed in the Settled Land Act of 1882. There may be great ambiguity in the words "usually occupied as a farmhouse." The tenant for life may be on bad terms with his heir; he may waste the estate, and may cause the mansion house to be occupied as a farmhouse; and that may go on for a long period, for his life may not be a short one. So much for the words "usually occupied as a farmhouse." Then the second category seems to me to be still more objectionable. It is, I think, very insidious, because it provides that this may be done—

"Where the site of any house, and the pleasure grounds, and park, and lands (if any) usually occupied therewith do not together exceed 100 acres in extent."

My Lords, I do not know the exact acreage of the various parks throughout the country; but there, again, it would be open to the tenant for life, as it seems to me, to reduce the size of his park, and then, when that reduction has been made and has existed for a greater or longer period, that is also to be taken out of the category of a principal mansion house within the meaning of the original Act, so as to deal with that portion of the property without consulting the wishes of those entitled in remainder. My Lords, if I am right in my interpretation of this clause, the number of mansion houses which would be left unaffected in regard to the restrictions imposed by the Settled Land Act, would be so small that it would be better to repeal those provisions altogether than to leave them in existence as provisions which are altogether illusory. I may be wrong, of course, in this; but it appears to me there is no such source of danger as there being supposed to exist a protection which is illusory. If my interpretation is correct, this clause, though it may seem thoroughly satisfactory upon paper, yet, when tested by the rapacity which does sometimes exist in the case of a tenant for life, and which must ex hypothesi exist, will really prove very mischievous, and render the protection which is supposed to be given of no value at all. I shall be very glad to hear from the noble and learned Lord that I am mistaken in my interpretation; but if I am not, then I think it would be a far more straightforward course to move at once for the repeal of the restrictions in this respect under the Settled Land Act, rather than to leave laymen under the impression that they enjoy a security which it will be found they really do not enjoy as against a hostile tenant for life.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I think it says very much for the humility of human nature, considering that we are all, or nearly all of us, tenants for life, to find what a deep distrust we seem to have of people in that position. We appear to consider that they are always about, or are willing, to commit some great crime, but I think tenants for life are a better class, on the whole, than my noble Friend Earl Beauchamp may think. What I wish to ask the noble and learned Lord opposite is, whether there are any means of defining what comes under the description of pleasure grounds and park. I have often, myself, seen cases where, if the grass in a man's park is not going on well, he will put it under turnips. Does it cease to be a park then? Viewing the matter in that way, the limitation appears to be one that nobody could rely upon, and, I think, might mislead.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, with reference to the question which has been asked by the noble Earl, I would first state, generally, what the object of this section is. The language of the Settled Land Act is, that "it is not to apply to the principal mansion house (if any) or the settled land." That, obviously, was not intended to cover every house, however small, but was to be applied in the spirit of it to the residence in connection with the land. However small it was, that was the principle of it. It was supposed to apply to cases of an estate of some considerable character or size having such a house upon it. Now, the scheme of this section is, that where in reality it does not come within the spirit of the Settled Land Act, where you have a house occupied with only a small portion of land attached, that then it should not be regarded as a principal mansion house within the meaning of the Act. Of course, it may be considered that the area of 100 acres taken here is too large, and that it ought to be reduced. That is a matter of detail which I will not go into at present; but I will say, in answer to the question of the noble Earl, that I do not think any tenant for life, by altering the character of the holding, and by saying that any portion of the property had been usually occupied in a particular way, could bring himself within the section and so entitles himself to sell. I think, in considering for what purpose that portion of the property has been usually occupied, you would have to look to the period during which, and the purposes for which, the land had been held with the house in the past, and not how it happened to be occupied at the particular moment. With regard to the question of the noble Marquess, I would point out that the provision is not with regard merely to pleasure grounds and parks, but that it is land usually held with the house; that is, throughout. If a portion of what had been a park was turned into something which was not strictly park, yet, if it was part of the land which had been usually held with the house, it would still come within those words, although it had ceased to be park and then filled some other character. The provision is that, notwithstanding the Act of 1882,

"The principal mansion house (if any) on any settled land, and the pleasure grounds and park and lands (if any) usually occupied therewith, shall not be sold, exchanged, or leased by the tenant for life without the consent of the trustees of the settlement or an order of the Court."

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Then, if a man farms the whole of his land, he cannot sell it.

LORD HERSCHELL: In that case, if it exceeded that amount, he could not sell without the leave of the Court. It would come under the restrictions of the Settled Land Act. At present the mansion house can only be sold under the order of the Court. The power of the tenant for life is limited if the lands usually held with the house exceed the 100 acres, as provided, for whatever purposes they might be occupied. That case would come within the scope of the Act and not within the exceptions.

*EARL BEAUCHAMP: Do I understand the noble and learned Lord to say that a tenant for life, having let his park, which is not at all unfrequently the case, for a term of years, as he is entitled to do, the principal mansion house and the whole estate would be then exempted from the restrictions of the Settled Land Act, but little land being actually occupied with the mansion house, so that he might sell the principal mansion house of a very large and ornamental estate without consulting the remainder-man?

LORD HERSCHELL: I do not think he would. It certainly was not intended that he should. However, after what the noble Earl has said, I may say that I shall take care, if possible, to see that that point is made clear.

Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> (according to order).

LORD HERSCHELL: I now move that this Bill be committed to the Standing Committee.

ing Committee for Bills relating to Law, &c.

*EARL BEAUCHAMP: My Lords, this is, I think, a matter which your Lordships ought to consider in Committee of the whole House. Of course, there are technical points to be dealt with; but I would point out that this is a matter which concerns your Lordships as landowners. Is it not a matter in which, before the details are settled, your Lordships should agree upon the principle involved in the clauses of this Bill? I hope your Lordships will send the Bill to a Committee of the whole House, and then it can afterwards, if necessary, be referred to the Standing Committee on Law.

LORD HERSCHELL: Surely that is hardly necessary. Nine-tenths of this Bill refer to technical matters of detail in which there is no question of principle involved, and surely it would be better to consider the Bill in Standing Committee, and then, when it comes back to your Lordships, it will be in the form in which it has been finally settled. The noble Earl himself has already suggested that even if this 9th clause be right in principle, it ought to be altered in form. Surely the measure ought to be put in the best form for the consideration of the House, and then, when it comes back to the Committee of the whole House, it will be for your Lordships to omit any of the clauses or amend them. That seems to be a more reasonable course than to consider it now in Committee of the whole House. Your Lordships will then have a carefully-prepared draft before you.

*EARL BEAUCHAMP: I do not know that I have any right to reply; but, as far as the drafting is concerned, I have that confidence in the noble and learned Lord that I do not know that whatever may be done in this Committee will improve his handiwork.

Bill committed to the Standing Committee for Bills relating to Law, &c.

FOREIGN JURISDICTION (CONSOLIDATION) BILL.—(No. 109.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR: This is merely a Consolidation Bill upon the subject of foreign jurisdiction. As the object of it is merely to consolidate the Acts of Parliament, I anticipate no objection. Under ordinary circumstances, I should ask your Lordships to take this Bill in Committee of the whole House; but as it involves, by reason of the consolidation, some small Amendments of the law, I think it would be better that it should go before the Committee on Law.

House in Committee (on Re-commitment) (according to order); Bills reported without Amendment; and to be read 3* to-morrow.

House adjourned at ten minutes before Six o'clock till to-morrow a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 19th June, 1890.

QUESTIONS.

TYPE-WRITTEN PETITIONS.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the hon. Member for Walsall, (Sir C. Forster), as Chairman of the Committee on Public Petitions, whether his attention has been called to the fact that certain Petitions, the bodies of which are written by a type-writing machine, have been returned to the Members presenting them, with an intimation that, being informal, they would not be submitted to the Committee, and whether the Committee has ever decided the question as to whether type-written Petitions should or should not be considered as regular; and, if not, whether, considering the inexpediency of unnecessarily restricting the right of public petitioning, he will use his influence with the Committee to accord to type-written Petitions the same treatment as to written ones?

*SIR C. FORSTER (Walsall) stated that certain Petitions had been returned to the members who had presented them, under the Standing Order against Petitions "in print or lithograph," the clerk to the Committee being of opinion that the Petitions in question were not written in the sense required by the Orders of the House, and that he could not, therefore, submit them to the Committee. In answer to the further question of his hon. Friend, he had to state that the Committee had determined that these Petitions were not regular, and could not be received, but that it was competent to him to move a modification of the Standing Order in a future Session.

DR. CAMERON: I beg to give notice that next Session I will move to amend the Standing Order to which the hon. Member refers.

CONDEMNED ADMIRALTY MEAT.

DR. CAMERON: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the assurance given by him, on the 5th instant, in relation to the disposal of beef and pork by the Admiralty applies to all beef and pork deemed unfit for issue or re-issue to Her Majesty's ships, seeing that the answer given on the 5th instant specifies in terms only one part of such beef and pork?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): I am glad to have the opportunity of publicly assuring the hon. Gentleman that in referring to "condemned" salt beef or pork I intended it to be understood that all such meat, whether actually unfit for food or not, considered unsuitable for issue or re-issue to Her Majesty's ships, would not be sold by public sale, but would all be delivered, after the chemical treatment I have already described, to contractors for use in the soap-boiling trade.

NAVAL ENGINEERS.

CAPTAIN PRICE (Devonport): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, considering the unsatisfactory position of the whole personnel of the steam branch of the Navy, as evinced by the fact that several engineer officers of high rank have recently left the Service to obtain better salaries in private employ; that great difficulty is experienced in obtaining suitable men as engine-room artificers, and also as stokers, and that dissatisfaction with their pay and position exists throughout the various classes, he will consider the propriety of appointing a Departmental Committee to inquire thoroughly into the position of this section of the personnel of the Navy?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The Admiralty have no difficulty in obtaining suitable men as stokers and engine-room artificers, and only quite recently the 1,700 additional second-class stokers required on account of the increase to the Fleet were raised with great ease. The advantages offered to the stokers are sufficient to attract satisfactory recruits, whilst the pay and position of the engine room artificers have attracted an excellent class of mechanics. As regards the engineer officers, it is certainly true that one or two gentlemen have recently resigned their commissions in order to take appointments with private firms; but this has been, and always will be the case, and is not confined to this branch of the Service, but occurs in other Departments and Services of the State. Under the circumstances, I do not consider that any Departmental inquiry into the position of this branch of the personnel of the Navy is required, for I am confident the more I look into the subject that no difficulty will be experienced in obtaining an ample supply of eligible candidates for the engineering branch of the Navy.

THE CUSTOMS.

MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether any examinations for appointments in the Customs Department have been held for the past three years; and whether any examinations of Customs candidates will again be held; and, if so, will he say when?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): Examinations for Customs boatmen have been held within the last three years, and one examination for out-door officers. With these exceptions there have been no examinations for Customs appointments within the last three years, and I am informed that it will probably not be necessary to hold any for some time to come.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Does the answer of the right hon. Gentleman also refer to the Excise?

MR. JACKSON: No; it only refers to the Customs.

NEW POLICE COURT FOR WANDSWORTH.

MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he proposes to approve the plans for the erection of the new Police Court for Wandsworth on the Lavender Hill site, having regard to the fact that that site is a mile outside of Wandsworth; and whether he is aware that the Chief Magistrate is of opinion that the Lavender Hill site is not in the best position for the business, and that the proposed removal of the site so far from Wandsworth itself, has occasioned great dissatisfaction there?

MR. OCTAVIUS V. MORGAN (Battersea): Will the erection of the new Police Court for the Wandsworth district, at Lavender Hill, near Clapham Junction, be commenced about August, as stated on 21st April last?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): A Departmental Committee, which included Lord Rosebery, Sir E. Henderson, and Sir J. Ingham, reported in 1881 that a new Court ought to be erected as near as possible to Clapham Junction. The Wandsworth District Board of Works more than once, in 1887, strongly urged upon me the desirability of this being done. A new site was accordingly acquired, with the concurrence of the then Chief Magistrate and the Commissioner of Police, at Lavender Hill, which is not more than 400 yards from the Clapham Junction Railway Station. It is doubtful whether this site could now be disposed of except at a loss. It is true that Sir John Bridge has expressed doubts as to the convenience of the new site. The plans are now before me for approval, and in the ordinary course the building will commence early in August. Under all the circumstances I do not think it will be to the public advantage to re-open the question of the site now that matters have progressed so far, and there being such a weight of opinion in favour of the suitability of that particular site.

SCOTCH UNIVERSITY CHAIRS.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the Scottish University Commissioners, who are understood to have already taken much evidence on the question of the changes to be introduced into the conditions attaching to the Chairs in the Faculty of Divinity, propose to present at an early period the Special Report to Her Majesty upon this matter, which they are directed to make by the Universities (Scotland) Act of 1889?

*THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND (MR. M. T. STORMONTH DARLING, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): The Commissioners are fully alive to the expediency of presenting the Special Report upon this matter so soon as they are in a position to do so, but it is impossible for them at present to fix any date, as they are still engaged in hearing evidence.

MASSACRE OF CHRISTIANS IN MACEDONIA.

MR. BRYCE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has now at length received any information regarding the massacre of a large number (in some accounts estimated at 80) of Christian refugees by Mohammedan Arnauts, which was stated a fortnight ago in many Continental and English newspapers to have taken place in the district of Kossovo, in North West Macedonia, and also regarding the conduct of the Turkish Local Authorities, who are reported in some of these accounts to have connived at the slaughter of the refugees.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (SIR J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): No confirmation has yet been received of the report, which appears to have originated at Munich, but inquiry will be made as to whether there is any foundation for it. I may be permitted to take this opportunity of stating, with reference to a question of the hon. Member, in regard to certain

"Accounts which had appeared in the newspapers of horrible cruelties stated to have been perpetrated upon Armenian Christians in the district of Khanoz, between Bitlis and Erzeroum," that Her Majesty's Consul has reported that the inquiries which he has made lead him to believe that there was no loss of life during the attack which was made in the valley of Alashgerd upon certain labourers on their return from Russian territory, and that over £100 of the money carried away by the Kurds has been recovered, and four of the offenders are in custody. The persons attacked appear to have been Nestorians, and the attack to have taken place between Bayazaid and the Russian frontier.

MR. BRYCE: Has the right hon. Gentleman obtained the information which was promised 10 days ago with reference to a reported massacre in Macedonia? It is alleged that this outrage was perpetrated with a view of exacting money.

*SIR J. FERGUSON: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman did not make it plain what his purpose was. I will make further inquiry.

BRIXHAM HARBOUR.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has received a Memorial from the Commissioners of the Brixham Harbour and Market asking for a Provisional Order for the purpose of defining the manner in which the market tolls are to be dealt with, and generally to amend the Law as to the funds arising from the market; and whether the Board of Trade has any power to act as prayed in such Memorial?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (SIR M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I have received the Memorial referred to by the hon. Member, but the Board of Trade have no power to deal with the matter.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the state of the Brixham Market funds; whether the Local Government Board can, under Section 303 of "The Public Health Act, 1875," by Provisional Order, amend the Local Act, 1 Vic. c. 75; and whether any inquiry has been made into the case of Brixham Market by the Royal Commission on Market Rights and Tolls; and, if not, whether he will communicate to the Royal Commission the Memorial presented to the Board of Trade by the Commissioners of the Harbour and Market of Brixham?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The Local Government Board receive from the Brixham Market Commissioners an annual Return of the receipts and expenditure of the undertaking, for the purpose of the Local Taxation Returns, which are presented to Parliament. My attention has not otherwise been drawn to the state of the funds of the market. The Board would be empowered by the Public Health Act to alter the Local Act on the application of the Sanitary Authority of the district, if, as I believe is the case, the Act does not confer powers or privileges on any persons for their own pecuniary benefit. I understand that there has been no local inquiry by the Royal Commission on Market Rights and Tolls with reference to the market in question. I have no information as to the Memorial which has been presented to the Board of Trade by the Market Commissioners, but I will direct the attention of that Department to the suggestion contained in the question of the hon. Member.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: The President of the Board of Trade says that he has no power. Assuming that no power exists, either in the Board of Trade or the Local Government Board, will the President of the Board of Trade forward the Memorial he has received to the Royal Commission?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I shall be quite ready to do so.

THE METROPOLITAN POLICE.

MR. BURDETT-COUTTS (Westminster): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Government, taking into consideration the onerous and wearing nature of the Metropolitan Police, and the opinion of experienced authorities that 25 years' performance of such duties generally unfits a man for any other employment, will introduce a provision into the Police Bill entitling every Metropolitan police officer and constable, after 25 years' "approved service," to a pension equal to two-thirds of his pay, without condition of age or medical certificate?

MR. MATTHEWS: The Government have embodied in the Police Superannuation Bill now before the House the proposals which, after careful consideration, they recommend the House to adopt. My hon. Friend asks me whether the Government will alter those proposals; but I think he must feel that it would be unusual and inconvenient to anticipate the discussion which must take place in Committee on the Bill, when the Government will be prepared to state the reasons which have actuated them, and to discuss any Amendments that my hon. Friend may think it right to propose. I may point out that the scale of the Government Bill is identical with that which was recommended by the Select Committee of 1877, proposed in the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, and adopted in the City Police Bill of last year.

MR. BURDETT-COUTTS: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is aware that the pay of the City Police is considerably higher than the pay of the Metropolitan Police? I desire to give notice that in Committee upon this Bill I will move an Amendment embodying the terms contained in my question.

MR. MATTHEWS: I am afraid that I cannot reply to the question in detail, without notice. I will, however, make full inquiry into the question if the hon. Member will put down another question.

GAS AND WATER UNDERTAKINGS.

MR. OCTAVIUS V. MORGAN: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether Local Authorities have power to transfer gas or water undertakings, acquired by them by Provisional Order or Act of Parliament, without statutory powers; and, if not, whether the provisions the Board of Trade have inserted in Electric Lighting Orders now before the House, enabling Local Authorities to transfer undertakings to be authorised by those Orders, are ultra vires!

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I am not aware that Local Authorities have any power to transfer gas or water undertakings acquired by Provisional Order or Act of Parliament without statutory authority; but provisions have been inserted, in accordance with the powers of the general Acts, in the Electric Lighting Orders, granted this Session, authorising Local Authorities to transfer their powers and liabilities to any company or person with the consent of, and upon terms to be approved by, the Board of Trade. I am advised that such provisions are not ultra vires.

"SHADOWING" POSTMEN.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been called to a paragraph in the Evening News and Post, in which it is stated that, while two postmen were walking home on Friday night last, one of them was seized by the throat by an overseer of the Eastern District Post Office, with the object of turning down the man's collar in order to get his number; whether he is aware that the man assaulted was suspected of attending the Postmen's Union meetings, and that this overseer had been shadowing him all the evening in order to report him for punishment; and whether the Post Office Authorities have power to engage overseers on such work?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, University of Cambridge): So far as I have been able to ascertain, the statement in the paragraph to which the hon. Member refers is absolutely without foundation. I am not aware that any one was assaulted, or that any one, to use the hon. Member's words, was shadowed, and think it in the highest degree improbable.

BURIALS IN WALES.

MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has received a letter from the Rev. Evan Davies, Wesleyan minister, of Conway, with reference to the burial of William Williams in the churchyard of Gyffon parish, directly contradicting the information supplied by the Rev. Thomas Ellis, rector of the parish, to the Home Secretary, that he (the rector) had received no notice of burial such as the Act of 1880 required when the relatives wish to dispense with the Church Service, and enclosing a copy of the notice of burial actually served on the rector; whether it is in such letter alleged, contrary to the statement of the rector, that he (Rev. Evan Davies), and not the rector, was authorised by the widow of the deceased to conduct the burial service; and whether, in view of the grave scandal occasioned in the neighbourhood by the incident above referred to, he will direct an inquiry to be made into all the circumstances of the case?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; I have received such a letter. When I stated, in answer to a former question, that "the rector had received no notice of burial under the Act of 1880," I appear to have misunderstood the words used in the rector's letter to me, which were that he had received no intimation that there existed a desire to bury the deceased under that Act. It now appears that the rector did receive such notice from Mr. Davies, but the deceased, being a non-parishioner, the Act of 1880 did not apply, and the notice was, therefore, in the rector's opinion, null and void. The rector, to whom I have referred Mr. Davies' letter, emphatically re-affirms that he was distinctly authorised by various relatives, but, not, as I understand, by the widow, to conduct the service; and it was to meet their earnest wishes that he finally consented to conduct the service according to the rites of the Church of England. The facts in my possession do not show that any breach of the law has been committed. There is, accordingly, no occasion for any further interference on my part.

MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: As a matter of law, is it competent for a clergyman to make the interment of any person, whether a parishioner or not, in the parish churchyard conditional upon his friends abandoning their legal rights under the Burials Act of 1880?

MR. MATTHEWS: I think it would be safer to refer, upon a question of law, to the Attorney General.

LIABILITY OF COUNTY COUNCILS.

MR. RANKIN (Herefordshire, Leominster): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he intends to introduce any legislation this Session to clear up the existing doubt as to the liability of County Councils to pay for the repair of the side-walks of roads and foot pavements of streets when such roads and streets are accepted as main roads?

*MR. RITCHIE: My hon. Friend is, no doubt, aware of the decision of the Queen's Bench Division on the question as to the repair of footways of streets when such streets are main roads. I have no information as to whether it is the intention to appeal against the judgment in that case; but however that may be, I cannot hold out any expectation that the Government will propose legislation on the question during the present Session.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that only two parts out of six of the Returns relating to Friendly Societies, with abstracts of the quinquennial Returns, have been published, though the Returns relate to the year 1886 and previous years; whether he can inform the House when the other four parts, C, D, E, and F, of Part II., will be issued to Members of this House; and whether, considering the time that has elapsed, he will consent to lay upon the Table of this House a complete abstract of those Returns, with such particulars as to the number of Societies, number of members, amount of funds, and similar information, at an early date?

A LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. MAXWELL, Wigton): The two parts, A and B, already issued, contain the information relating to the great affiliated Orders, such as the Manchester Unity and the Foresters, representing about two-thirds of the whole of the Branch Returns. Of the forthcoming parts, I am informed that C is ready for press; D is already in manuscript; E is in hand, and I therefore think that the proposal of the hon. Member would not really attain his object. I should say that, although the Returns relate to the year 1886, many of them are not received until much later.

IRELAND—NAVIGATION OF THE RIVER FERGUS.

MR. COX (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, whether certain communications addressed to the Prime Minister by Clare Castle Harbour Trustees, relating to the Navigation of the River Fergus, have been re-directed to him; and, if so, what steps he proposes to take in order to meet the request of the Trustees?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The papers referred to were forwarded to me. I am unable to propose any steps in the matter, which is one not for the Irish Government but for the Treasury, who appear to have informed the Trustees that they are unable to provide the desired grant.

OPEN-AIR PREACHING AT ARKLOW.

MR. DE COBAIN (Belfast, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been called to the condition of things in the County Wicklow; that a Mr. Hoffe and Mr. Harper, together with many of the respectable residents of the town of Arklow, in their attempt at holding a religious service on the commons some quarter of a mile from the town were molested by a mob; that a District Inspector of the Royal Irish Constabulary and a constable, instead of securing for these gentlemen the right of holding the service, took their names, and in no way interfered with the action of the mob; that subsequently the Rev. Mr. Hallows was hooted through the town, and some Protestant ladies were similarly treated; and would he take steps to secure for Her Majesty's subjects in that part of Ireland the free exercise of their privilege as citizens when they were infringing no laws, and instruct the officers and men of the Royal Irish Constabulary in their duty to afford protection to all citizens in the exercise of their undoubted civil and religious rights?

MR. W. CORBET (Wicklow, E.): May I ask if the attention of the right hon. Gentleman has been called to this disturbance, as reported in the Times of the 16th instant, where three Protestant clergymen persisted, as alleged, in holding open-air meetings for preaching to Catholics in a district where the Catholics outnumbered the Protestants by three to one; is he aware that a few years ago similar attempts were made to proselitise the Catholic inhabitants, which gave much offence to them and to their clergy; has he seen a statement published in the papers, to the effect that many of the most respectable Protestant inhabitants disapprove of the action taken by their clergy in this matter, and also that the Resident Magistrate and Police Authorities have advised them to desist from their action; and will he consider if any, and what, further steps can be taken in the interests of law and order to protect the Catholic people from what they regard as insulting to their religious convictions?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I have also to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether his attention has been called to a report of proceedings at Arklow on Sunday last, contained in the Daily Express of Monday; whether the statements contained in that report, namely, that the Episcopalian and Methodist ministers engaged in open-air preaching were stoned and assaulted by a hostile crowd, are true; and whether, so long as these services are conducted so as not to cause obstruction, he will protect these ministers in the exercise of a lawful right?

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Have Catholic priests applied for police protection to hold open-air services on the Shankhill Road and Sandy Row, Belfast; and so long as such services are conducted so as not to cause obstruction, will he protect these ministers of religion in the exercise of a lawful right?

MR. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.) also put a question on the same subject.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: In answer to the question of the hon. Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy), I have to say that I have not received a Report, and therefore cannot give a detailed answer. In answer to my hon. Friends behind me, I have to say that some very discreditable scenes of violence directed against three Protestant clergymen at Arklow, and against one or two members of their congregation, took place on the morning and evening of last Sunday. Every protection will be given to these persons so long as they keep within the law.

ARMAGH NATIONAL SCHOOLS.

MR. JORDAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, since the local manager, on 14th April last, refused admission to Armagh National School, County Clare, to Michael O'Brien's children "for want of room," five other children, two of them being a policeman's, have since been admitted; and whether, under such circumstances, he will now intimate, through the proper quarter, the propriety of settling this matter by admitting O'Brien's children to either Armagh or Mullagh School?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Commissioners of National Education report that they have no knowledge of the particular circumstance mentioned in the first paragraph, but they refer to the explanatory letter already received from the manager of the school in regard to the matter. He states that the accommodation in the Armagh and Mullagh Schools is quite insufficient even for the number of children usually attending them; that he has, therefore, been obliged to restrict the admission of new pupils, but that, in doing so, he takes care not to deprive anyone of the advantages of education, and that he never refuses anyone who is not within a convenient distance of another school. As already stated, O'Brien's children are within a convenient distance of Coore School, which, as a matter of fact, they had been regularly attending until an attempt was made to boycott the school, in furtherance of which O'Brien withdrew his children. The manager does not consider that, in these circumstances, he would be justified in still further inconveniencing the teachers and pupils of the two other schools mentioned by admitting O'Brien's children. The manager's action has the full approval of the Commissioners.

MEDICAL ATTENDANCE IN IRELAND.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the statement in the Kerry Weekly Reporter of 7th instant, that, on 22nd May, 1890, at Tralee, a man named John Everett obtained a "red ticket" directing Dr. John R. Hayes, the local dispensary doctor, to visit his son, Charles Everett, who was suddenly taken ill that day; that the ticket was duly left at the doctor's residence, who, although Everett called three times, failed to attend the sick child; and that the child died, without any medical attendance, at 2 o'clock next morning; whether a Coroner's Order was made to hold an inquest, and summonses were at once issued by the police for that purpose; whether the inquest was held; and if, not, why not; whether it is true, as stated, that the Coroner, Major Spring, acting on his own authority, failed to hold the inquest, after directing the summonses to be issued; what return was made as to the cause of death, and whether any explanation has been offered by Doctor Hayes?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed by the police that the facts are as stated in the question. The failure of the doctor to attend on the sick child is certainly a matter requiring investigation, and I shall ask the Local Government Board to investigate it. The return of the cause of death was "convulsions," and I understand that the grounds upon which the Coroner decided not to hold the inquest, for which he had originally issued his precept, were that there was no suspicion of foul play.

DR. TANNER: Am I to understand that the right hon. Gentleman proposes to institute an inquiry into the conduct of this medical officer, who happens to be a Nationalist, when he has refused a similar investigation into the conduct of a medical officer who happens to be a supporter of the Government?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the hon. Member can show that there is any analogy between the two cases, of course, a similar course would be taken.

MITCHELSTOWN AND FERMOY RAILWAY.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Mitchelstown and Fermoy Railway Company, which was in existence at the time of the passing of the Public Works Loans (Tramways) (Ireland) Act, having obtained an order in Council in June, 1885, complied in every particular with the provisions of the said Act, and was entitled to the benefit of the same; whether he is aware that it has in perpetuity a 5 per cent. baronial guarantee, and that, on the faith of the aforesaid, it entered into a contract, in June, 1888, for the construction of its line, one of the conditions of the contract being that it was to obtain a loan from the Board of Works; and whether, under the circumstances, the Treasury will instruct the Board of Works to make the advance applied for by the Mitchelstown and Fermoy Railway Company?

*MR. JACKSON: The Mitchelstown and Fermoy Railway Company no doubt fulfilled the conditions required by the Public Works Loans (Tramways) (Ireland) Act, 1886, to be satisfied before a loan can be granted, but it was not entitled to the loan as a matter of right. I have no knowledge as to whether one of the conditions of the contract was to be a loan from the Board of Works; but I can hardly conceive that anyone would impose such a condition, or any contractor accept such a contract, without first ascertaining whether a loan could be obtained. As I have already stated, in answer to previous questions, the Treasury, in the exercise of its discretion, decided not to make any further loans under that Act.

THE IRISH POLICE AND EVICTIONS.

MR. PETER M'DONALD (Sligo, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, at the eviction of a tailor, named John Battle, from a cabin in Ardnaree, a suburb of Ballina, by Sir Charles Knox Gore, there were drafted into the town from outlying stations detachments of police to aid those stationed in the two police barracks in the town; whether the police so drafted in are to be paid an allowance of 3s. 6d. per day, in addition to their ordinary pay, which shall be charged on the ratepayers of the district; whether, in consequence of the roof of the cabin having partially fallen in, the tenant had already left the place, or was preparing to do so; and whether, under the circumstances, this large police force was required?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Police were employed for the protection of the officers who were executing the law, and they were paid 1s. or 1s. 6d. each in addition to their ordinary pay. None of it will be chargeable on the ratepayers of the district. The roof of John Battle's house had not fallen in, and the tenant had not left the place.

THE DISTURBANCES AT CASHEL AND TIPPERARY.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he proposes to take any action with reference to the following accusations made in the unanimous Report of the Town Commissioners of Cashel, and declared by the Commissioners, after investigation, to be established:—

"That, at about 4.30 p.m. on Tuesday the 27th ultimo, the police at Cashel charged into private houses, and furiously attacked persons who had not been out of doors:

That they next broke into the premises of a Mr. Cahill, and made a violent attack upon two young men named Connors and Maher:

That they next attacked the house of Mr. Michael Noonan, a respectable victualler, breaking open his door, which was locked, and that on this occasion a constable stationed at Cashel maltreated Mr. Noonan's son:

That a little boy of 10, named O'Meara, was knocked down by a constable, who kicked him in the face while he was down:

That two town sergeants in uniform were hustled and assaulted by policemen, and that one of them, Town Sergeant Patrick Corcoran, was violently attacked in front of the house of Dr. Coyle, and under his observation:

That two flags, displayed on a private house on the premises of the Corporation, were forcibly removed by the police:

That a constable, named O'Connor, threatened to shoot a lad, named Heney, in his own house at the lower gate:

That Constable Thomas Ryan attacked an Army pensioner, named Bryan, who was standing alone and quietly in the street, and struck him so violently on the head that he broke the baton, whereupon another constable asked him did he 'wish for more;':"

and that a boy, named Horley, aged 14, who carried a bannerette in a procession of schoolboys, had the bannerette taken from him, and was knocked down, arrested, and taken to the lock-up, and when his brother said, "Don't tear his coat," he also was arrested, and when his mother went to the station to inquire for him she was taken into custody?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: When will the right hon. Gentleman be able to give the information which he promised the other day?

DR. TANNER: Can the right hon. Gentleman give the name of any reliable medical man who visited any of the persons who are alleged to have been ill-treated?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know that I can add anything to the answer I gave to a question practically identical in its terms put to me by the hon. Member for Cork a day or two ago. I suppose that some of the alleged incidents will form the subject of judicial inquiry.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Have there been any cases of persons received into the hospitals or infirmaries of Cashel or Tipperary on account of injuries sustained on the occasion referred to?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: In answer to the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell), I can only say that there is nothing which I have heard to induce me to depart from my original opinion I previously expressed, that no serious injuries at all were inflicted.

MR. SEXTON: As the charges include breaking into private houses and assaults on private persons, which have now been the subject of inquiry by the Local Commissioners, I wish to know what initiative the right hon. Gentleman will take to ascertain the facts of the case if the charges are proved to be true?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have made a thorough investigation, and nothing has come to my knowledge which would suggest that I should depart from the course which I have laid down. The inquiry of the Town Commissioners did not include an inquiry into the conduct of the police.

MR. SEXTON: There are some cases which were not the subject of judicial inquiry, and I wish to ask whether the Town Commissioners of Cashel have not stated that they would be prepared to submit affidavits to the Executive, and whether, if such affidavits are submitted, the right hon. Gentleman will, at least, order a Departmental Inquiry?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Any documents, whether affidavits or not, will receive full consideration. Until I see them, I cannot promise to found any action upon them.

MR. T. M. HEALY: How is it that an inquiry is promised to the hon. Member for South Tyrone in reference to the conduct of a medical officer, while the public are refused an inquiry into the action of the police?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is no analogy between the two cases. The question brought forward by the hon. Member for South Tyrone was as to the alleged misconduct of an official of the Local Government Board.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is the House to understand that the Government will inquire into the action of a doctor who had received a red ticket, and will not inquire into the action of policemen who has broken the heads of Her Majesty's subjects.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member seems to think that no inquiry has been made; of course I have made an inquiry.

MR. SEXTON: The question which I ask and press is, whether an inquiry will be ordered if the Board to which I have referred submits documents?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot be expected to answer hypothetical questions of that character. Any documents submitted will receive attention, but I cannot promise that an inquiry will be held.

MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): Have not the Police Authorities conveyed to the right hon. Gentleman the fact that the red ticket which has been alluded to was not marked "urgent," and that it was not usual for a dispensary doctor to go out after dispensary hours in response to tickets not marked "urgent," and if these facts have been given by the police, why does the right hon. Gentleman insist on any inquiry?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: This question would have been more properly asked in relation to the previous question on the Paper; but, of course, if the statements which the hon. Gentleman makes are accurate, that will come out when the inquiry is instituted.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I wish to know whether the right hon. Gentleman intends to convey to the House that no persons were injured by the charge of the police at Cashel; from whom did the right hon. Gentleman derive his information on this matter, and does he know that some people who were injured declined to report their injuries for fear of prosecution? I also wish to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman will inquire from the various chemists and apothecaries in Cashel as to the number of people treated by them for injuries.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My answer was given on the best investigation I could make. No cases of injury have been treated in the hospitals or infirmaries of the district.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: There is no hospital in Cashel, and I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman will inquire of the apothecary near the Post Office whether he did not treat people for injuries received from the police batons? I want to know the character of the men he treated, and whether they were all teetotallers.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not see the relevancy of the last observation of the hon. Member. The question of the hon. Member for South Tyrone was meant to elicit the fact that serious injuries, as far as could be discovered, had not been inflicted. I take it that injuries which are treated by an apothecary are not serious injuries.

MR. T. M. HEALY: There is no infirmary at Cashel except the poor house.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: As it is important to know what the right hon. Gentleman deems to be serious injuries, may I ask whether eight or ten wounds inflicted on the head of a person by a constable while the person was held by other constables can be called a serious injury?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It would depend on the nature of the injuries.

MR. T. M. HEALY: What infirmary is there at Cashel?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I coupled Cashel with Tipperary, as they are habitually coupled in Debate on this subject.

MR. SHEEHY: What infirmary is there at Tipperary?

[No answer was given.]

ACTIONS AGAINST THE IRISH CONSTABULARY.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is the practice of the Government in any cases to pay the costs of the defence in actions brought against the Irish Constabulary for acts done in their capacity of constables; and, if so, in what class of cases; whether it is the practice of the Government, in cases in which damages are obtained against members of the Irish Constabulary for acts done in their capacity of constables, to defray such damages out of the public funds; and if payment is ever made out of public funds in respect of either costs or damages, under what head in the Estimates is the money voted? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in one of these cases a verdict for £100 damages has been given against the police, and is it proposed in that case that the Government shall pay the damages and costs?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The rule as to the payment of the legal expenses of constables, against whom proceedings have been taken for acts done by them in the execution of their duty, is the same in the Royal Irish Constabulary, the London Metropolitan Police, and in the Dublin Metropolitan Police. The invariable practice is for the constable, in the first instance, to defend himself; and when the proceedings have terminated, the propriety of indemnifying him is considered and decided by Government. If it be found to be a case for indemnifying the constable, the costs of the defence are charged to the Law Charges Vote, sub-head "Defence of Officials," and the damages are charged against the Constabulary Vote, sub-head "Incidental Expenses."

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): Are we to understand that the action of a constable in the discharge of his duty covers a case in which he has exceeded the limits of his duty; and are we to understand that two or three Law Officers of the Crown, as in the case tried in Dublin yesterday, are retained to defend the constabulary at the cost of the Crown and not of the accused person?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That is a question which I must leave to my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland to answer. What I referred to was an act done by a constable in the execution of his duty. The question whether he exceeded his duty must be decided by the Court.

MR. T. M. HEALY: May I ask the Attorney General whether, in such a case, the expenses of the Law Officers of the Crown in defending a constable would be charged upon the taxpayers if it is found that he acted illegally?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): I know nothing of the case except from what I have seen in the Public Press. I think the question of the hon. and learned Member had better be put upon the Paper.

POLICE "SHADOWING" IN IRELAND.

MR. CLANCY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state the number of constables employed for the last six months, and now employed in Ireland, in the operation known as shadowing, and the cost to the State in pay, allowances, and car hire of those constables?

MR. DILLON: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the question, I wish to supplement it by another of which I have given him private notice. Is it true, as stated in the Irish Times this morning, that the Executive Government in Ireland have ordered the police to put a stop to this system of shadowing?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; there is no truth in that statement. In regard to the question on the Paper, the Constabulary Authorities report that it is not the practice to employ constables specially on the duty in question. The number discharging this duty on any particular day would depend upon the particular circumstances of that day. There is no record of the additional cost involved by this duty; but it consists, for the most part, of car hire, which is believed to amount to no considerable sum, as police transport cars are, when possible, made available.

MR. SEXTON: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the practice of shadowing at Dungarvan Fair has been given up in consequence of the issue of a circular by the Inspector General of Constabulary? Has such a circular been issued?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; there is not a word of truth in the report.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that, in the case of Mr. Thomas Barry and others who have been lately shadowed, they were followed all over Ireland by the same constables?

[No answer was given.]

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will lay upon the Table of the House, or place in the Library, a copy of the instructions under which Commissioners of Police in Ireland act in directing persons to be shadowed by constables in the mode recently adopted; whether he has seen copies of the instantaneous photographs, taken on Whit Monday, in three different parts of the town of Tipperary, by the hon. Member for North Monaghan, showing the Rev. Father Humphries shadowed by two constables, namely, John Ahern and Jeremiah Wallace, as he was going about his pastoral duties; whether he is aware of any precedent in English police procedure for such treatment of any of Her Majesty's subjects, unless when pursued on account of definite crimes for which they were about to be brought to trial; and whether he will re-consider his sanction of a practice which risks the infliction of grave inconvenience?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not aware that any written general instructions of the formal kind to which the hon. Gentleman alludes have been issued on the subject since the present Government came into Office; those issued previously are of a confidential character. I have not had the pleasure of seeing the photographs in question. In answer to paragraph (3) the shadowing is in connection with a definite class of offences against the law, and I have not the least doubt that if any English town were in the condition of Tipperary measures of at least equal severity would be adopted.

MR. PICTON: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will accept copies of these photographs?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes; I shall feel very much obliged if the hon. Gentleman will give me copies of them.

MR. DILLON: Have any instructions in regard to this system of shadowing been issued since the right hon. Gentleman came into Office? It is different from anything of the kind that existed under the right hon. Gentleman's predecessors. The House is entitled to know whether this system of shadowing has been introduced on the authority of particular Magistrates or constables, or whether fresh instructions have been issued.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not admit the correctness of the assertion that there is a great variation between the present and the previous system. As far as I am aware, no instructions of a formal kind have been issued by the Government in Dublin, and of course I am in constant communication with the officials.

MR. DILLON: I must press for a distinct answer. The right hon. Gentleman stated in the House the other day that this system of shadowing was done under his authority. I can state of my own knowledge that the system of shadowing now pursued is something absolutely different from anything which ever took place in the country before. Are we to understand that this system of shadowing was initiated without an order of the Executive, and on the responsibility of individual Magistrates or policemen?

EARL COMPTON (York, W.R., Barnsley): Are we to understand that during the years 1880-82 this practice existed? I was in Ireland at the time, and saw nothing of it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The time to which the noble Lord refers was when Lord Cowper was Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and I do not know that the system to which I allude was in operation before the Lord Lieutenancy of Lord Spencer. On the 19th of June, 1882, Mr. Healy asked the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division (Sir G. Trevelyan), then Chief Secretary, whether his attention had been called to a statement in a Belfast newspaper to the effect that Inspectors of police had watched a local contractor, and the right hon. Gentleman replied, "It is quite true that the police have been carefully watching persons, but I decline to say on what ground."

MR. T. M. HEALY: I may explain to the House that this man was suspected of being the murderer of Lord Frederick Cavendish. It turned out that he was unjustly suspected; but he was persecuted by that abominable system for over 12 months.

MR. DILLON: I state of my own knowledge that the system of shadowing now pursued was never in force before. The question and answer which the right hon. Gentleman has just read had no reference to a system of shadowing similar to that which is now adopted. It simply amounted to watching.

*MR. SPEAKER: It is impossible to raise an argument now as to what happened in 1882.

MR. DILLON: The right hon. Gentleman mentioned it.

*MR. SPEAKER: Only in answer to a question by the noble Lord the Member for the Barnsley Division (Earl Compton).

MR. DILLON: The noble Lord did not mention that year.

CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that if the same state of things existed in England that exists in Tipperary the same method of shadowing would be observed. Are we to understand that if in the town of Buckingham a state of things existed similar to that which exists in Tipperary the system of shadowing by the police would be enforced at Buckingham?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member must know either very little of Buckingham or very little of Tipperary.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): Questions of this kind must occupy a great deal of the time of the House unless the First Lord of the Treasury will consent to take the Irish Police Vote at some very early date. Will the right hon. Gentleman do that?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): If the right hon. Gentleman will repeat the question on another day, I will endeavour to answer it.

MR. J. MORLEY: I will repeat the question to-morrow.

CHARGE AGAINST POLICE SERGEANT LORD.

MR. P. J. O'BRIEN (Tipperary, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in the Report furnished to him in the case of charges of forgery and fraud made by John Maher, of Lorrha, against Sergeant Lord, of that station, the fact is stated that some time after Maher had made his complaint to the Inspector General of Constabulary, he was waited on by Mr. Doolan, J.P., with an offer of the money that Lord had previously refused to pay him; and whether, in view of this presumptive evidence that the amount claimed was due, and that Sergeant Lord was guilty of fraud on the Police Authorities by returning as a voucher a forged receipt for the money that had not been paid, the Government will direct the Attorney General to consider the case with a view to the vindication of justice?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Local Constabulary officer reports that he has not ascertained that the Magistrate mentioned intervened at any time as alleged, nor has the further inquiry instituted resulted in any discovery that the Sergeant had acted improperly in the case. The Inspector General is still pursuing the inquiry.

MR. THOMAS BARRY.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the fact that civil proceedings have been taken by Mr. Thomas Barry, P.L.G., against District Inspector Ball, R.I.C., Fermoy, for alleged assault, he will cause instructions to be issued to the Constabulary Authorities in Ireland not to proceed with the charge against Mr. Barry under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act arising out of the proceedings for which the civil action has been brought by him, until the said action has been brought to a trial?

DR. TANNER: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether a warrant has been issued for the arrest of Mr. Barry, P.L.G., at the instance of a policeman named Drought, against whom Mr. Barry had previously instituted legal proceedings?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am unable at present to answer the question of the hon. Member for Mid Cork (Dr. Tanner), and, in regard to the other question, it would be a dangerous precedent to lay it down that a prosecution could be deferred by the person prosecuted bringing an action. There seems no ground for fearing that the prosecution will prejudice the civil action.

MR. FLYNN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that Mr. Barry's house was broken into the night before last and Mr. Barry made prisoner? As the case has been adjourned owing to some legal technicality, will he give instructions that the civil action shall take precedence of any other proceedings?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have received no intimation of the fact mentioned by the hon. Member, and I am unable, in the present state of my knowledge of the circumstances, to lay down a general principle.

DR. TANNER: Is it not the fact that this member of the Royal Irish Constabulary has already been charged with participating in a savage assault in which a poor woman was killed, and will the right hon. Gentleman remove him from Fermoy where his action is occasioning much disturbance?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no information that would enable me to reply to the hon. Gentleman.

MR. E. HARRINGTON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that it is the practice of the police when charged with an offence to serve summonses by way of retaliation. Was not that so in the case of Withams and Fleming?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That is not a question arising out of the answer.

MR. E. HARRINGTON: I thought I was giving point to the matter by referring to a particular instance. In this case, was it not within the knowledge of the police that Mr. Barry was about to bring a civil action, had he not already taken preliminary steps, and have not the subsequent proceedings of the police been taken by way of retaliation?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no information to lead me to suppose that that was the case. My impression is the other way.

THE CLANRICARDE TENANTRY.

MR. SHEEHY (Galway, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Head Constable Judge and the police in Portumna have been going amongst the Clanricarde tenantry with a list of the tenants who they say paid their rents; who supplied this list to Head Constable Judge; and by whose orders this constable and the police under him are doing this duty of bailiff for Lord Clanricarde?

Mr. Flynn

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have received no information that will enable me to answer the question. Inquiry is being made.

MR. SHEEHY: I will repeat the question to-morrow.

CHARGE AGAINST THE IRISH POLICE.

MR. ROCHE (Galway, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the case of two constables of the Irish Constabulary who were convicted before County Court Judge Henn, at Gort, on the 13th inst., on a charge of the false arrest and imprisonment of two men, named John Morressey and Martin Fahy, at Portumna, and ordered to pay damages and costs, including the fees of counsel; whether it was by the instructions of the Crown that Mr. Blake, the Crown Prosecutor, defended the police; is it the intention of the Crown to pay the cost of the trial, and also the damages awarded against the police; and whether any action will be taken by the Police Authorities against the constables for their conduct in this matter?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The reply to the inquiry in the first paragraph is in the affirmative; to that in the second paragraph in the negative. Pending the result of an appeal, I am not in a position to make a further statement.

DR. TANNER: Am I to understand that the legal expenses will only be paid in the event of the men being convicted?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir. The hon. Gentleman must not understand anything of the kind.

THE POLICE AT NEW TIPPERARY.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is a fact that, on the 11th instant, during the night, the police burnt down a green flag which was on a flag-staff at New Tipperary; whether it was replaced, on the night of the 15th, by a flag, which was seized and carried off on the 16th; what authority have the police for taking what does not belong to them; is it legal for the police to do so; and will he inquire into the circumstances of the seizures with the view of preventing their recurrence?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that it is the case that the police removed the pole and flag on each of the days mentioned, but it is not the case the poles were erected at New Tipperary. They were in Henry Street, Old Tipperary. The police removed the pole and flag because it was an obstruction. When it was replaced on the night of the 14th, they warned the people living in the vicinity that it should be removed. The police took it with them because nobody claimed it, and it could not be left lying on the street. The police acted legally in the discharge of their duty.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): Can the hon. Gentleman say whether some delay has been caused because the Chief Registrar devoted part of his Report to criticisms of the proceedings of the Select Committee last year?

SIR H. MAXWELL: No, Sir. I think those criticisms were necessary.

PRISON WARDERS' UNIFORMS.

MR. O'KEEFE (Limerick, City): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he has received complaints from warders of Irish gaols that they have been subjected to annoyance from the fact of being compelled to wear official prison uniform in public?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: In one instance only does such a complaint appear to have been received by the Irish Government.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, E.): As the system has been instituted only by the régime of the right hon. Gentleman, will he, as head of the Prisons Board, give directions for the discontinuance of it, and allow the warders to wear ordinary clothes when away on their holidays?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have nothing to add to my answer.

DR. KENNY (Cork, S.): Might I ask the Home Secretary what is the custom in England. Are the prison officials compelled to wear their uniforms when not on duty?

MR. MATTHEWS: I answered that question the other day. I said that the warders of convict prisoners were under such a rule.

GUNS FOR THE MAURITIUS.

MR. OCTAVIUS V. MORGAN (Battersea): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is the case that the fortifications in Mauritius recently completed are still without the promised big guns, without which the fortifications are ineffective; and, if so, when the necessary guns will be ready to be mounted?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I am sorry that it has not yet been possible to issue these guns. The guns now coming in are being issued according to the relative importance of the places to be defended.

EVICTIIONS ON THE OLPHERT ESTATE.

MR. DALTON (Donegal, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state the total number of families to be evicted during the coming week on the Olphert estate; whether he has seen the statement that Mr. Olphert boasted that by November next the Falcarragh district shall be laid waste, and that not a tenant shall hold a foot of his soil; whether fresh proceedings have been taken which, if persisted in, will have the effect of bringing the number of families rendered homeless in the Falcarragh district up to the appalling total of 600; and whether, in view of the desolation which must result from this, and in view of the fact that the Government have dropped the Land Bill, which contained a provision for the relief of congested districts, he can see his way to adopting a similar course to that taken by the President of the Board of Trade when Chief Secretary, in the case of the Clanricarde tenantry, or will he take any steps whatever to relieve the destitution of the district?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand there are 43 evictions pending on the Olphert estate for next week, in consequence of the continued operation of the Plan of Campaign. I have not seen the statement attributed to Mr. Olphert, that he boasted that by November next the Falcarragh district should be laid waste, nor do I believe it to be true that he made it. As a matter of fact, he has already settled with a number of his tenants. I understand that proceedings are pending which will bring up the total number of families whose position is imperilled by the Plan of Campaign to 458. It is not a fact that the Purchase of Land Bill has been dropped.

THE WORKMEN OF THE HOUSE.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether it is intended at the end of the present contract to cause the staff employed in general cleaning, painting roofs, &c., of the Houses of Parliament, to be paid through the Clerk of the Works, without any deduction of their pay for the benefit of a middleman?

MR. C. GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): Before that question is answered I will ask the right hon. Gentleman if he is aware that the London County Council has done everything in its power to eliminate the presence of middlemen in the sense indicated in this question from all its contracts?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): I am not responsible for the action of the London County Council.

MR. C. GRAHAM: I am afraid I made myself but imperfectly understood. I wished to know if the right hon. Gentleman was aware of the fact I have stated.

MR. PLUNKET: I do not think I am required to express any opinion on that subject.

MR. C. GRAHAM: Still I have not made myself plain——

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! What the London County Council may have done has nothing whatever to do with this question.

MR. PLUNKET: The system under which contracts for labour and materials are entered into by the Office of Works has been referred to a Departmental Committee, with a view to the matter being fully considered before any fresh contract is entered into. This Committee will inquire into the question as to the mode of paying the staff employed about the Houses of Parliament to be adopted in the future.

PLYMOUTH BARRACKS.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what are the rules in regard to the admission of tradesmen to the forts and barracks at Plymouth; and whether any respectable tradesman of the town will be allowed a pass on application?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The general principle of recent rules is to limit as far as possible the admission of persons to military works and buildings, except upon business. Provision is made for a pass for tradesmen and others who may be admitted to the residential portion of any fort or barrack, at the discretion of the General Officer commanding the district.

LAND COMMISSION—QUEEN'S COUNTY.

MR. LALOR (Queen's Co., Leix): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state the number of cases of appeals from the fair rents fixed by the Sub-Commission for Queen's County that were disposed of by the Chief Commission at its recent sitting; and in how many cases were the rents fixed by the Sub-Commission reduced, confirmed, and increased respectively?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I shall be obliged if the hon. Member will defer this question till Monday, as the Chief Commission is now on circuit.

THE DRAINAGE AND IMPROVEMENT OF LAND BILL.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of his previous declarations on the subject, he will use his influence with political friends to prevent the progress of the Drainage and Improvement of Land (Ireland) Bill being prevented by them?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is a fact that, so far as I am concerned, so far as the Irish Government are concerned, we view with approval the Bill brought in by the hon. Member. I have no power to do what he suggests, but I do what I can by making this specific declaration in favour of the Bill.

LOCAL REGISTRY OF TITLES (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. O'KEEFFE: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if it is his intention to proceed with the Local Registry of Titles (Ireland) Bill this Session?

MR. MADDEN: The Bill will, I hope, be in the hands of hon. Members in a few days.

THE REV. MR. MACRAE.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether any charge of boycotting or intimidation has been made against the Rev. David Macrae, a minister of religion at Dundee, who is at present travelling in Ireland for the benefit of his health; and on what grounds he was recently "shadowed" by the police while travelling from New-bridge to Clongorey?

MR. CAREW (Kildare): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, on the same subject, whether the Rev. Mr. Macrae, of Dundee, and his wife, when visiting Clongorey on Thursday last, were shadowed by a policeman named Keating, who followed them from point to point on a bicycle, going everywhere the visitors went to; and whether he can say why they were so shadowed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is no charge of boycotting or intimidation against the rev. gentleman, and not the slightest foundation that he was shadowed. The policeman referred to was engaged on a wholly different matter.

WHISKY BONDING.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it is intended to limit the Committee on Bonding and Blending Whisky to considering the propriety of applying the Food and Drugs Act and the Merchandise Marks Act solely to foreign spirits, and to mixtures of foreign with British spirits; and if so, has he considered the possible result therefrom, namely, a recommendation to penalise or prohibit certain makes of foreign spirits and blends as nefarious or unwholesome, while there could be no inquiry into the case of home spirits manufactured in the same way or of the same ingredients, which are passed off on the public as Irish or Scotch whisky?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): It is not intended to place any such limit, and the terms of reference, which will be placed on the Paper, will include the points referred to by the hon. Member.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I am obliged to the right hon. Gentleman.

RETIRING WARRANTS—"REGINA v. MITCHELL."

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if his attention has been drawn to complaints that a restrictive Treasury limit of compensation of 1882 was withheld from the knowledge of Officers of the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers when they were invited to retire under the Royal Warrants of 1881 and 1884; whether the principle of "actuarial calculations" has been applied to all cases of regimental and full Colonels of the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers, and also to the cases of Lieutenant-Colonels, Royal Engineers, subsequent to that of Colonel E. M. Lloyd, who retired under the provisions of those warrants; whether a Treasury limit or Departmental ruling of September, 1882, has been applied to the cases of those Lieutenant-Colonels, Royal Engineers, who retired under the above-named warrants, from Lieutenant-Colonel E. R. James to the case of Lieutenant-Colonel F. B. Mainguy, thereby reducing their life annuities for loss sustained under warrants of a later date than 1872 to £150 a year, instead of granting them the compensation they were entitled to on "actuarial calculations," as stipulated by both the warrants; whether he will lay such Minute or ruling upon the Table of the House; and whether it is true that this Minute or ruling has been filed in the Royal Courts of Justice in the demurrer and plea in the recent case of "Mitchell v. Regina"?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: My answer to the first three of the hon. Member's questions is "Yes," with the exception that there is no stipulation in the Warrant as to actuarial calculations. To the fourth question I must answer "No;" and as to the fifth, I have no information at my disposal.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg, also, to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is true that in 1886-7 he returned as surplus to the Treasury, under Vote 19, £25,720, voted by Parliament for the compensation of retired Officers; whether, in each successive year up to the present date, large sums voted by Parliament for the same purpose have been returned into the Exchequer; and whether, under these circumstances, he is prepared to recommend to the Chancellor of the Exchequer the unsatisfied claim of the suppliant in "Mitchell v. Regina," and any of his brother Officers who may have been underpaid, for favourable consideration?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I must refer the hon. Member to the answer given by the First Lord of the Treasury on the 12th of this month.

THE VERY REV. DR. M'ALROY.

MR. P. O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can explain the grounds which induced the Prisons Board neither to dismiss nor to censure the very Rev. Dr. M'Alroy, P.P., chaplain of Tullamore Gaol, who, when summoned to give evidence relative to the conveyance of a suit of clothes to the hon. Member for North East Cork, Mr. William O'Brien, while a prisoner in Tullamore Gaol in 1887, first before Mr. Joyce, who conducted an inquiry on oath on behalf of the Prisons Board, and subsequently before Mr. Burke, Chairman of the Prisons Board, refused absolutely to appear before either gentleman or give any evidence, sworn or otherwise, in relation to the inquiry, whereas the Rev. Father O'Dougherty, late chaplain of Derry Gaol, was dismissed by the Prisons Board for refusing to answer certain questions which he considered ought not to have been put to a minister of religion, when giving evidence in an inquiry conducted by Mr. Joyce, on behalf of the Prisons Board, relative to the conveyance of letters out of the prison, with which it was not proved Father O'Dougherty had anything to do?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The General Prisons Board report that it appears, from the Minutes of Evidence in the Office, that the Rev. Dr. McAlroy not only did not refuse to give evidence before Mr. Bourke, Chairman of the Prisons Board, but was examined upon oath by him with regard to the conveyance of a suit of clothes to Mr. O'Brien, M.P. From the Report received from Mr. Inspector Joyce on the same subject, it does not appear that the Rev. Dr. McAlroy was called upon by him to give evidence upon the subject, but an inquiry has been to-day addressed to Mr. Joyce on the matter.

THE ROYAL AGRICULTURAL SHOW AT PLYMOUTH.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in accordance with the usual practice, he has sanctioned the employment of an Inspector, two sergeants, and a number of constables belonging to the A Division of the Metropolitan Police, at the forthcoming Royal Agricultural Show at Plymouth; that the sergeants will be represented by two sub-inspectors, and the constables by sub-inspectors and sergeants, to the exclusion of the constables in the A Reserve, who are available for duty of this kind; and that, in consequence of a similar arrangement last year, the number of sergeants left at home was insufficient for the proper performance of the sectional duties; and, whether he will take steps to prevent such an irregularity in the future?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have sanctioned, in accordance with a practice which has existed for many years, the employment of a certain number of officers of the Metropolitan Police at the forthcoming Agricultural Show at Plymouth. The selection of these officers is entirely in the discretion of the Commissioner. I have no information of any inconvenience or irregularity having arisen in the past, or being likely to arise in the present year.

HELIGOLAND.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he is aware that on the 6th September, 1887, the hon. Member for Mid Cork moved the reduction of the Foreign and Colonial Vote by £1,000, in order to urge on the Government the propriety of the cession of the island of Heligoland to Germany, and that the Secretary of State for the Colonies then stated that "it is not the intention nor the desire of Her Majesty's Government to part with Heligoland to Germany;" and what has occurred since that date to cause the Government to alter its intention?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: What has occurred since that date has been the settlement of the outlines of an arrangement in which the cession of Heligoland forms part.

CHATHAM CONVICT PRISON OFFICIALS AND IRISH CONVICTS.

DR. KENNY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in view of the fact that there exists in the public mind a suspicion that so much soreness must necessarily remain in the minds of certain officials of Chatham Convict Prison, against whom charges of cruelty, &c., were made by Messrs. Daly, Egan, and other prisoners in that establishment, towards said prisoners for having made said charges, as to make it very difficult for the officials in question to discharge impartially and without friction their duties in relation to such prisoners, he will, in the interests of the officials involved, direct the removal of the prisoners in question to some other convict establishment where no ground can exist for such suspicions?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have seen no evidence that there exists in the public mind any suspicion of the kind referred to. I am assured, as a matter of fact, by the Directors of Convict Prisons, that there is no difficulty in the way of the impartial discharge of their duties by the officials of Chatham Prison, and that no sort of soreness exists in their minds in consequence of the complaints that have been made against them. No cause, therefore, exists for the removal of the prisoners in question on these grounds. I may point out that the complaints and the events to which they refer occurred some 18 months or two years ago, yet the prisoners admitted to the visitors that their treatment had improved during the last 18 months. This shows that the officers do not cherish any resentment, as the question seems to suggest.

DR. KENNY: I wish also to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in view of the fact that the recent official inquiry into the charges and allegations of cruelty and petty annoyances, &c., made by Messrs. Daly, Egan, and other prisoners undergoing penal servitude in Chatham Prison, against officials in that prison, has failed to satisfy public opinion in Ireland and elsewhere as to the truth or otherwise of said charges and allegations, and as to the impartiality of the said inquiry, he will consent to grant a sworn inquiry, by independent and non-official persons, as to the truth of the charges put forward?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have no reason to believe that public opinion has not been satisfied by the thoroughly exhaustive and impartial inquiry of the Prison Visitors at Chatham Prison, which, to my mind, is quite conclusive on the subject of the charges and allegations of cruelty and petty annoyance made by Messrs. Daly, Egan, and other prisoners. I have no power to grant a sworn inquiry, but the essential feature of the inquiry just concluded is that it was conducted by independent and non-official persons. The Visitors were instituted for the very purpose of having a non-official Court of Review as to the conduct of prison officials.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: Has the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary done anything with a view to removing Scotch convicts from Chatham?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am in communication with the Scotch Office.

DR. KENNY: Is the right. hon. Gentleman aware that a great number of public bodies in Ireland have passed resolutions expressing the opposite opinion conveyed by the right hon. Gentleman as to the inquiry having been thorough and impartial?

MR. MATTHEWS: I do not agree with that view.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: We shall raise this question on the Estimates.

CORONERS' JURIES AND THE IRISH POLICE.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Government will assent to a Return giving, for the three years ended 31st May, 1890, particulars of any verdicts returned by Coroners' Juries, and of any prosecutions instituted against members of the Royal Irish Constabulary, with the results of the latter, and specifying whether any action has been taken by the Government in relation to the persons implicated; and, if so, what has been its nature?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No; but if the hon. Member will ask for a Return for 10 years, I will consider the matter.

THE POLICE AND THE CASHEL COMMISSIONERS.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland by what authority, and for what reason, groups of policemen hung about the entrance to the Town Hall of Cashel at the time appointed for the last meeting of the Municipal Commissioners, and took down the name of each Commissioner as he entered?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must ask the hon. Member to defer this question. I am making inquiries.

MR. SEXTON: I will put it to-morrow.

CUSTOMS CLERKS IN LONDON AND LIVERPOOL.

MR. ROYDEN (Liverpool, W., Toxteth): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if it is intended that the provisions of the Treasury Order, dated 10th August, 1889, which gave effect to the recommendations of the Ridley Commission, and which are now under the consideration of the Treasury, on their application to the clerks of the Customs in London, will also be applied to the clerical staff of the Customs at Liverpool; and, if so, whether the Treasury will apply the same treatment to clerks of the present staff at both places whose positions are analogous?

SIR H. MAXWELL: I am not sure that I understand the precise meaning of the question put by my hon. Friend, but he will see that it is not possible for me to give any general pledge, such as his question suggests, upon cases not before me, without reference to the different conditions of each particular case.

THE MORFA COLLIERY DISASTER.

MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the learned counsel who attended the inquiry into the Morfa Colliery Disaster, South Wales, on behalf of the Government, or any of the Inspectors of Mines, have made Reports upon the inquiry; and, if so, whether such Reports will be placed upon the Table of the House?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; Reports have been made by the learned counsel, and by one of the Inspectors. These are now with the printers, and they will be presented to Parliament in due course.

STRANORLAR UNION.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether the Irish Executive have yet arrived at any decision as to the relief to be given to the funds of the Stranorlar Union, in respect of the charges thrown on them by and through the improper removal from Scotland to that Union of the wife and children of James M'Cormick while the latter was in Great Britain.

MR. MADDEN: I have made inquiry on the subject of the question of the hon. and learned Gentleman since a former question put to me by him, and I have looked at the various Acts of Parliament bearing on this subject, and I am unable to find any means by which relief could be given to the funds of the Stranorlar Union in respect of the charges cast on them by the removal from Scotland of the persons referred to in this and the former questions of the hon. Member.

MR. E. HARRINGTON: Did not a similar case occur last week, when a man who had been 65 years in this country was sent back to an Irish Union?

MR. MADDEN: I have no information with regard to that matter of fact. It is too complicated a question for the Government to promise to introduce legislation this Session.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: Seeing that this is becoming a general practice with regard to Ireland, will the Government afford facilities for passing a Bill if it is brought in by a private Member?

MR. MADDEN: I must ask for notice of that question.

SHADOWING.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state the number of persons "shadowed" in Ireland, and the number "watched" by the police, and the number of policemen engaged in these operations?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid I cannot give a definite answer to this question. The number of persons whom it is considered necessary to keep under supervision and the number of police engaged on such duty vary from day to day.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Can the right hon. Gentleman give a Return of the names and addresses of persons who have been shadowed since he came into office, and the causes of the shadowing? I do not think there will be any objection on the part of these people to have their names given.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I fear it would be impracticable to obtain such a Return.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Did the right hon. Gentleman say it was impracticable or objectionable?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must have notice of the question. I should think it would be impracticable.

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been called to the Order contained in page 212 of the Police Code, issued in 1881, by the then head of the Criminal Investigation Department, Scotland Yard, in which it is laid down that, "in keeping observation on suspected persons, great care must be taken that attention is not attracted;" if the police in Tipperary have recently adopted a contrary system, persistently following and obtruding their presence on certain subjects of Her Majesty in such a manner as to amount at Common Law to an "unlawful setting upon one's person;" and if the police in this matter act under any statutory authority; and, if not, whether a case will be submitted to the Law Officers of the Crown, in order to ascertain the legality or otherwise of this practice?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not seen the Order in question. No doubt, in many cases of suspected persons the watching would be more effectual if it could be done without attracting attention. I am advised that the police have not acted illegally, and no new practice has been established.

DR. KENNY: Is not shadowing of the nature which has been described calculated to lead to a breach of the peace?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think that it is.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF TELEGRAPHISTS.

MR. MCARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the official shorthand writer, sent by the Postal Authorities to a National Conference of Telegraphists recently held, has reported that resolutions strongly protesting against the writer's presence at the meeting were passed; and whether, in view of the great dissatisfaction thereby caused, he will in future abstain from sending such Government reporters to such meetings?

*MR. RAIKES: Having seen the shorthand notes of the Conference to which the hon. Member refers, I have no intention of modifying the conditions on which meetings for the discussion of official questions are allowed to be held. Additional evidence of the value of such a Report is furnished by the request which reached me yesterday from the officer who acted, I believe, as Chairman of the Conference, to be supplied with a copy of the official report for the use of his committee, a request which I have had great pleasure in granting.

POLICE GRIEVANCES.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether policemen are entitled to form a combination for their mutual benefit and redress of grievances connected with their work and wages; and whether they are at liberty to hold meetings without complying with regulations similar to those imposed upon the Post Office employés?

MR. MATTHEWS: If the police have any grievances or causes of complaint the Police Rules direct that such grievances can at any time be laid before the Commissioner through the superintendents of the divisions. I apprehend that combinations of the kind referred to would be irregular. Meetings, according to the rules, can only be held by the permission of the Commissioner. These Police Rules are quite independent of any regulations which may be made by any other Department of the State.

MR. C. GRAHAM: Am I to understand policemen are not at liberty to form a trades union, or to attend a public meeting to discuss their grievances?

MR. MATTHEWS: I cannot add anything to the answer I have already given.

MR. C. GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the statement appearing in some of the newspapers is correct, that in future men entering the Postal Service will be required to give a written undertaking not to join the Postmen's Union or attend any Union meetings; and, if so, by whose authority has it been issued?

*MR. RAIKES: No, Sir; the statement is not correct.

POSTAL BLOCKS.

MR. C. GRAHAM: In the absence of the hon. Member for Cornwall, Camborne, I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has seen the statements in the Evening News and Post of the 18th, to the effect that, in St. Martin's-le-Grand, work, according to all accounts, is being impeded at an increasing ratio, to the grave inconvenience of business men; and whether he still adheres to his declaration that there is absolutely no foundation for such statements?

*MR. RAIKES: I have not only not seen the statements to which the hon. Member refers, but am assured by those who, on my behalf, have examined the paper mentioned that they are not to be found there. For the credit of the paper in question I am glad that this should be so, for had such statements been made, I should have felt constrained to qualify them as absolutely untrue.

IRELAND—CHARGES AGAINST THE POLICE.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is true that Mr. James O'Brien, of Killeagh, was arrested at Youghal Fair, last Monday, by a common policeman in plain clothes, who was occupied in closely and offensively "shadowing" Mr. O'Brien; and if he can explain why Mr. Redmond, R.M., was specially telegraphed for to investigate the charge of this gentleman accused of obstructing his "shadow"? I beg also to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether a warrant has been issued for the arrest of Mr. Barry, P.L.G., at the instance of a policeman named Drought, against whom Mr. Barry had previously instituted legal proceedings. I have further to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the manner in which the police escort behaved to two political prisoners, Messrs. Thomas and William Kent, who were brought from the County Court gaol to a Court held in Fermoy, on Monday, the 16th of June, under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act; and why, and for what reason, were the prisoners handcuffed?

MR. MADDEN: I must ask the hon. Member to postpone these questions.

"SHARP V. WAKEFIELD."

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he will lay upon the Table, as Parliamentary Papers, the following documents in connection with the licensing case of "Sharp v. Wakefield"; the statement of the case, and the judgments delivered in the Court of Appeal.

*MR. RITCHIE: I have made inquiries and cannot ascertain that there are any precedents for the presentation to Parliament of documents relating to particular cases which have been the subject of consideration in the Law Courts. The ordinary Law Reports supply ample information as to the decisions of the Judges, and the facts upon which those decisions were based, and I see no reason to supplement those Reports in the manner proposed.

MR. PICKERSGILL: Is there not an exact precedent in 1875 when the Protection of Property Bill was before the House, and when the charge to the Grand Jury at the Central Criminal Court by the late Recorder of London, in the well-known Trades Union case of Hibbert, was laid on the Table?

*MR. RITCHIE: I will inquire into it, but I must say it appears an entirely different thing to give a charge to a Grand Jury and the papers now asked for.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): Only a Session or two ago the Under Secretary laid on the Table the Charge of Chief Baron Palles in the case of Mr. Blunt.

*MR. RITCHIE: I have promised to inquire, I can do no more at present.

AYLESBURY PRISON.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is correctly reported that he proposes to convert the local prison at Aylesbury into a convict prison; if so, why is an additional convict prison required; has there been an increase in the total number of convicts in England; what will be the cost (if any) of converting the prison to its new purpose; and will the prison be appropriated to any particular class of convicts?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; it is the fact, that Aylesbury Prison has been closed as a local prison, in order that it may be converted into a convict prison in lieu of Woking Prison, which has been handed over to the War Department. It will not, therefore, be an additional convict prison. There has been no increase, but a decrease in the total number of convicts in England, and it is thus possible to give up the larger prison at Woking. The estimated cost of the necessary alterations is £16,500. It will be for female convicts.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): Is Woking to be used as a military prison?

MR. MATTHEWS: No; as barracks.

TELEGRAPHISTS' GRIEVANCES.

MR. M'CARTAN: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that for several years clerks in the Central Telegraph Office, at small salaries, have performed overtime of four hours and upwards without the "quarter rate"; whether he will make inquiry into these cases, with the view of paying these clerks the "rate" to which they are entitled; whether clerks are employed on wires rented by newspaper proprietors from 6 p.m. to 6 a.m., although the night duty in the Central Office was, owing to its severity, reduced from eight to seven hours; whether, considering the heavy work on their wires, he will consider the desirability of dividing these duties; and whether, having regard to the fact that telegraph clerks frequently perform from eight to 13 hours duty on Sundays, he will allow them a relief to obtain, at least, one meal?

*MR. RAIKES: I am not aware that any telegraphists in the Central Telegraph Office who perform overtime for the Department in excess of three hours have not received the extra quarter rate. If any such cases are brought under the notice of the Controller the proper payment will be allowed. The question of dividing the duties at the newspaper special wires has on several occasions been considered, but it has not been deemed desirable to do so, as such an arrangement would be inconvenient both to the officers themselves and to the Department, and would not, I think, be acceptable to the newspapers. The telegraphists, I may mention, are able to secure intervals for rest and refreshment. I am assured, with reference to the last question asked by the hon. Member, that the telegraphists on duty on Sundays have ample opportunity for eating their meals undisturbed.

THE ANGLO-GERMAN AGREEMENT.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, in the Agreement proposed for the purpose of defining the spheres of influence and territories of Great Britain and Germany in Africa, it is intended to confirm to the German Empire the whole of Damaraland; and whether there is any harbour, excepting the British port of Walvisch Bay, by which access from the sea to Damaraland can be obtained?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: In the Agreement there is no alteration in the Protectorate of Damaraland by Germany, which has been for some time recognised by Her Majesty's Government. The Agreement is chiefly designed to define the respective spheres of influence in regions which have not hitherto been distinguished.

MR. W. F. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby): Will there be free transit for English goods through Damaraland?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I think that the hon. Member will see that the Agreement provides for absolute freedom of transit respectively from German and British territory in Central Africa; in Damaraland there will be the rights of settling and trading.

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.): When will the Papers be circulated with reference to the Agreement?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am afraid that I cannot say when the rest of the Papers will be presented, because the negotiations are not concluded; but I am sure that they will be presented at the earliest possible date.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether at an early date he will lay before the House Papers beyond the Despatch of Lord Salisbury, especially the Agreement which has recently appeared in the Official Gazette of Berlin, which differs in a certain degree from the details of Lord Salisbury's Despatch.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I must ask for notice of the question.

*MR. O'KELLY (Roscommon, N.): Will the principle of the "Hinterland" be applied to the Portuguese possessions?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I think I must ask for notice of the question.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he will cause to be placed in the Library or Tea Room, for the information of Members, a map of Africa, showing the territories in dispute between Great Britain and Germany prior to the arrangement just arrived at and the exact nature of that arrangement?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Yes, Sir; as soon as possible.

MR. BUCHANAN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what territory besides the islands of Zanzibar and Pemba is included in the proposed British Protectorate of Zanzibar?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The whole of the dominions of the Sultan of Zanzibar, with the exception of the strip of coast farmed out to the German East Africa Company, are included in the proposed British Protectorate of Zanzibar.

DR. CAMERON: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government intend to bring in a Bill to sanction the proposed cession of Heligoland to Germany; and, if so, when the measure will be introduced?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Yes; as soon as the agreement has been concluded of which the outlines have been embodied in the despatch of the 16th inst.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I desire also to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, before introducing a Bill for this purpose, Her Majesty's Government have taken, or will take, steps to ascertain the wishes of the inhabitants of Heligoland; whether Lord Knutsford stated in the House of Commons, in 1885, that official information had satisfied him that the inhabitants were averse to being annexed to Germany; and, further, that evidence before the Commission on Colonial Defences showed Heligoland to be of strategical importance to this country; and whether, since 1885, Her Majesty's Government have received information and evidence to a contrary effect; and, if so, what information and evidence?

MR. LABOUCHERE: I should like to ask whether it is true, as has been reported, that the Civil Lord of the Admiralty has resigned?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Were there any such crisis in the Government as the hon. Gentleman suggests, the House would have been apprised of the fact without a moment's delay. There is no such crisis. With regard to the question of the hon. Member for East Northamptonshire, and his anxiety to reconcile these apparent differences of opinion, I have to say that when Lord Knutsford spoke in March, 1885, there was no question of exempting the Heligolandians from compulsory military conscription, and this liability to conscription was, as Lord Knutsford pointed out, very distasteful to the inhabitants, and made them averse to a change. The Mover of the Address had stated that Heligoland was of no possible use to us, and Lord Knutsford only stated that some persons of experience entertained contrary views to that of the hon. Member. It may be observed that no proposal has been made by any Military Authority, or by the Royal Commission, in favour of fortifying Heligoland in any way.

MR. CHANNING: Have any steps been taken to ascertain the wishes of the inhabitants of Heligoland?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I believe the Government are fully informed on the subject, and I have stated correctly the facts of the case.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the question, which was whether the Government have taken any steps to ascertain the feelings of the people of Heligoland?

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I desire to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman will lay before the House the facts which have come to the knowledge of the Government since 1885, and which have given them their present view as to the wishes of the inhabitants of Heligoland.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Does the right hon. Gentleman wish to convey to the House that the Heligolandians were glad to get rid of British rule and preferred that of Germany?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No, Sir. I do not wish to convey any such impression to the House. The Government have reason to believe from information that the people of Heligoland are not dissatisfied with the change.

MR. BUCHANAN: Supposing Parliament refuses to sanction the cession of Heligoland, will the rest of the Agreement which relates to Africa fall through?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I should think that if one very grave part of the Agreement is not ratified by the English Parliament, the rest of the Agreement could not be adhered to. I am, of course, speaking now without information, and I am sure the House will see that I can hardly be asked to give a decided answer to questions of this kind without notice.

MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.): Has the Agreement with Germany been concluded or not?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. and learned Gentleman must be content to take the Papers which have been presented as showing the existing state of things. I cannot go beyond that.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): I wish to ask the Under Secretary of Foreign Affairs whether the Government have, in the course of their negotiations, considered whether the rights of English fishermen in the North Sea around the coast of Heligoland, especially in regard to the recent interpretation of the word "fishing" by the High Court at Leipzig in reference to German territorial waters?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I will bring this important question under the notice of the Secretary of State.

MR. O'KELLY: Will the right hon. Gentleman undertake to lay on the Table the opinion of the Naval Authorities?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No, Sir.

DR. CAMERON: The right hon. Gentleman stated that the Bill for the cession of Heligoland would be introduced when the Agreement was definitely concluded. Are we, then, to wait for the close of the negotiations as to the Niger Company?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I referred to the arrangement as detailed in the Papers now before the House.

MR. BRYCE: Will the Papers relating to the Agreement be presented to the House before the Bill is introduced?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I must ask for notice of that question.

THE LOCAL TAXATION BILL.

MR. CAINE (Barrow-in-Furness): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he is now able to state what further Amendments, if any, to the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties Bill he is prepared to accept?

*MR. RITCHIE: I cannot add anything to what I have already said. I think it an inconvenient course to pursue to ask the Government what Amendments they are prepared to accept. I am prepared to express the views of the Government on the Amendments as they arise.

POSTMEN AND THE TRUCK ACT.

MR. CONYBEARE: I beg to ask the Attorney General whether the Postmaster General has legal power to forfeit the wages of postmen for an alleged breach of rules in cases where the offence involves no dereliction of duty, as where postmen attend a Trade Union meeting when not on duty?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I cannot do more than refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to his previous question on this subject on June 9th. The Postmaster General can make such rules as in his judgment are necessary for the proper conduct of those employed in the Service, and it has been held that the imposing of fines for misconduct is no offence under the Truck Acts.

THE ESTIMATES.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he has further considered the question as the advisability of presenting the Civil Service Estimates this year in a different order to that which has hitherto obtained, so that the later classes of Votes might be submitted to the Committee at a reasonable date, with a view to the adequate discussion of the same; and whether he can now state when it is proposed to present the Post Office and the Revenue Estimates to the Committee?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government have already been endeavouring to meet the wishes of Members as to the order in which the Civil Service Estimates are taken. I cannot yet say on what day the Post Office and Revenue Estimates will be dealt with.

MEDICAL OFFICERS IN ACTION.

MR. MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what position do Medical Officers occupy during operations in war, and are they ever brought under fire or exposed to danger; what was the mortality among Medical Officers from casualties in action, wounds, and disease during the recent South African, Egyptian, and Burma Wars, and what percentage did the mortality bear to the number of such officers employed; how many officers of the Royal Artillery and the Royal Engineers, the Line, the Commissariat and Pay Departments were killed in the wars referred to, and what was the percentage of mortality from wounds and sickness in each of the above-named branches of the Service; was the Victoria Cross conferred on any officers of the Medical Staff during recent campaigns; and, if so, under what circumstances; what is the meaning of the phrase "Non-Combatant;" if it means that "Non-Combatant" Officers do not occupy the fighting line and are not exposed to danger, why are Medical Officers who are called "Non-Combatant," not kept in a place of safety with the Pay and Commissariat Department; excluding V.C.'s, what honours have Medical Officers received for recent campaigns, and what proportion do the honours received bear per rank to the honours given to Combatant Officers; and why, in the matter of sick leave, are Medical Officers treated differently from other Officers, and why they are only allowed six months' sick leave while Combatants are allowed 12 months?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Medical Officers are classed as "Non-Combatant," for the simple reason that they are not Combatants, and that there are only these two designations. It is the fact, nevertheless, that their duties take them under fire far more than other Non-Combatants, and that many Medical Officers have been killed or wounded in action, and the Victoria Cross has been conferred upon two of them. Taking six recent campaigns together, the mortality of Line Officers was 5.4 per cent., and that of Medical Officers 3.1 per cent. The question of sick leave is one of expense, as substitutes would be required for Medical Officers. This applies in a much smaller degree in the case of Combatant Officers.

STOKERS IN THE NAVY.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether a special Naval recruiting party has recently visited various industrial centres; how long it has been so engaged, and at what cost; how many stokers and engine-room artificers respectively it has recruited; and what is the present deficiency, if any, of stokers and engine-room artificers respectively?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The recruiting party in question started early in January last, with the object of endeavouring to raise men for the Navy in districts not worked by the ordinary recruiting agents of the Admiralty, the Navy being now mainly supplied with recruits from London and the southern and western counties. The additional cost of the party up to May 31 last is estimated at about £1,200, including the difference between the full and half-pay of the officers employed. The officer in charge reported recently that he had raised, in addition to other ratings, 110 stokers, but no engine-room artificers. The party might have raised more stokers, but the number entered through the ordinary recruiting agencies, partly, no doubt, on account of the publicity given to the proceedings of the recruiting party, was so great that the Admiralty found it necessary last month to stop all entries at the very time when the direct efforts of the recruiting party were meeting with the most success. There is no deficiency at present in the number of stokers or engine-room artificers required.

ADMIRAL MAYNE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest) : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, in view of the growing importance of the stokers and leading stokers to the Royal Navy, and of the fact that no improvement has taken place in their position for the last 20 years, he will consider their claims to be placed on the same footing as the seamen class of Her Majesty's Navy, and granted the second class rating, the 2d. a day on re-engaging for the second 10 years, and the progressive pay and other advantages which have been granted to the seamen during that period; and whether he would give a Return showing the comparative percentage of seamen and stokers who re-engage after 10 years' service, and who are lost to the Service by death, desertion, discharge, invaliding, or purchase during the first 10 years?

LORD G. HAMILTON : The hon. Gentleman is under a misapprehension in supposing that no improvement has taken place in the position of stokers and leading stokers in the Royal Navy during the last 20 years. During the last five years their prospects have been improved by the establishment among them of the rating of chief petty officer, carrying with it since 1887 a scale of pay ranging from 2s. 11d. to 3s. 5d. a day, while within the same period an allowance of 1d. a day has been granted for the qualification of "trained man," and 3d. a day for that of "stoker mechanic." Stokers have also been admitted to the coastguard, the privileges of which are now granted to a considerable number of them. I have had a careful comparison made between the position of the stoker ratings and that of the seamen class, and will publish it in the form of a Memorandum.

THE BRADFORD DESTRUCTOR.

MR. BYRON REED (Bradford, E.) : I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that it is contemplated to erect a "destructor" upon the confines of Peel Park, in the borough of Bradford; whether he has ascertained that this proposal is obnoxious to the adjacent inhabitants; and whether the Local Government Board can make to the Local Authorities such representations as will prevent the carrying out of the project, with its attendant annoyances to a crowded population, and its probable detriment to the herbage of the park and the enjoyment of those who frequent it?

*MR. RITCHIE : The Local Government Board have received representations with reference to the erection of a destructor in the neighbourhood of Peel Park, Bradford, which it is stated is proposed to be erected by the Town Council of the borough. The matter is not one in which the Board have any jurisdiction, unless it is proposed to defray the cost of the destructor out of moneys raised by loan. If any application should be made to the Board for their sanction to a loan for this purpose, they will, before arriving at a decision in the matter, direct a Local Inquiry, at which all persons interested will have an opportunity of submitting any representations they may think necessary. I may add that since notice was given of the question I have received a communication from the Town Clerk of Bradford, in which it is stated that the proposed site of the destructor is an old disused quarry, and not in a populous locality; that Peel Park is the property of the Corporation and is highly valued by them, and that they would be the last persons to do any act that could possibly operate to its detriment; and that the proposed building which will be used solely for the purification by fire of what is known as dry ash-pit refuse, is to be constructed on a principle, the result of long and costly experiments by the Corporation, which will secure the complete destruction of all offensive emanations.

MR. BYRON REED : Arising out of the answer, may I ask if I am to understand the right hon. Gentleman that it is not in the power of the Local Government Board to send down an Inspector to the locality to ascertain the facts?

*MR. RITCHIE : Oh, yes; it is within our power to do that, but we cannot interfere unless a loan is asked for.

PRISON CLERKS.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY (London-derry): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Report of the Departmental Committee inquiring into the complaints of clerks serving in Her Majesty's Prisons, which, on the 5th instant, was promised "in a few days," is now in the hands of the Commissioners of Prisons, and if they have been instructed to communicate it to the clerks in question?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have only to-day received the Report in question. Until I have had time to consider it, and to confer with the Commissioners with regard to it, I am not in a position to say when or in what manner any communication on the subject will be made to the Prison clerks.

INLAND REVENUE SALARIES.

MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim, S.): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether a decision has yet been arrived at respecting the Petition of the officers of the Inland Revenue, praying for an improvement in their scale of salaries and their general treatment; and, if so, when it is probable the result may be announced?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I have had this matter under my personal consideration, and have referred to the Board of Inland Revenue for further information. When their Report is received, I hope to arrive at an early decision.

WATERFORD PROSECUTIONS.

MR. P. J. POWER (Waterford, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Mr. C. P. Redmond, editor of the Waterford News, has been sentenced by Messrs. Considine and Irwin at Waterford on June 6th, to three months' imprisonment for publishing a resolution of the Kilgobinet branch of the Irish National League; whether Mr. Redmond was sentenced to a further term of imprisonment for publishing in another issue of the Waterford News another resolution of the same branch; whether Mr. Redmond was convicted on a third charge, stated by the Court to be a graver offence than the other charges, to 14 days' imprisonment, and ordered at the expiration of that period to enter into security himself in the sum of £200 and two sureties of £100 each, to be of good behaviour, or in default to go to prison for four months; whether there is an appeal from the last sentence; whether the Magistrates refused to impose a sentence which would give a right of appeal; whether the same course of refusing an appeal has not been adopted recently by the same Magistrates in the case of Mr. Fisher, editor of the Munster Express; and whether he is aware that every decision of Messrs. Considine and Irwin brought before Judge Waters has been reversed by him?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must ask the hon. Member to defer this question. I have not received a full Report on the case yet.

THE STRAITS SETTLEMENTS.

MR. THOMAS SUTHERLAND (Greenock): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies if it may be understood that the final decision as to the increased military contribution proposed to be levied on the Straits Settlements will remain in abeyance until the promised Correspondence and Papers are in possession of the House?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: As the Correspondence which it is proposed to give to Parliament will not be complete unless it comprises the final decision of Her Majesty's Government, I am afraid that it would not be possible that the decision should remain in abeyance until the Papers are in the possession of the House.

SIR HERCULES ROBINSON.

SIR DONALD CURRIE (Perthshire, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he will be good enough to lay upon the Table of the House copies of the Letter from the Foreign Office, dated the 12th February, 1889, addressed to the Colonial Office, with the enclosure therein referred to; also Sir Hercules Robinson's Despatch to Lord Knutsford, dated the 15th April, 1889 (No. 270), with the enclosure to the said Letter, being a Minute of the Prime Minister of the Cape, Sir Gordon Sprigg, addressed to the Governor of Cape Colony, and dated Cape Town, 9th April, 1889?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I cannot answer without notice; but as the Papers include a document written by a Foreign Ambassador, I do not think I can promise the Papers.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): What will be the business to-morrow?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: In pursuance of an undertaking that has been given, the Police Vote in Supply will be taken to-morrow, when the question of the position of the Metropolitan Police may be discussed. After that the Votes in Supply will be taken in their regular order.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Will any Papers, with reference to the relations between the Home Secretary and Mr. Monro, be laid on the Table before the Debate?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: If there are any Papers which can properly be laid upon the Table of the House relating to the relations that exist between the Home Secretary and the Commissioner of Police I will take care that they are placed in the hands of Members to-morrow.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

LOCAL TAXATION (CUSTOMS AND EXCISE) DUTIES BILL.—(No. 244.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Question put, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill.

Ayes 228; Noes 224.—(Div. List, No. 148.)

(5.36.) MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I beg leave to move, Sir, that you report Progress. I think after this Division it is really an abuse of the forms of the House for the Government to persevere with this Bill. The House of Commons has now decisively pronounced against them. In order to give the Government an opportunity of re-considering their position, I beg to move that you report Progress.

(5.37.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman report Progress and ask leave to sit again."—
(Mr. T. P. O'Connor.)

*(5.37.) MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. Gentleman will not be surprised to hear that I do not agree with him. The Government do not think that the House has decisively pronounced against them.

An hon. MEMBER: Not yet.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No, not yet. On Tuesday evening when Progress was reported the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) was in the middle of his speech moving the rejection of the 1st clause, and it was expected that to-night he would continue his speech. Right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite have had the advantage of a surprise, and they deserve full credit for it in every respect; whatever it amounts to in the country and the House of Commons they have the credit of it. We propose to proceed with the ordinary business.

(5.39.) MR. STOREY (Sunderland): Perhaps I may be permitted a word in reply to the observations of the right hon. Gentleman. It is perfectly true that I got the better portion of my speech delivered the night before last, but the right hon. Gentleman will not say that because I got through the more important part of my speech on that occasion I am, therefore, compelled to go on with it this afternoon. It seems to me he is never satisfied. If we speak at length, he says we are obstructive; if we do not speak at all, he says we take him by surprise. The Government have taken the people of this country by surprise, and I think it is probable that before long the people of the country will surprise them. So far as the present Motion is concerned, I have no desire to prevent business going on. I hate the Bill, and I am delighted that the Government have brought it in. I propose for one to continue my opposition to it, and I think the majority of the Members of the House will end either by opposing it or by expressing a significant opinion by their absence, so that in the end what we hoped to achieve this afternoon will be after all accomplished.

(5.42.) MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK (Whithaven): As an old Member of this House, I beg entirely to differ from the hon. Member who has made this Motion. I heard the speech, or part of a speech, which was delivered by the hon. Member for Sunderland when we were last in Committee. To-day, before the Question was put, I observed what was passing on the Opposition Benches. I saw hon. Members in close conversation, and I saw their gestures and what took place between hon. Members below the Gangway opposite and their Front Bench. Anyone who witnessed what occurred could not help but form his own conclusion that the Committee was purposely taken by surprise.

(5.43.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): The purpose of this Motion made by my hon. Friend, if I may venture to construe it, was to make a representation to the Government and to suggest to the Government the advisableness of withdrawing the Bill. It was in our power to have continued the Debate on the first clause by advancing arguments in support of its rejection, but we trusted to expedite business by foregoing our privilege of continuing the Debate. My hon. Friend having gained the object of this Motion—namely, to give the right hon. Gentleman the leader of the House an opportunity of declaring the intention of the Government—I do not think the Motion ought to be pressed to a Division. Of course, I need not say how deeply I regret the course the Government are pursuing. Still, in the circumstances, the opportunity having been afforded, we ought not to consume time by taking another Division; and, therefore, I hope my hon. Friend will withdraw the Motion.

(5.45.) MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I made it, as the right hon. Gentleman correctly says, for the purpose of giving the Government a last opportunity of escaping. ["Not last."] Well, last but one; but as they have not taken it, of course I shall not persevere with my Motion.

(5.45.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I notice that the Irish Secretary is looking extremely pleased at what has occurred—"Order."]

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 2.

(5.45.) MR. S. WILLIAMSON (Kilmarnock, &c.): I beg to move, in Clause 2, page 2, line 2, to leave out "Out of." I move this Amendment with the object of introducing the proposal contained in a second Amendment on the Paper, which proposes that the Scotch share of the money shall be devoted to the purpose of entirely freeing parents in Scotland from the liability of paying school fees, and also for the creation, extension, and improvement of fishery harbours on the coast of Scotland, as against the Government proposal for buying out public houses. I can safely say that in Scotland the entire feeling of the people is against the Government in this matter. I have presented many Petitions against the Government proposals, and though I have presented three in favour of them, those have been from Wine and Spirit and Beer Associations. I have not received for presentation a single Petition from a public meeting of citizens in favour of the Bill, but the strongest expressions of feeling against it have reached me from all parts of Scotland. It is proposed to hand over an annual grant of £130,000 to Scotland, but the framers of this measure wish to devote a large portion of that sum for the purpose of buying out licences. My proposal is that instead of being put to such a purpose, it should be used in supplementing the grant which has been already given to free the compulsory standards in Scotland, and for extending and improving our fishery harbours. The need of proper fishery harbours is much felt in Scotland. There are several small villages and towns without the resources or the means of providing harbour accommodation, and the want is all the more felt now that large boats are being used and that steam trawling is being carried on. In regard to the apportionment of the money, I would suggest that £50,000 should be given for harbours, and £70,000 should be given for the complete freeing of education—so far as the payment of fees is concerned. This sum, I believe, will be enough—in fact, there will be a certain small balance left to be dealt with. It is, of course, in the competency of the Committee to alter these figures, but the object of my Amendment is simply to bring up the question of the creation and improvement of harbours in Scotland and the question of education, as opposed to the policy of buying up the public houses. I sincerely hope that the object I have in view will be acceptable to the House.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 2, to leave out the words “Out of.”—(Mr. S. Williamson.)

Question proposed, “That the words ‘Out of’ stand part of the Clause.”

(5.49.) MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.): I desire to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for the Kilmarnock Burghs, as I understand it is competent for us to discuss the propriety of applying the money allocated to Scotland under this Bill for the purpose for which the hon. Member would design it, or the purpose for which it is designed by the Government. I must say I think the Government have exhibited an unusual degree of perverse ingenuity in the number of vexed and difficult questions they have succeeded in raising by this Bill and this clause. They have raised the whole question of licensing and of the proprietors of licences being bought out by the County authorities. They have raised the whole question of temperance as it affects the whole of the United Kingdom—and no doubt it is known to the Government themselves that this is an extremely thorny question. But they have raised also another, a still more difficult and delicate question, and that is how far this House is going to impose its will upon the Scotch Members assembled here. There has been a growing irritation since this Government came into power as to the manner in which Scotch Members have been perpetually outvoted on Scotch questions. Hitherto Her Majesty's Government have shown their willingness to use their voting power in refusing such Amendments of the law as Scotch Members desire, but now they are taking a step forward in this direction, forcing down our throats alterations in the law against which the great majority of Scotch Members are resolutely opposed, backed, I will undertake to say, by the great majority of the Scotch constituencies. I will go so far as to say there is no question affecting our social life in which our constituencies take a deeper interest than this question of temperance legislation. It may be that our people suffer more from the vice of intemperance, or it may be that our people more appreciate the far-reaching consequences of these evils, but it is certain that the Scotch people are deeply anxious by all means in their power to put an end to this evil, and it is quite certain that we Scotch Members have received more representations, more petitions, on this one subject in the last two or three weeks than upon almost any subject which has come before the Scotch constituencies in recent years. I have myself presented many petitions, and I have received numerous letters, not only from members of my own Party, but from those opposed to me, condemning the Government proposals, and I think every one of my colleagues has had similar experience. How are our representations treated? The Committee is almost without English Conservative Members; they do not care to hear our arguments and follow our discussions; we are ready to represent the distinction there is between our position in this matter and the position in England, but our arguments, so far as English Conservative Members are concerned, are addressed to empty Benches. No apology is needed for stating our case adequately; we shall make our protest, and English as well as Scotch constituencies will judge of the manner in which we are treated. First, let me point out that the feeling in Scotland against this Bill comes from either Party, and I may illustrate this by reference to the chief burgh in the constituency I represent. The temperance feeling there is as strong among the Conservatives as among the Liberals. When the Earlier Closing Bill was before the House, a Bill with the object of enabling burghs in Scotland to close public houses an hour earlier than heretofore, a public meeting was convened in my constituency, and it was resolved by the Town Council to take a plebiscite of the population on the subject. The Provost of the town was Chairman of the Committee to carry out the arrangements, and the Town Clerk was Secretary. Voting papers were sent out to the 4,088 ratepayers in the burgh, and, as my hon. Friends know, Dumfries for a Scotch burgh contains a very considerable number of Conservatives. Out of those who returned voting papers, 2,472 were in favour of putting the Act in force, and only 313 were against it. It is, therefore, shown that the opinion is not confined to temperance fanatics, Radicals, and such-like objectionable classes, mistrusted by hon. Gentlemen opposite, but the respectable Conservative classes joined with the Liberals in what they believed to be the interests of temperance. Now, the Government say this is a temperance Bill, and a Member of the Government must needs have command of his countenance when he says so, and Party zeal must have blinded the judgment of any hon. Member who seriously believes this. Out of the Bill I suppose Scotland will get £50,000 a year, for the purpose of extinguishing licences, and these licensed houses in Scotland are worth £20,000,000 at a low valuation. If my calculation is correct, then 400 years are required before existing licences can be abolished. Take the case of Dumfries—and I suppose every hon. Member will be apt to find an illustration in his own constituency—in Dumfries there are 82 licensed houses, each worth I suppose on an average £1,000, a total of £82,000. The portion of this grant falling to Dumfries would be £224 a year, so it is quite apparent no tangible progress can be made towards the end all hon. Members in their hearts desire by means of such proposals as these. But this by no means represents the uselessness and in utility of the measure. Hon. Gentlemen opposite forget that when you take away three or four or more licences you thereby progressively increase the value of the remaining licences you do not take away. Suppose in one particular part of a burgh you have five licences, if you destroy one you do not destroy all the trade carried on by that house, but 90 per cent. of it probably goes to the remaining four houses, and their value is thereby increased. Then, when you destroy another of the four 90 per cent. of the trade of the second house is transferred to the three remaining houses; therefore, when you propose to devote a certain sum to the buying up of licences, remember a great deal of the money you spend is re-invested at once by the nature of your operation in increasing the value of other remaining houses. It is the most thriftless system that can be devised. If we are to buy up licensed houses, a policy I repudiate, at least we should do so as the hon. Member for Birmingham suggested, purchasing them en bloc, not buying them on a system which obliges us to pay for them over again successively. This leads me to say a word or two upon the question, what is the real legal position? Are we bound to buy up public houses before we extinguish them? If we are bound in honour or by the legal rights and position of publicans to buy the licences, it will be one of the greatest calamities to the cause of temperance that can be imagined. But I entirely deny that there is such legal right, and I must express my satisfaction at seeing the Solicitor General present, inasmuch as I shall have to say something upon the attitude he and his learned colleague the Attorney General have thought proper to take up in regard to this matter. Two years ago Her Majesty's Government brought in a Bill, one clause of which frankly recognised, so far as England was concerned, that the publicans had a vested interest in their licences. The clause was contested in the House, and the Solicitor General took occasion to say that if an on-licence was refused renewal upon a public ground, as, for example, that it was not necessary to renew it in the public interest, the Court could interfere by what is called a mandamus to compel the Magistrate to renew it. Subsequently a case was decided which really settled the matter beyond all possible doubt or controversy. By the case "Sharp v. Wakefield" it was decided, and I am now quoting from the authorised version, that—

"The discretion of the Justices as to granting and refusing a licence by way of renewal, under the Licensing Act of 1828 and the Licensing Acts of 1872 and 1874, in respect of excisable liquors to be drunk on the premises, is absolute provided it be exercised judicially."

Let me state what the facts of the case were. On an application to the Justices, under the Licensing Act of 1828, for a renewal of a licence to sell exciseable liquor by retail to be drunk on the premises, the Justices refused to renew the licence, on the ground of the remoteness of the inn from police supervision and the character and the necessities of the neighbourhood. An appeal to the Quarter Sessions was dismissed, and on a case being stated for the opinion of the Court, Lord Esher, the Master of the Rolls, Lord Justice Fry, and Lord Justice Lopes, confirming the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, held that the discretion vested in the Justices under the Licensing Act of 1828 had not been affected by the Licensing Acts of 1872 and 1874, and that it was, therefore, competent for them to withhold the licence on the grounds stated. I do not understand what the Solicitor General and the Attorney General mean when they tell us that that case does not decide the question which is in issue before us now. In my judgment it decides the question as clearly as any decision possibly can decide any question. The Attorney General appears to have expressed the opinion that it could not be a judicial exercise of discretion if the discretion was so exercised as to refuse a licence to a respectable and proper and worthy man. By the decision in the case of Sharp v. Wakefield, the contrary is expressly laid down, and when we are considering as a matter of policy the wisdom or the unwisdom of entering upon a purchase of public houses with public money, the very root of our investigations must necessarily be what are the legal rights possessed by the publicans or the owners of the public houses. I say those legal rights admit of the licences being refused. As to the practice in Scotland regarding the renewal of licences, I have no doubt hon. Gentleman around me will be able to quote instance after instance in which renewals have been refused in different parts of Scotland without any compensation at all. In the Burgh of Dumfries there were, 20 years ago, 120 licences; now there are only 82 licences. In a few cases, no doubt, licences have been withdrawn by reason of conviction for offences. That, of course, does not enter into the consideration. But the remainder have been extinguished in this manner. It has been the rule of the Bench to refuse renewals wherever the property has changed hands, or wherever the tenant has died, or has removed. There have only been two classes of exceptions to this rule. The first class is that of hotels, not public houses in the proper sense of the word, but houses of general entertainment; and the second is a case where a widow, for example, or some other near relative has been left, and where there has been some sympathy felt for her, and also where it has been proved that the house has been exceptionally well conducted. Under these circumstances the licence has been renewed to the survivor. But such has been the operation of this rule or practice of the Bench that we have succeeded in reducing the licences in 20 years by something over 30 per cent. Of course, I need not assure the Committee that in no single case has any compensation been asked or paid by any human being. What must necessarily be the effect of the clause under discussion in a place like Dumfries? It is very easy to say that you reserve, as you do reserve in the Bill, the power of the Licensing Justices to use all the discretionary authority they have at the present time, but is it not perfectly obvious that the fact of enabling County Councils to buy public houses for the purpose of extinguishing them will set up two methods of extinguishing licences, one the rival of the other? There will be the old method of refusing to renew without compensation, and there will be the other method of buying up the licences with full compensation. Can anybody doubt that when these are alongside of each other, these two different methods, one which appears to be compassionate and kindly, and the other which appears by contrast to be harsh and unfeeling, the sympathy of the public will go in the direction of buying or giving compensation, instead of in the direction of refusing to renew the licence, as has heretofore been the rule. It cannot be otherwise, and when right hon. Gentlemen sitting on the Treasury Bench point with exultation to the fact that the legal position is intended to be reserved, they entirely forget the moral effect of a law of this kind. Suppose, for example, they carry their proposition, and give County Councils the power of granting and renewing licences, and at the same time give them the power of buying licences, is it not obvious that the County Councils will practically be disabled from using the most beneficial power of refusing renewal of licences, but will be driven by public opinion into the use of the power of purchase? That is the view of my constituents. A public meeting in Dumfries has condemned the proposals of the Government. Is it a statesman-like course to force upon Scotland a clause of this character? Hon. Gentlemen opposite know perfectly well that a majority of two to one, perhaps a great deal more than two to one, of the Scotch Members are resisting this Bill. Why is it that in a matter of this kind they insist on ruthlessly using their majority, without taking the trouble to come in and hear what our arguments are? We have been told by the President of the Local Government Board that the Government do not regard this Bill as a final settlement of the matter, that before the introduction of the Bill they received no hint, either from the brewers or the publicans, or any branch of the trade, that any of the provisions of the Bill were wanted, and that a general Bill, dealing with the entire question of compensation, will be introduced before long. Under these circumstances, it requires some ingenuity to understand what can be the motive of the Government in the dogged determination they seem to evince to impose the Bill upon the reluctant Members for Scotland. My belief is that the real reason is not to be found merely in what I may call a feeling of pride, but in the fact that the public house trade, like other trades, is keen enough to scent an advantage. It did not take the trade long to find out that the Bill contained within it a principle which would make it very difficult hereafter to interfere, in any manner, with their trade, and they have, no doubt, put on the Government pressure, pressure of that character which is understood when it comes from keen and strong political supporters. Although it may have been brought in in the cause of temperance, the Bill has now become nothing more than a flagrant job in the interest of the owners of public house prosperity, and I believe that, if the Government do persevere with it, it will prove to be as disastrous to them as it will be injurious to the best interests of the country.

\(6.20.)* MR. MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbright): My hon. and learned Friend has pointed out when this Bill passes there will be two methods of putting down public houses, and he maintains that the Local Authority will, no doubt, still exercise their authority, but they will be very unwilling to do so. I contend that they will be more willing to do so than before, because they will not only have the law on their side, but they will have a certain amount of money with which to assist people to get out of their public houses. Then the hon. and learned Gentleman complained that English opinion is continually voting down Scotch opinion. [Cheers.] Hon. Gentlemen who cheer must know that Scotch opinion very often rules down English opinion. If it were not for the Irish and Scotch opinion, I should like to know what would be the position of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Just what it is.

*MR. MARK STEWART: Just what it is means 150 votes upon a Division, and instead of the Government winning by 4 votes to-night, their majority would have been more like 154. The hon. and learned Gentleman also complained that the Conservative Members were not present to listen to his arguments, but if he looked around him he would have found that the Opposition Benches were comparatively empty.

MR. R. T. REID: I did not complain that Conservative Members did not listen to what I said, but that they never listened to what any Scotch Member said.

*MR. MARK STEWART: With the exception of a few minutes, when I was called out of the House, I sat through the whole of the hon. and learned Gentleman's remarks. Reference has been made to the Petitions presented to the House, but we know very well how Petitions are manufactured. Again, we know how public meetings are called together. People do not care to differ with what is said at meetings, but when a poll takes place things are very different. Besides, all the Petitions are not on one side; only yesterday a Petition from Scotland, signed by between 40,000 and 50,000 people, was presented in favour of the proposals; and I never recollect receiving so many Petitions in favour of any Government measure. It is quite possible that a large number of licences may be done away with by this Bill. It may only be necessary to give some people who are turned out of their public houses, £50 or £100, but the granting of this compensation, or, properly speaking, purchase money, would take the edge off the feeling in the country, that it would be a hard thing to turn men out of their houses without giving them some recompense. It is said that a man gets a licence for nothing, but immediately obtains a large profit thereby. But the man pays for the licence he gets; although he does get his certificate for nothing. He has to pay a heavy duty in order to trade, and if you allow him to trade you sanction his business. Under all the circumstances, I shall oppose this Amendment.

(6.28.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): There are great differences between Scotland and England and Wales, which, I think, should be pointed out at the earliest opportunity. The first difference is the enormous strength and universality of the feeling on this question in Scotland as expressed not indistinctly by the Divisions in this House. I am not exaggerating when I say that on what was practically the Second Reading Division, a Division far less favourable than that Second Reading Division which we got early in the 1st clause, and still less favourable than that third Second Reading Division which we got this afternoon—I am not exaggerating when I say that even in the most unfavourable of these Divisions, there were, taking the pairs into account, 46 Scotch Members against the Bill to 23 for it. These 23 not only included the devoted adherents of the Government who, from Party motives we can all respect, stuck to the Government in their difficulty, but included several official Members. The hon. Member who who has just spoken says that resolutions have been passed at public meetings, and Petitions have been signed, under misapprehension of the nature of this Bill, but I will venture to say no Scotch Member thinks his countrymen do not understand this question most thoroughly, and also the nature of this monopoly, from which the holders derive large gains each year; from a monopoly not given, as in times past monopolies were supposed to be given, for public service, and for which this Bill will provide compensation by payment of a capital sum. The Scotch people understand this question, and the great mass of the people suffer from the drink traffic. I do not exaggerate when I say the feeling is universal in Scotland among the mass of the people against this Bill; there is a difference of degree in the opinion in Scotland and in England, and, strong as the feeling may be in England, it is stronger in Scotland. There is this distinction, too, which I hope Members will keep in view, that we are in a position of advantage in proposing a diversion of these funds from the purpose proposed in the Bill. When English Members make similar proposals, they are under the disadvantage of proposing the appropriation of money to purposes for which they have to invent the machinery. But we, thanks to the hon. Member for Aberdeen (Dr. Hunter), and the hon. Member for the College Division (Dr. Cameron), have at the moment the machinery for the distribution in excellent working order. We have the machinery for making payment of fees in Scotch schools, and we do not ask now to set up new machinery for public expenditure, but only for more money to be devoted to a purpose of great utility, and by machinery we have now at work. We would have fees abolished, and make education free in every school throughout Scotland, and in every standard, compulsory and non-compulsory alike. I take it, we may all safely vote for this Amendment, which goes against the clause as a whole, and, if we should carry this Amendment, and the Government should go on with the Bill, it would be easy to frame Amendments to enable the whole of the money to be devoted to the payment of fees in elementary schools. But it is quite another matter when this Amendment is passed, and we come to the second Amendment of my hon. Friend. I must own that that Amendment will place many of us in a great difficulty, because the great feeling among Scotch Members is in favour of applying this money to the extinguishing of fees in fee-paying schools, and, therefore, I hope my hon. Friend (Mr. Williamson) will alter his Amendment so as to enable us to take a vote upon that proposal. But the present Amendment is directed to defeating that part of the clause to which we all object—that is to say, to applying this money to buying up public houses. What a preposterous proposal is that now before us! In Scotland there are 15,400 licences to 3,750,000 of people, a proportion of one to every 212 people, very nearly the proportion in England where it is one to every 202 inhabitants. I only call attention to this because it enables us to get at the minimum cost of a public house in Scotland. We know that in England it is, roughly speaking, £2,000, and I assume that in Scotland it is about the same, or say, an average of £2,000, for Scotland is a country at least as rich as England. Now, Glasgow will receive, so far as I can see, an eighth of the sum allotted to Scotland, or £5,000; so, in order to reduce the licensed houses in Glasgow by 10 per cent. we must wait 80 years. But that is not all, because as licences are reduced, by the process admirably explained by my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Reid) they become gradually, and indeed rapidly in some cases, more valuable. My hon. and learned Friend did not put the case so strongly as he might have done, for the gross earnings of an extinguished public house will become the net gains of the remaining houses; the staff and machinery of the remaining houses remain as they were, and the trade transferred from the bought-up house becomes a net gain added to the existing trade. The hon. Member for Kirkcudbright (Mr. M. Stewart) says the number of licences will be reduced because the men in smaller houses will be willing to take small sums to get out of the business; but, on the contrary, I believe if this Bill passes you will do away with the natural process of putting down public houses on public grounds, which now goes on much faster than some Members seem to think. I am glad to think that the increase of temperance feeling, the increase of public spirit among the wealthier classes, is leading to a public spirited suppression of drink shops by landlords, even when this means a loss to the landlord's income. But now, when you establish the principle that the giving up of a licence should be accompanied by compensation, men will be less willing on public grounds to give up the profit of the trade, and will hold out for compensation. The hon. Member laughs at the idea of public house occupiers profiting by the misconducting of their houses; but I have no doubt that if County Councils use the Bill at all they will use it to put down the worst houses, and in proportion to the evil effect of a house will be the pressure upon a County Council to buy it. I hope every Liberal Member and every Independent Member on the other side will vote with Scotch Members for this Amendment, and after that it will be for Scotch opinion to decide how the fund shall be appropriated.

* 6.42.) MR. SOMERVELL (Ayr, &c.): I will not occupy the time of the Committee at any length in referring to the extraordinary position the right hon. Gentleman has taken up. The Mover of this Amendment asks us to omit these innocent-looking words, with an object in view which he has stated, and the right hon. Gentleman, in supporting the Amendment, appeals to the hon. Member to withdraw the Amendment of which he has given notice, and goes back over well-trodden ground. There was an Amendment moved on the Second Reading stage of the Bill which distinctly brought to issue the questions discussed by the hon. Member for Dumfries and the right hon. Gentleman. We divided on the Second Reading of the Bill on the distinct question whether the money should be divided in the manner provided in this measure or not, and we affirmed the principle in the Bill, and I maintain that it is an abuse of the forms of the House to occupy time in discussing a principle which has already been affirmed by a majority. And what are the arguments used? The hon. and learned Member for Dumfries informs us that public houses in Scotland are worth £20,000,000, and the right hon. Gentleman (Sir G. Trevelyan), absolutely ignorant as to the value of these houses, but desirous of following out the logical law of laying down hypothetical premises argues that because in England a public house is worth £2,000), in Scotland they must, because there are fewer of them, be worth a good deal more. This might be an interesting thesis to discuss before a debating society, but I question if it can have any influence upon a Vote in this House. We desire not to argue upon hypothetical premises, we desire to be instructed upon the facts of the case. The hon. and learned Member for Dumfries, after laying down the fact that public houses in Scotland are worth £20,000,000, occupied himself for some time, as an English lawyer, in discussing the action "Sharp v. Wakefield," and afterwards told us that public house licences are liable to be taken away without any reason, and, therefore, they could have no value at all.

MR. R. T. REID: I said nothing of the kind.

*MR. SOMERVELL: We have had an interesting illustration of putting an abstract proposition into concrete terms. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian set the example, and the hon. Member for Dumfries has followed it, both he and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton, having attempted first to lay down an abstract proposition, and, when they came to a concrete idea, contradicted themselves entirely. Much has been said with regard to the feeling of Scotland on this subject, and we have been told that that feeling is entirely in support of hon. Members opposite. I cannot agree with that proposition at all. A large majority of the signatures in Petitions from Scotland are in favour of this Bill as it passed the Second Reading, and in my own case the leading temperance journal in Scotland has recognised that I was elected after definitely stating that I was in favour of the proposals of the Bill, giving this power to County Councils. This is a definite statement by a leader of the Temperance Party. Undoubtedly a great number of Petitions have been presented against the Bill, but the names on these Petitions appear like Falstaff's ragged regiment again and again. I know one small village which has sent up five Petitions signed by the same persons sometimes as inhabitants, sometimes as Members of the Radical Association, as members of the Ladies Association, as members of the Good Templars Lodge, and so on. Like a theatrical army, they cross the stage and re-appear again under another banner. I have here a letter addressed to me by one of my constituents, a leading member of the Free Church, and prominent in the temperance cause, and who, until 1886, was a prominent member of the then United Liberal Party in the district. He writes—

"Being all my days a temperance man, the wire-pullers of this part have been most anxious that I should do something with the Temperance Party in opposition to the Government measure which they represent for the first time creates a vested interest in a licence. Not only would I not promise to do as they advised, but I stated my opinion that the Bill was an honest attempt on the part of the Government to reduce the number of licences, and as a temperance man that was what I wanted. They hold this is a dodge to pay publicans who are dispossessed the full value of their licences. I, on the other hand, take the word of Mr. Goschen and Mr. Ritchie that those who drink spirits and sell them are to be the compensators. I do not approve of putting a tax on the rate-payers to buy out the publicans, but I see no tendency to do this, and therefore those who wish the Temperance Party to prosper will accept the Government proposals as a boon."

[Cries of "Name."] My correspondent is a prominent member of the Temperance Party, and I will hand the letter to any hon. Member who desires to satisfy his curiosity, but I think I had better follow the example of the hon. Member opposite and not make the name public. After these expressions of opinion I do not think hon. Members opposite are entitled to say that temperance feeling in Scotland is unanimous against the Government proposal. We have been informed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian that the opinion of England has changed since the last election. There is, undoubtedly, at the present time a majority of Members representing Scotland on the other side of the House, and if the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman is correct, for my own part, I am equally entitled to say that those who sit on this side of the House now represent the opinion of the majority of the people of Scotland: Scotch Members opposite have been elected by those who favour local option, anti-vaccination, and all the extreme views of people who place those views before Party or the Empire. But on any broad question the people of Scotland are in accordance with the present policy of Her Majesty's Government. I deny, therefore, that hon. Members opposite are entitled to say that they represent the people of Scotland. But I do not care whether they represent the majority of the people of Scotland or not. The principle of government in this country is government by Party, and the Party to which I belong is at present in the majority in the United Kingdom, and it is the bounden duty, taking this Parliament as representing the people of the United Kingdom, of the Government of the day to introduce and pass legislation which is in accordance with the views of their supporters who sit behind them. When this fact is realised, whether we have been in the past, or whether we are at the moment, representatives of the majority, when the next appeal comes, our Party will be returned by a considerable majority of the sensible people of Scotland. I must apologise for having detained the Committee so long against my intention. I have taken the opportunity to express my views upon the Bill, views which I venture to say are held by a majority of the people of Scotland, and held almost unanimously by the Party to which I belong. I hope the Committee will support the principle which has been laid down on the Second Reading, and pass into law a Bill which is an honest attempt to deal with several vexed questions, and which, when it becomes law, will be realised to be one of the greatest boons bestowed upon the country by Her Majesty's Government.

\(6.57.)* Mr. ASQUITH (Fife, East): I trust that Scotch Members will not be deterred by the minatory tones and gestures of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down from expressing their opinion fully and freely upon this most important clause. The hon. Member appears to be gifted with a buoyant faith in the future of his Party in Scotland, and it is to be hoped, for the credit of his reputation as a political prophet, that his faith is based on more substantial evidence than that which he has brought forward with regard to the opinion of the Temperance Party in that country. He produced a letter from some unnamed correspondent, who is prepared to give a blank cheque to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the President of the Local Government Board, but we should like to know a little more about the antecedents of this remarkably credulous temperance man. As to the hon. Gentleman's confident statement as to the state of public opinion in Scotland, we challenge the hon. Member, and the Party to which he belongs, to give us an opportunity of testing the feeling of Scotland, and as long as they decline to do so we shall continue to assert our right to be considered as the authentic exponents of public opinion in that country. From the evidence which reaches us we know that the people of Scotland are well nigh unanimous, without distinction of Party, in their opposition to these clauses, and in this House we shall offer the most strenuous and unrelenting opposition to them. The history of this Bill and of these two clauses is a chapter of paradoxes. These clauses have been introduced avowedly to promote the cause of temperance. These clauses are bitterly opposed by every temperance organisation in Scotland. These are clauses in support of which there are at this moment—so we are informed—Petitions lying for signature in every gin palace and every public house in Scotland. Her Majesty's Government suppose, at least we must believe so, that they know better than anybody else in the world what will be the effect of their own measure. But I must say it is a curious state of circumstances which obliges them to assume that the Temperance Party on the one hand, and the publicans upon the other, two of the shrewdest, the most energetic, and most hostile bodies of men to be found in the country, are, at one and the same time, victims of one and the same hallucination. It is possible that Her Majesty's Government may be right, and both the teetotalers and publicans are wrong. But I venture to think that the probabilities point in the opposite direction. I assert broadly and explicitly, with reference to this clause, that if it passes into the Statute Book, it will constitute for all time the legislative charter of the liquor trade. The matter lies really in a nutshell. Either there is or there is not, according to the law of Scotland, which is the same as the law of England, a vested interest in the renewal of a licence. If there is not, and we believe there is not, then this clause, for the first time, creates it. If there is now no vested interest in the renewal of a licence, then this Bill creates a power which cannot co-exist with the discretionary power of non-renewal. It is too grotesque an assumption almost for the imagination to make, that in one and the same district, at one and the same time, we are to have two public bodies—I say two, though they will, as we all know, be merged into one in a few years—one of which is exercising the power of refusing the renewal of a licence by a stroke of the pen and without payment of a penny of compensation, while the other, side by side with it, is exercising the power of buying up licences with public money. That is a difficulty which cannot be got over. The President of the Local Government Board may propose any number of saving clauses and provisoes; they will not avail him. I have said and thought many hard things of the Liberal Unionist Party, but I confess my imagination did not grasp the fact that they could have reached such a stage of moral liquefaction as to accept the salve to their consciences which is to be found in the Amendment of the hon. Member for Grimsby. For my part, I do not believe that any Town or County Council in Scotland will use these powers. Still, we are bound, for the purpose of the argument, to assume that the clause will be put in force. If it is enforced, then I unhesitatingly assert that the creation of such a power is wholly inconsistent, and will be found to be irreconcilable with the continued exercise of the discretionary power of withdrawal of licences. Let us look at the other alternative. Suppose there is now, by law, a vested interest in the renewal of licences in some shadowy form or other. Then I assert, and I challenge contradiction, that this Bill for the first time gives to that interest legislative recognition. We have had some remarkable arguments addressed to us in the course of the Debate. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, for instance, believes, as the Attorney General evidently believes, that there is a law in Scotland as in England, giving a vested interest in the renewal of a licence. If he does not believe that, then his arguments are absolutely unmeaning. The Chancellor of the Exchequer laboured this point greatly. I am a great, a respectful admirer of the debating powers of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and I have witnessed with compassion so fertile and ingenious a dialectician reduced, under stress of the duty of supporting this unhappy Bill, to a condition of controversial beggary. What are the arguments of the Chancellor of the Exchequer on this point? He says there is a vested interest by law in the renewal of a licence. Is there any Act of Parliament, or any provision of any Act of Parliament, which creates or recognises such an interest? The Chancellor of the Exchequer cannot find one. Is there any decision of any Court of Law, any dictum of any individual Judge, which countenances the existence of such an interest? The Chancellor of the Exchequer cannot discover anything of the kind. What does he do? He sets to work to scavenge the by-ways of Hansard, and ultimately, after long and painful research, he succeeds in picking out two or three sentences, severed from their context and spoken in a different connection, from speeches made from time to time by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. The right hon. Gentleman has had many compliments paid to him in his time; but I do not know that he has ever had a greater compliment than the suggestion or assumption of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the brewers and distillers of this country, among the shrewdest, most prudent, and enterprising of our traders, have allowed themselves to invest tens and hundreds of millions of capital, not upon the faith of any legislative enactment or legal decision, but in reliance upon two or three sentences, not even upon sentences but upon two or three phrases, not even upon two or three phrases, but upon a particular interpretation of a particular phrase of one of his speeches. That is the argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I am bound to say that, as we might have expected from him, after two or three days' reflection he felt bound to array this unhappy measure in a rather less tattered garment. He came down here—and I observe he repeats the same argument in the newspapers to-day—and he told us that this Bill only extended to an analogous case a principle which was habitually acted upon by Local Authorities all over the country. That argument is worthy a moment's attention. Let us see what it comes to. The Local Authority, Municipal Corporation, or Railway Company, when they take property for the purposes of a street improvement or public undertaking, have to buy out the various interests in the land which they take. If a public house is included in the property taken, they must buy the interest of the freeholder in the soil and in the bricks and in the mortar. They must then deal with the tenant or occupier. If the occupier has a lease, they must compensate him for it. But whether he has a lease or not, they dispossess him, and they are obliged to pay him compensation for the injury he actually sustains by being dispossessed. Suppose he could carry on his business in the next street, the promoters would then only have to pay the cost of his removal. But if the business is annexed to the premises, and not to the person or the reputation of the trader, and would be lost if removed, then, whether the business be that of a publican, butcher, baker, or candlestick maker, the person dispossessed is undoubtedly entitled to compensation, based on a certain number of years' purchase of the goodwill of the business. I observe that the Chancellor of the Exchequer says in his letter—

"Why do not the promoters of the public undertaking wait until the Licensing Session comes round, and then go and oppose the renewal of the publicans' licence?"

And these are the gentlemen who talk about judicial discretion! A nice conception they must have of judicial discretion if they imagine that the Local Authority, which has just paid compensation to every other tradesman in the street, can go before the Magistrates and have the impudence to ask them to refuse to renew the licence of the publican for no other reason than that it would save the ratepayers a few hundreds of pounds. The suggestion is worthy to rank with that of the President of the Local Government Board—that if a publican refuses to sell to the County Council at a fair price under this Bill, the County Council might go before the Licensing Authority and ask that the licence should not be renewed.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I never said that.

*MR. ASQUITH: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. Such is the solidarity of the Cabinet that I am sure he will not object to my attributing to him by inadvertence an argument used by the Home Secretary. My hon. and learned Friend has dealt with the argument of the Attorney General as to what is called the judicial discretion given to the Magistrates. The term judicial discretion is not a cabalistic formula; it is a simple phrase, easy to understand, and not difficult to define. A judicial discretion is a discretion which can only be exercised subject to two conditions: In the first place, it must not be exercised until an opportunity has been given to the party affected of being heard. In the second place—and this is the only other necessary ingredient that I know of—it must be a discretion exercised with reference to facts and considerations which are material and relevant to the duty which has to be discharged. Suppose Justices should resolve that houses with red signboards should get their licences, while those with blue signboards should be refused, that would be a non-judicial exercise of their discretion. In 1870, long before the case of "Sharp v. Wakefield" was heard of, Justice Lush, one of the acutest Judges that ever sat on the English Bench, said—

"The Licensing Acts authorise, and, therefore, by implication, require Justices to govern their discretion in granting or withholding licences, by reference not only to the qualification of the person applying, and the suitability of the house, but to other considerations also. These considerations must include the nature of the locality, the population, the number of houses already licensed, and all other circumstances bearing on the question whether it is fit and proper in the interests of the public, for whose benefit these Acts are passed, that an additional licence should be granted."

These words were spoken in the case of the grant of a new licence. But they were quoted verbatim by the Court of Appeal in "Sharp v. Wakefield," with the comment that the Justices have precisely the same discretion, neither more nor less, and that they ought to be governed by precisely the same considerations, in deciding as to the renewal of licences. I think that is enough to show that the notion that there is any vested interest whatsoever in the renewal of a licence is a pure invention of the imagination. It is not founded upon any provision of the Statute Law, and it is not supported by any judicial decision. It may be asked, and it is a question that ought carefully to be considered, how, in the absence of legal protection, this vast interest has grown up on such precarious foundations. It is due to two causes. It is due, in the first place, to the laxity of the Licensing Authorities in not enforcing the law. I will not deny that this will be an important consideration when we come to a settlement of the question. But I assert, and I shall have the assent even of hon. Gentlemen opposite, that the lax administration of the law cannot possibly give to those who have profited by it a vested interest in the continued neglect in the future by a public authority of its public duty. The second, and, perhaps, equally important factor, in bringing about this state of things is that the Central Authority has exacted a totally inadequate consideration in return for this profitable monopoly. No one can dispute that if we had adopted the Gottenburg system, or if the Legislature had exercised its undoubted power of enormously raising the Licensing Duty, no publican, or brewer, or those who stand behind them would have had the faintest claim to pecuniary compensation. I have never been a member of the extreme Temperance Party; I do not regard alcohol as a poison; nor do I think that publicans ought to be exterminated. I am disposed to think that there is room both for alcohol and for the sellers of alcohol, and for the consumers of alcohol, within the pale of a civilised community. But that is not the question which we have now before us. When the question does arise—and sooner or later it will—I believe everyone who votes against this clause will feel that he has a perfectly free and unfettered hand in considering how far the publican is entitled to claim some measure of indulgence for the lax administration of the law in the past and the loose practices and usages which have prevailed. When that question arises, we shall be perfectly prepared to deal with it. But, meanwhile, we are not going to assent to this Bill, because the effect of it will be that the brewers, publicans, and distillers will hereafter come before us not as suppliants for indulgence, not as petitioners asking as a matter of bounty for an equitable consideration of the circumstances of the past, but as invested for the first time with a legal title and legal status, which it would be confiscation to disregard.

(7.25.) MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Newington, W.): Sir, in my humble judgment the reason why the publicans have been allowed to obtain this vested interest is that no business whatever could be conducted in this country if it were liable to be put an end to at the close of 12 months. The business of the publican is just as lawful as any other business. As to whether the Magistrates have discretion or not, it is clear, I think, that by law they have that discretion. It is quite clear also, that, having that discretion, they never exercised it, because they knew perfectly well that to exercise it would simply be to put an end to a lawful business. That being so, and this business having grown up as a vested interest, it is clear that the people of this country would be against any suggestion of putting an end to that business, whether by the discretion of the Magistrates or Judges. This vested interest having been allowed to grow up, and money having been invested in it, the House of Commons at any rate could not assent to any proposition which would deprive decent and respectable people of their means of livelihood.

(9.30.) MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid.): The hon. Member opposite found fault with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton for not following the logical law of arguing from a premise. I do not quite understand it. But I may, perhaps, be allowed to point out something the hon. Member did. The hon. Member read a letter from one of his own constituents, or read part of a letter, and when we cried out "name," he offered to show the letter to any Member of the House who had the curiosity to see it. Well, Sir, I had the curiosity to ask to see that letter, but he only offered to let me see a portion of it, and tore off half the letter, which I declined to look at.

An hon. MEMBER: It was a private letter.

MR. PHILIPPS: I do not see how you can say a letter was private that was offered to be shown to anyone in the House.

An hon. MEMBER: There were private portions of it.

MR. PHILIPPS: At any rate, the offer was made generally. Well, Sir, the hon. Member for Ayr has talked about the abuse of the forms of the House. Having only been here two years, I will not attempt to discuss questions of abuse of the forms of the House with hon. Members of the ripe experience of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Ayr. He complained that in some village, the name of which was not given, the people opposed to this Bill had been so frequent in their Petitions, that they had signed them in various capacities; but, so far as I understand his complaint, it was that the men did not sign as women, nor the women as men, nor the children as men or women. But I understand that there was another Petition from North Britain which does not err in any of those respects. The hon. Member also talked about Scotch feeling. If there is one thing I am clear about, it is the feelings of my own constituency, especially the Liberal Unionists in that constituency. Since this Bill was brought in, I have had numerous letters from those Liberal Unionists, saying that, having seen this Bill, they will never again support the Unionist Government. I think the Scotch case ought to be treated separately from that of England, inasmuch as for many years Scotland has enjoyed a separate legislation of its own, namely, Sunday closing; so that there are strong reasons why Scotland should be exempted from the provisions of this Bill. The notion of compensation for licences taken away is entirely repugnant to Scotch feeling, and in Scotland we have a strong precedent in a case wherein licences were taken away without compensation. I allude to the case of the Sheriff's officers and messengers of the Courts of Scotland. These officers are the only persons who could serve writs and make arrests for debts, and there are at least as many of them as there are publicans in Scotland. These officers are licensed, and their licences are granted under very strict conditions; they have to satisfy the Judge as to their character and fitness, and I believe the Judges are not easily satisfied. The licences are only obtained with great difficulty, the licencees having to find two sureties, who give bond for them. This system dated from as far back as the year 1424, and the licences were not for one year only, but, in legal phraseology, ad vitam aut culpam. This is a much stronger case than that of the publicans' licences. But by the Citation Act of 1881, and also owing to imprisonment for debt being abolished at the same time, these people are practically ruined, two-thirds of their business, at least, having been taken away from them. This was done only nine years ago, and they have received no compensation. If the Government have money to spare they ought to give it to those Sheriff's officers and messengers of the Court rather than to the publicans. We have heard about compensation to "the poor publicans," but it is the rich brewers whom the Government have in their eye. Suppose the Bill leads to the lessening of licences by 5 per cent., is there any compensation in the Bill for the barmaids, the pot-boys, and publicans' servants who will be thrown out of work? The pretence of the "poor publicans" is absolutely ridiculous, and will impose only upon those who do not know better. If there is anything which the Government care about, it is making property secure. There is certainly less reason for compensating the publicans of Scotland than anywhere else, because, in the Licensing Court of Scotland, the landlord of licensed premises has no locus standi; the Court will not listen to him. In conclusion, I can only express my agreement with the Mover of this Amendment, that, instead of money being given to compensate rich publicans and brewers, it may be applied in the relief of school rates for the benefit of the poorer people of Scotland. Compensation to the publicans is a matter which might well be left to the Scotch people to settle for themselves at some future day, through their own Representatives. We want to leave this Licensing Question over to be settled by the County Councils, and I can assure the House that, whatever the voice of England may be on this question, the voice of Scotland is practically unanimous against those proposals.

(7.38.) MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): The discussion has hitherto not proceeded upon the line of discussing the Amendment before the Committee. If I understand it aright, the effect of passing the Amendment would be to destroy the clause, and the amount for police superannuation and the £40,000 for educational purposes would be gone. ["No!"] I should be unable to vote for the Amendment if that would be the effect of it. On the other hand, the position of Scotland with respect to licences and their extinction is very different from that of England or Ireland. In Ireland, I believe, a legal right exists to have a 12 months' licence renewed. In England there may be an equitable right to have such a licence renewed for 12 months' longer; but it has not yet been decided whether that legal right amounts to a vested interest. But in Scotland the equitable right is non-existent, or, if it exists at all, is much weaker than in England. Therefore, there is a very strong feeling in Scotland against this proposal. How that feeling had grown up is another question; but a very large part of it, I believe, has arisen from the fact that the state of the case, as put in the Bill, has not been fairly represented. From the letters I have received from various constituents I find that the impression has been sown broadcast over the land that it is proposed to create a vested interest where no vested interest exists. Therefore it is material to consider whether a vested interest is created by the Bill. The Government have made a distinct statement that no change is made in the law, and that they are willing to accept the Amendment put on the Paper by the right hon. Member for Grimsby. If that Amendment does not make the matter clear, I hope the Government will go further. For myself I cannot vote for this Amendment, because it would not merely affect the compensation proposals of the Government, but the superannuation of the police. ["No, no!"]

(7.45.) THE CHAIRMAN: As this appears to be a point in dispute, I must say that the effect of the Amendment before the Committee would be to destroy the apportionment altogether, both as regards the compensation to publicans and the police superannuation.

MR. R. T. REID: May I ask, as a point of order, whether, if this Amendment be passed, it would be competent to the Committee to agree to the succeeding Amendments?

THE CHAIRMAN: I think not.

*MR. C. S. PARKER (Perth): The object of the Amendment is to provide money not only for fishery harbours nock in, but also for the relief of school fees.

MR. R. T. REID: May I ask, as a point of order, whether, instead of adopting the language of the hon. Member for Kilmarnock in his Amendment, other language embodying his objects might be adopted?

MR. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): Supposing the Amendment is lost, would the various Amendments on the Paper qualifying this sub-section still be in order?

THE CHAIRMAN: If the Amendment is lost, all the Amendments to this sub-section would still be retained.

MR. SINCLAIR: I am satisfied by your ruling that I am right in interpreting the effect of the Amendment as I have already done. Therefore the Scotch Members will doubtless re-consider their position and decline to vote for this Amendment, as destructive of the grants for superannuation and education. For my own part, I am unable to vote for the Amendment, although I cannot vote for the application of this £50,000 for the compensation of publicans.

THE CHAIRMAN: In answer to the hon. Member for Dumfries, I may say that it would not be competent for the Committee to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Armagh in substance or in form.

*(7.50.) MR. J. C. BOLTON (Stirling): I desire, Sir, to draw attention to a few facts connected with this licensing question. I would remind the Committee that legislation for Scotland respecting the control and management of the liquor traffic has hitherto proceeded on different lines from those adopted in England; for instance, in Scotland we have had Sunday closing for upwards of 40 years, while in England there is no Sunday closing at all. Moreover, the year before last, a section of Scotch Members, headed by the Member for the College Division of Glasgow, obtained for the Licensing Authority of Scotland power to sanction a proposal for closing the public houses at an earlier hour. And that proposal has been adopted in Scotland. Moreover, Scotland has been dealt with in a different manner from England in respect of grants in aid, only a year ago, we were allowed in Scotland to devote for educational purposes a large portion of the advance made from the Probate Duty, whereas in England that advance can only be applied to the reduction of the poor's rate. The assent of this House to such an application of the fund in Scotland was given as a concession to the demand of the Scotch Representatives on behalf of the population of Scotland generally. Why should not a similar course be taken on this occasion? The Scotch people are practically unanimous in their objection to any portion of this money being applied to public house compensation. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, who recently in no uncertain terms expressed his anxiety at all times to defer to public opinion, has now an opportunity of proving the sincerity of that statement. The fact that only 23 Scotch Members are in favour of the Government proposals, while 46 are opposed to them, shows very clearly that public opinion in Scotland, as represented in this House, is as two to one against the Government; and I think if we could appeal to the Scotch people on the subject, we should find that the proportion would be not two to one, but four to one against these proposals. What harm, I ask, could be done to anyone outside Scotland if in this matter the Government adopted the same course as was taken on the Local Government Bill? We only ask that money which we ourselves have contributed should be devoted to such purposes as we ourselves prefer, we abhor—and I am sure the word is not too strong—we abhor and detest the idea of devoting money raised from the Scotch taxpayers to the compensation of publicans. I confess that something may be said in favour of the Government proposal with regard to England, because the fact that a majority of the English Representatives support the Government is some justification for their action in regard to England. A good deal has been said about Petitions from Scotland. I have only been able to find nine Scotch Petitions in favour of this measure, while there have been hundreds presented against it. In Glasgow, with a population of 500,000, to which, if you add the suburbs, which are as much a part of Glasgow as Westminster is a part of London, the number will be increased to 800,000, only 1,800 signatures could be obtained in favour of this Bill; and it has been pointed out by the Petitions Committee that a great many of the signatures appear to have been written in one hand. A great deal has been said in respect to the discretion exercised by the Magistrates in regard to the transfer and renewal of licences. I have been a Magistrate in Scotland for about 40 years, and have never known any difficulty arising from the action of the Magistrates in these matters. Whenever it has seemed desirable to reduce the number of public houses, we have done so without hesitation, and we have refused frequently the transfer of a licence from one owner to another, even when the transfer of the house has already taken place. And, notwithstanding all this, I have never heard any mention of a demand for compensation until recent times. If, however, this Bill should pass, I am confident that it will absolutely confer on all licensed holders in all cases the right to compensation. Even if not a legal right, you will confer a moral right that no Licensing Bench will set aside. Under these circumstances, I feel bound to oppose the clause.

*(8.1.) MR. SEYMOUR KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): Notwithstanding the observation of my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk (Mr. W. P. Sinclair), that as the admission of these words would destroy the clause altogether he would not engage to vote for them, I am of opinion that the desirableness of destroying the clause is so great that it will be proper to vote for the Amendment. Hon. Members opposite who, having spoken this evening, have now left their places, twitted us with the way in which we are continuing the Debate. I think we on our side are quite justified in feeling amazement at the passionate way in which the Government are pressing forward this clause in the Bill. They are doing so not only against their political opponents, but against the wishes of their own supporters. We have indications that even Party ties are very severely strained under the present state of things. We have seen to-night, for example, that hon. Gentlemen opposite think nothing of leaving for Ascot unpaired, although the result has been a very narrow escape for their own Party. I believe there are many hon. Members on the other side of the House who are undesirous that their names should appear in the Division List in favour of the different clauses of this Bill, especially now that that which was a Compensation Bill has been turned into a Compensation by Closure Bill. The only Division which has not been effected by means of the Closure has been that of this evening. To-day the Papers circulated with the Votes were double the usual bulk, in consequence of their containing the list of Petitions received against the Bill. I find that the number of Petitions against compensation is 2,228, and that the signatures number 62,500, whilst the Petitions in favour of compensation number nine, and there are 2,700 signatures. The Unionist Press, hitherto the strongest supporters of the Government, are not with them with regard to the present Bill. The leading paper in my own constituency, namely, the Elgin Courant and Courier, which, during my election last October, strongly supported my Liberal Unionist opponent and opposed me, spoke a few days ago of the Compensation Clauses as "the sting in the Bill." How did the Government explain their persistency? We have been told that the publicans and the brewers have not been pressing them. The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) said before this Committee—

"The Government has never received, either from the publicans or the brewers, the slightest hint that any proposals such as those brought forward by the Government, were desired by their trade."

The Government must admit that the country is not generally pressing them, but I observe that the recognised leading organ of the liquor trade, the Morning Advertiser, does not tell the same tale as the Government. In a leading article on the 19th of last month that newspaper, speaking of the Amendment placed on the Paper by the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord R. Churchill), said the acceptance of his Amendment—

"Would be a distinct breach of faith with the trade who, on the understanding that the principles of the Licensing Bill would not be substantially altered, have refrained from offering opposition."

Of course, I do not for a moment allege that the President of the Local Government Board knowingly deceived the House, but he must remember there may have been communications passing of which he was not aware. There are very many Tory managers who know the Metropolis thoroughly, and they know full well that it was the publicans' influence that turned the scale in London in 1885 and gave five-sixths of the representation of the Metropolis to the Tory Party. The fact is, the present Government, for the first time perhaps in the history of this country, is endeavouring to turn this Parliamentary legislative machine into a huge electioneering agency. They depend upon three classes—the parsons, the landlords, and the publicans. They want the parsons to be canvassers for their Party, and so they bring in a Tithes Bill. They want the landlords to canvass for them, and they bring in a Land Purchase Bill. They want the publicans to canvass for them, and they bring in this present measure. There is no doubt this clause represents a desire to run with the hare and hunt with the hounds. The framers of the Bill thought, no doubt with truth, that the great increase in the Drink Bill, as shown by the last Budget, would alarm the temperance people. They therefore determined to give them a sop by raising the tax on drink. The publicans, however, said "No; to increase the tax on liquor is to damage our profits." The Government replied, "We will not damage your profits, because, out of every 1s. we raise, we will put 4d. into your private pocket." "Done with you," says the publican; "we will agree to that, and we will offer no opposition to the raising of the tax on drink." I hope the Government will give the Committee some explanation as to whether there is any foundation for the statement that an understanding of this kind was arrived at. I want to know how it is the publicans have acquired such a power in the Councils of the Government. The cause, I think, is to be found in the enormous extension of the system of tied houses.

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not see how that applies to this Amendment.

MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: Perhaps I should have explained my reason for bringing on this subject. I am going to show the magnitude of the income of the publican and the component parts of which it is made up, in order to prove that that income is the very last thing in the world which the nation should compensate out of the public taxes. We may suppose that a house costs £6,000 in the public house market. A publican, especially in London—

THE CHAIRMAN: Obviously the hon. Member is still more out of order. He is arguing the question with reference to London. This clause applies to Scotland.

*MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: Well, I was not laying any stress upon that, but I am bound to say my figures relate to London. Am I in order in pointing out how the publican gets his political power by means of his income? It comes about in this way. A brewer lends him £4,500 and the man himself provides £1,500. The result is that the publican becomes absolutely dependent upon the value of his licence for every penny of the £1,500 provided by him out of his small private fortune. It is obvious that the mortgagee—the brewer—will not even get his £4,500 in the event of the extinction of the licence, while the entire £1,500 of the publican will be lost. The publican will, therefore, vote, of course, for the authority, who will tell him that he will get compensation and that his £1,500 will be saved. That is the reason I had for bringing in the question of the income of the publican. I would venture to call the attention of the Government to the fact that while they assert that their whole motive in this matter is the promotion of the cause of temperance—or, in other words, that they will not hesitate to do a thing which may be more or less detrimental to the drink traffic—the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) is much more candid. At Walsall a short time ago he used these words—

"Up to now this great class"

—the publicans and brewers—

"have successfully intimidated Governments and successfully intimidated Members of Parliament. In fact they have directly overthrown two Governments, and I do not blame the Government for being a little timid of meddling with them."

That, at all events, is a thoroughly honest statement of the case. As to the expenditure which must be eventually thrown on the country for the purchase of licences, my hon. Friend the Member for Barrow has computed the present marketable value of public houses at £250,000,000, and he has asserted that this sum will become much greater by the passage of this clause. I entirely agree with him, and am certain that the amount may be put at £300,000,000 by the time the Bill passes. The Chancellor of the Exchequer disputed these figures in toto, but the arguments he used against them were wonderfully weak. He read out a list of brewing firms whose shares he said had not risen in value since the month of April. But I am certain that the right hon. Gentleman as a political economist must know that that is an unsound argument. He must know that no one can hypothecate a single £5 note to the benefit of any particular industry or occupation without the reversionary value of that £5 note being felt, in raising the value of the property, if only by a single penny piece. All such adventitious aids in money matters are discounted as soon as money is placed at the disposal of the particular industry or occupation. There is better evidence than the figures which the right hon. Gentleman read out to show that brewery shares are not increasing in value. In Breweries and Distilleries, a paper which was quoted at the commencement of this Debate, it was stated on the 14th of this month—

"Breweries are booming again just now, and last Saturday no fewer than four new issues were made."

Then they go on to say that a sum of some £900,000 which is being raised—

"Will, no doubt, be used in increasing the number of tied houses, the advantage and wisdom of which has been seen in the enormous increase of trade for the last 12 months."

At the last meeting of the firm of Allsopps, the Committee of Investigation laid on the Table a Report, in which they said that—

"The policy of tying houses should be continued and increased, and they recommended that money should be raised for that purpose."

The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, speaking on the English Clause, was at a loss to know how the setting aside of this money for the purpose of extinguishing licences could possibly have the effect of encouraging the consumption of drink. His words were very strong, indeed, on that subject. He said—

"I deeply regret that the Government should be at issue with any people whom they desire to conciliate. Speaking honestly and sincerely, I cannot conceive on what ground and with what object the so-called Temperance Party are opposing the Government in so bitter and hostile a manner."

I think I can give the hon. Member some information in this matter. We think that the application of this money in the manner proposed will make the reduction of public houses so difficult as to be practically impossible, because it could only be done by fining the localities to be benefitted. In a town with 400 public houses, in all probability, if the people got the licensing into their own hands they would reduce the number to 300. That can and will very shortly be done without this Bill; but we say that the reduction which would be effected by the Bill would be only to 390 or 399. That is why we say the passing of the Bill will have no effect in decreasing the consumption of drink. I do not think the President of the Local Government Board can suppose that the publicans are not possessed of any desire for self preservation. Self immolation is at no time a pleasant thing, and the right hon. Gentleman will not expect it from any ordinary human being—not even from a publican. If it were otherwise, there would be no truth in the Persian proverb, with which my residence in the East has made me familiar, namely, that in a Council of Lions we do not expect an ordinance to be passed forbidding the having of lamb for breakfast. I wish to show why compensation is unjust and unnecessary, and for that purpose I want the Committee to inquire how the enormous value of £250,000,000 arises. There are three reasons, all of a strictly financial character, against compensation being considered a thing which could be justly given for the termination of this monopoly. In the first place, the whole value is created not by the operation of trade or industry, but by a sort of triple monopoly. There are three sets of unearned increment. The first is due to the fact that liquor is an enormously highly taxed and consequently high-priced article. If the Committee will take any very expensive articles, such as diamonds, they will see that the fact of an enormous money capital being required to deal in an article has in itself the effect of throwing the trade into the hands of capitalists, pure and simple, and the consequence is that the limited class who conduct the trade are able to charge the public higher prices than they could otherwise do. Of course, the high price of liquor is further increased by the fact of a licence being required for a public house. And it is, again, still further increased by the monopoly of the tied houses. I may, perhaps, be allowed to illustrate my point by referring to another article which is also enormously taxed, and which becomes in consequence enormously valuable. I allude to salt in India—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I have endeavoured to follow the hon. Member's arguments and have failed to see their application. The illustration does not add to their clearness.

*MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: I will not pursue the argument, but perhaps I may be allowed to state the result. The result is that when we tax salt 2,000 per cent. we throw it into the hands of bankers and capitalists, and whilst they pay the revenue £7,000,000 a year in taxation it is proved by Official Returns that they mulct the people of India no less than £28,000,000 for the article they sell. I hold that the tax on spirits has exactly the same effect. The trade is thrown into the hands of capitalists, who by combining against the consumers are able to realise an immense percentage of profit annually. Between 30 and 40 years ago, when the tax on Scotch Whisky was only a third of what it is now, and the tax on Irish whisky only a fourth, there were none of these enormous values of public houses, and none of these enormous systems of tied houses, nor were such vast fortunes made by brewers and distillers. Things have now altered. The trade has been thrown into the hands of capitalists who are much more able to combine against the public than were their predecessors. The cost of good blended malt whisky at the distillery at this moment is only 3s. a gallon. Let me add, as an average over England, 1s. a gallon for carriage, and the tax of 10s. a gallon. This brings the cost up to 14s. a gallon. Unadulterated it could be sold at the present rate of 21s. a gallon, and produce a profit of 33 per cent. to the publican. This, therefore is the first unearned increment. It appears from a recent trial in Edinburgh that it is the custom of the trade to add water, so as to raise the 33 per cent. profit to 66 per cent. profit on every gallon of whisky sold. In other words, the actual practice of the liquor trade is that if a poor man pays 6d. for a certain adulterated mixture, 2½d. of the 6d. goes to the Exchequer, and 3½d. to the publican, in the form of profit, while the poor man only gets a halfpenny worth of whisky for his 6d. The same thing occurs with regard to beer. The public pays 2s. 8d. for a gallon of beer, which, with the tax included, costs only 10d. Perhaps gentlemen opposite may say the law could stop and prohibit all this adulteration. The law, however, is not enforceable, simply because the enormous gains realised by this fraud are such a temptation to the publican as to make him defy all the penalties which the law can place upon him. Under these circumstances, it is not in the least wonderful that the market price of public houses should have gone up to the enormous figure of £250,000,000 or £300,000,000. But it is monstrous that when this is the state of facts, we should be asked to allow the publican to capitalise his enormous and, in many respects, illicit gains, and then go to the Public Treasury and take away at one haul the whole of the capitalised value of the gigantic yearly income out of which he has been able thus to cheat the public. I say that the large profits realised by public houses constitute of themselves the compensation for which the publican willingly runs the undoubtedly considerable risk of having his licence withdrawn. I can further illustrate this point by mentioning a monopoly within a monopoly existing in the drink trade. Messrs. Spiers and Pond have a very lucrative monopoly within a monopoly. They have the monopoly of selling drink at certain railway stations, and they take advantage of it to charge the public double the price, in many cases, for which they can get the same thing at the public house next door. If anyone here has ever gone into one of their bars on the Underground Railway, and asked for a glass of sherry he will have noticed that he has had to pay double the usual price, or else he gets a glass half the usual size. I want to ask the Government whether, if the Railway Company put a stop to this monopoly, Messrs. Spiers and Pond would be entitled to demand from the company the capitalised value of their business?

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! That has no bearing whatever on the question.

*MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: I will not pursue the subject further. In fact, my illustration was at an end. My general point is that the income derived from this monopoly, whether the monopoly be terminable in one year or five, is in itself the compensation which the monopolist expects, and that he is not entitled to ask for the capitalised value of that income if his monopoly be withdrawn. (8.49.)

(9.20.) MR. M'LAGAN (Linlithgow): I am quite willing to allow the Government the credit of an honest attempt on behalf of temperance, by reducing the amount of drunkenness, but we want an actual reduction in the number of licensed houses, and the plan of the Government will simply check the reduction which is now going on. True, increase in the price of alcoholic liquors reduces consumption, and this reduction has followed increase in duty; but then, again, consumption follows the rise and fall of wages. We want, I say, a reduction in the number of public houses, and I maintain we are able to accomplish this more rapidly by the present system in Scotland than we shall be able to do under the method contemplated by the Government. In the first place, the amount placed at the disposal of County Councils is inadequate for the purchase of many houses, and many years must elapse before any sensible reduction can be effected by this means. Then, as you reduce the number of houses you will increase the reluctance of the remaining proprietors to give up their trade, and the compensation demanded will rise as houses are diminished in number, the funds of the County Councils becoming in proportion more inadequate. Call it compensation or purchase the thing is the same, public money passes into the hands of licence holders. An hon. Baronet opposite has assured the Committee that he would vote against compensation, but he supports the Bill; but he must admit that with the passing of the Bill publicans will have a higher vantage ground, and will appeal to Parliamentary recognition of the value of their licences as an addition to their claim for compensation. It is far from my wish to act unjustly toward licence holders; but I bear in mind the fact that licences are not permanently granted, and each year the holder of the privilege or monopoly makes a large profit over the expenses of his business within that period. I do not think there is much sympathy to be excited for those who, in the public welfare, are required to give up a licence to which they have no special claim. With the growth of temperance opinions in this city and elsewhere we see a large increase in the number of coffee houses, a trade in which profits are large, and a licence holder, being deprived of his licence, can carry on the business of a refreshment house with profit to himself and advantage to his customers. I object to the proposals in the Bill for several reasons. They will perpetuate the system of licensed houses in the country which, by the voice of the people, is being gradually done away with. In the train of evils following the public house system are poverty, crime, and consequent increase in rates. I could mention places in Scotland where the withdrawal of licences has led directly to the fall of police and poor rates. I object to the Bill as an obstacle to the progress of the temperance movement. Public opinion in Scotland is far in advance of public opinion in England on this subject. My hon. Friend the Member for Stirlingshire (Mr. Bolton) has shown this, and I need not go over the same ground. There is no doubt of the fact, and if you want to put down public houses, you have only to put power into the hands of the people and they will make short work of it. A plébiscite has been taken in a hundred towns and villages in Scotland, and the result has been an expression of opinion in the population of 12 to 1 in favour of putting down licensed public houses and giving the authority for this to the people themselves. The Bill is an obstacle and a difficulty in the path the people desire to pursue; it maintains a system disastrous to the country and ruinous in its tendencies. When we come to the next Amendment we shall prove that there are other objects to which we can more usefully apply the funds at our disposal. I intend to do everything in my power to oppose this Bill, and I believe that since the passing of the Reform Bill there has not been so much excitement in Scotland against any measure as exists against this Bill.

(9.30.) MR. J. WILSON (Govan): I very much sympathise with what has been said by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgowshire. No one who listened to the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he brought in his Budget would have supposed that the right hon. Gentleman had anything else than a pious horror at the amount of the evil entailed on the country by the enormous amount of money placed at his disposal through the drink traffic, and that the difficulty was how to get rid of the evils of intemperance. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, in one of his speeches, said he was surprised at the opposition of the Temperance Party to these proposals of the Government to reduce the number of licences. Why, Sir, the Temperance Party have been resisting and protesting in almost every Licensing Court throughout the country, for half a century, against any increase in the number of licences. We cannot blame the Temperance Party for having no sympathy with the Government on this occasion, because this Bill is seeking to give the trade a vested interest by a process of compensation for licences which it was never held to be entitled to in the past. We do not object to anything in the Bill except the compensation clauses. We should welcome the Bill if the Government could see fit to alter, so far as Scotland is concerned, the destination of the money intended to be applied to the buying up of licences. A few evenings ago the President of the Local Government Board spoke of the floor of the House being inundated with Petitions and telegrams against the Bill. He said that the telegrams all came from the same source. They do, and the source is the Temperance Party in Scotland, and if the Government persist in pressing their proposals they will have to reckon with no mean power so far as the Scotch constituencies are concerned. A right hon. Gentleman spoke to-night of the strong feeling in Scotland on this matter. The feeling in Scotland is much stronger than in England, and my right hon. Friend desired to know how it was that the people of Scotland were so much against the Government proposals. Now, Sir, as a temperance reformer of many years' experience, I may say that the public feeling and sentiments in Scotland is largely due to the efforts of the United Temperance Party in the country. We hear hon. Members opposite speaking of the Petitions sent to them in favour of this Bill, and the President of the Board of Trade has, on more than one occasion, referred to the letters he has had, but I will undertake to say that, so far as Scotland is concerned, the Petitions received by Scotch Members have been overwhelmingly against the proposals of the Government, and as to mass meetings, I think that after what has been said by my right hon. Friend with reference to the meeting at Bridgeton, little need be added. On a recent occasion the publicans made an attempt to hold an open-air meeting in Glasgow, and at that meeting an Amendment was proposed by the Temperance Party, and carried over the heads of those who had convened the gathering. I think it is a fact that in no Parliament have so many Petitions from so many interests throughout the country been presented against any Bill as there have been against this. In a speech which he delivered to-night, the hon. Member for the Ayr Burghs said he felt sure that if the opinion of the people of Scotland could be ascertained, and if an election took place, there would be returned to this House a large majority of Members in favour of the proposals of the Government. I do not think that Members on this side of the House would shrink from such a test; indeed, they would deem the battleground well chosen. Whatever might be the result in Ayr Burghs, I believe that throughout the length and breadth of Scotland there would be such a unanimous expression of opinion as would startle the right hon. Gentleman who is in charge of this Bill. The hon. Member, in speaking of a meeting of the Temperance Party that was held in Ayr, cited a statement by one of the members of the Scotch Temperance League, and stated that that body had stultified itself in reference to the question of petitioning against this measure by having returned a right hon. Member to Parliament as their Member. But at a large meeting held in Ayr, last week—called by the two Political Parties, so far as the temperance community is concerned, and held in the largest hall in the town—the rev. Mr. Duncan, an Established Church minister, proposed a resolution to the effect that the meeting protested against the proposals of the Government in the Local Taxation (Duties) Bill for extinguishing existing licences by purchase, as that proposal would practically create a vested interest in licences to which no claim could be established either in law or in equity. In the course of his speech, the mover of that resolution said he was a supporter of the Government at the last election in the Burghs; but if another election occurred upon these proposals he would unhesitatingly vote against them. The motion was seconded by one of the Town Councillors in Ayr, and was supported by Mr. Johnston, a Liberal Unionist, who said—

“He had been a supporter of the present Government, and felt it was unfair, after having helped the Government to their present position, that they should use their power and their majority for this purpose and saddle remorselessly this injustice on the country. Lord Hartington, whom he regarded as his leader, knew now, that if the measure were forced through the House, as the Government proposed to force it, it would cause a great strain on their allegiance, and as a temperance reformer and a minister of the Gospel he should feel it his duty to use all his power to turn out the Government.”

Now this occurred at a large public meeting in Ayr. The other day we had in the Lobby of the House the Lord Provost of Glasgow, and I presume that his appearance was indicative of his having come to warn the Government against persisting with this measure. The Lord Provost of Glasgow is a Liberal Unionist, and I understand that at the present moment there is a motion before the Town Council of Glasgow protesting against this measure. We have seen from the public prints that many of the Municipal Authorities throughout Scotland have been protesting against these proposals, and how the Government can, in the face of this opposition, persist in going on with them I really cannot understand. We are told that these proposals of the Government will not interfere with the Licensing Authorities—that they will not interfere with the powers at present possessed by the Justices of the Peace in counties and Magistrates in burghs. We know that at the present time every new licence that is granted is understood to be granted in the public interest and the public good, and that Magistrates when they find a licence has been granted, and that it has not turned out for the public good, have had the power—and have exercised it, too—of refusing a renewal at the next Licensing Session. As a Justice of the Peace, I myself have had no hesitation in withdrawing licences when I have come to the conclusion that they are not required in the public interest. I would remind the House that Scotland in the past has been exceptionally treated in this matter of licences. The hours during which houses have been allowed to be open have been shortened; Sunday opening has been stopped; and I venture to think that if the Government, instead of bringing in this Bill, had proposed one to further shorten the hours of trading, they would have materially reduced the consumption of liquor, and have benefited immensely the moral tone of great masses of the people. Every one knows it is the last two or three hours of the night in which most drunkenness occurs.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I think the hon. Member is wandering from the subject of the Amendment.

MR. J. WILSON: I was bringing to the recollection of the Committee the fact that in the year 1853, when a Conservative Government was in power—and I think this is particularly germane to the subject I have in hand—in the month of August in that year, Parliament resolved, by Act of Parliament, to prohibit Justices of the Peace in counties and Magistrates in burghs from granting licences to blacksmiths, taxmen, and tollkeepers all over the country of Scotland. We know that up to that time these people had been licensed, but in 1853 these licences were abolished, and without a farthing being paid as compensation. Hundreds of these licences were taken away. This precedent goes a long way in support of our contention that there is no vested interest in licences. I feel satisfied that if this matter is decided by the majority of the Members from Scotland, instead of money being given to the publicans it will be devoted to much better and much higher purposes—the purpose of educating the youth of the nation, both in elementary and in higher schools, and if it were so devoted, it would prove a blessing to the country; and it would be much better than giving it away to people who have already enriched themselves at the public expense, and at the expense of the demoralisation of the community.

(9.50.) MR. DUFF (Banffshire): I think we have reasonably complained that, so far, we have had no indication from the Treasury Bench of what they intend to do in regard to this Amendment, although the Debate has been going on for three-and-a-half hours.

*MR. RITCHIE: I understand that the Amendment is to be withdrawn.

MR. DUFF: I have no information to that effect. I think my hon. Friend is perfectly prepared to go on with it, and I certainly am prepared to support it.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The present Amendment, if carried, will preclude the possibility of dealing with all subsequent Amendments appropriating the money.

The Chairman

MR. DUFF: I was not aware that this Amendment before the Committee, which involves very important questions, would have that effect.

*MR. RITCHIE: I am sure the hon. Gentleman would not wish to misrepresent the action of the Government in this matter. I understood that, in consequence of the ruling of the Chair, as to the effect which the carrying of the Amendment would have, an intimation had been received by the Solicitor General that an appeal would be made to the Mover to withdraw it, so that discussion might more properly take place upon the section to which the arguments of hon. Members most properly apply.

(9.52.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): Perhaps I may be allowed to say that, although I have had no intimation of that sort, still a good many of us are of opinion that this Debate, although it has been a forcible expression of opinion, is going somewhat upon a side issue. The Amendment of my hon. Friend has been moved with a view to his recommending to the Committee, at a subsequent stage, certain modes of disposing of this money. I am not sure that in the prominence which he gave to these particular modes I should altogether agree with him, and I think that some of my hon. Friends are in the same position; but after the ruling which you have given from the Chair to the effect that this Amendment, if carried, will involve the abandonment of the whole of the scheme of the Government, including the proposal that a certain amount of money should be allotted to the superannuation of the police, I think that the question becomes complicated to such an extent that it perhaps would be better, as the right hon. Gentleman has suggested, if this Amendment were withdrawn. I hope that my hon. Friend will agree to adopt that course in order that we may raise this point of the buying up of licences at a different part of the clause, where it can be more effectively discussed. I may say frankly that the object of the Scotch Members with whose views I am acquainted is to bring prominently before the House the objections to the buying up of licences, and to explain to the House the glaring contrast between the purpose to which it is now proposed to devote this money, and the purposes to which it might reasonably be applied. I have a considerable amount of sympathy with my hon. Friend, who is anxious to obtain some of the money for the especial purpose of creating harbours. I can quite understand his being anxious to do that; and I think we shall simplify the position if he allows this Amendment to be withdrawn, in order that we may by-and-by be able to place before the House the alternatives which we propose for the distribution of the money.

(9.55.) MR. S. WILLIAMSON: My object in moving this Amendment was to strengthen the opposition to the proposals of the Government by showing that there were great national purposes besides police superannuation, and besides the payment of school fees, to which this money might reasonably be applied, and, in bringing so prominently before the House the question of Fishery Harbours, I think I was able to show a good purpose to which this money might be applied, and I was able especially to point out the claims of the fishing industry. Now, Sir, after your ruling, which I did not hear, but the purport of which has been communicated to me, I, of course, will withdraw the Amendment. I still think, however, that if the Amendment had been carried, progress might have been reported, and we might have come to some arrangement for the distribution of this money, giving, say, £60,000 for education, £30,000 for fishing harbours, and £40,000 for police superannuation. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(9.5.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): The first sub-section of the clause provides that the sum of £40,000 shall be applied to the purposes of police superannuation in Scotland, and I beg to move that these words be omitted. I do it for the purpose of endeavouring to ascertain from the Government what it is they really mean, because Scotland, in regard to police superannuation, differs altogether from England. In England there has been, by Act of Parliament, a system of police superannuation provided for all boroughs and counties, and it has been in operation for a great many years. But in Scotland we stand in this position, that there are no superannuation funds in Scotland, except in two or three small localities. While, therefore, in the case of England, the Government propose the application of this money to a known purpose they are, in the case of Scotland, asking the Committee to agree to the application of the large sum of £40,000 a year to a purpose which, at the present moment, is entirely unknown. It has been stated that the Government are preparing a Bill dealing with the question of superannuation, but that Bill has not been brought before the House, and, therefore, in this matter we are in the extraordinary position that we are asked to vote out of this sum of £120,000, no less than £40,000 a year for a purpose the exact nature and details of which are entirely unknown to the House and to the Committee. Certainly the Committee ought not to agree to passing this clause until we have had some distinct information from the Government as to the nature of the purpose to which it is to be applied. I make those observations in no spirit of hostility to the object which the Government have in view, namely, the establishment of a Superannuation Fund for the police in Scotland. I, for one, should be disposed to give a satisfactory scheme favourable and kindly consideration. But the difficulty we are now in is that we are asked to vote this money without knowing in any way whatever the scheme which the Government propose. Therefore, although favourable to the purpose of the superannuation of the police, we do not know how that purpose will be carried out or whether it will meet with the approval of the people of Scotland, or of the police, or of the Members of this House. It seems to me absolutely necessary at this stage that we should be in possession of the views of the Government. I look upon the superannuation of the police only as part of a larger scheme of superannuation, under which, by means of insurance, aged working men would be superannuated, and not merely policemen. If it had been possible for a private Member to have brought this larger question before the House. I should have done so, but the time of private Members has now been taken away. I hope, if the Ballot is favourable next year, to bring before the House a scheme of insurance by which all men in Scotland, and not policemen alone, may be able to provide for old age. I think the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Scotland ought to inform the House what is the scheme of police superannuation which the Government propose.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 5, to leave out Subsection (i).—(Mr. Hunter.)

Question proposed, "That Sub-section (i.) stand part of the Clause."

*(10.5.) THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND (MR. M. T. STORMONT DARLING, Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): The hon. and learned Member has stated his views temperately. He is quite right in saying that in Scotland there is no scheme of police superannuation. The boroughs and counties have power to provide for the infirmities of aged policemen by payment of a lump sum in proportion to the pay. But there is no scheme of superannuation except in the Borough of Greenock under a Local Act. In Scotland, I believe, there is as great need of police superannuation as in England. Apart from considerations of justice, the figures which are before me certainly show that many of the police in Scotland are beyond the age when they can efficiently discharge their duty. I have no doubt there is a natural disinclination on the part of the authorities to dismiss men who have done their duty. With regard to the very reasonable demand of the hon. Member that the Committee should know something of the Bill before they proceed to the details, I have simply this to say. If the hon. and learned Member withdraws his Amendment we shall simply affirm the principle of police superannuation, and the dedication of a certain sum to that purpose. With regard to the mode in which it is to be carried out, before we reach Clause 4, which deals with the matter somewhat in detail, I think I can safely promise that the Scotch Bill will be in the possession of hon. Members. It will be substantially on the lines of the English Bill. These are intimations which I hope will be satisfactory to the hon. Member, and that he will allow this clause to pass without further comment.

(10.8.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: With all due respect to the hon. and learned Gentleman, I cannot regard either the substance or form of his answer as satisfactory. Where is the Lord Advocate? I mean no disrespect to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General, who fulfils his duties in a manner which does him credit. But the Lord Advocate is responsible for Scotch business. The Secretary for Scotland is the chief officer connected with the business of Scotland, but he is in another House and we never see him. The Lord Advocate in this House represents Scotch business in this House with a fulness and power which the hon. and learned Gentleman cannot profess to possess. Here is the Scotch clause of the most contentious Bill of the whole Session, and the Lord Advocate is absent. I have reason to believe he is not ill. Had he been I should not have said anything. But I understand he is otherwise occupied. I do not think it is treating Scotch Members with any very high degree of respect. [Laughter.] The ex-Lord Mayor (Sir R. N. Fowler) laughs at that statement. I can assure him it is earnestly felt by Scotch Members. The Lord Advocate ought to have been here. Besides the Lord Advocate, there ought to have been the Bill. This Bill was read a first time on the last day of April. It ought to have been at the other end of the month—on the 1st of April—as a day more appropriate to this measure. Yet here we are in June without the Bill which is to carry out this clause. As to what the hon. Member for Aberdeen said, I confess myself not altogether enamoured of universal superannuation, nor am I enamoured of the extension of the superannuation of the police. We have a system of superannuation in the Police Service of this country, and I confess frankly I do not like it. I should rather like to see it stinted and restrained than developed. Like the rest of the Scotch Members, I think we are entitled to see the Bill before proceeding with this clause.

*(10.13.) MR. RITCHIE: I am not surprised that it should have been expected that the Lord Advocate would be present, but I may explain that he had an engagement of the very highest and most urgent importance. He was prepared to throw it over, and remain in the House, but his Colleagues did not wish him to do so in view of the exceptional importance of his engagement. If there be any blame, it should attach, not to the Lord Advocate, but to his Colleagues who advised him. Looking to the fact that the main question of police superannuation would be discussed on a subsequent clause, when the Superannuation Bill would be in the hands of the Committee, his Colleagues thought they were hardly justified in asking him to forego that engagement. Therefore, if there is any blame, it is due not to the Lord Advocate, but rather to his Colleagues. Now, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman asks why the Scotch Superannuation Bill has not been produced, and that Bill is the gravamen of the objection now made. He says the Bill was ordered to be printed on the 30th of April, and, after indulging in a little pleasantry as to the 1st of April, to which the right hon. Gentleman is quite welcome, he wanted to know why so long an interval had been allowed to elapse without the production of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman must understand that if only the Scotch Bill has had to be presented no difficulty would have arisen in that way, but it has had to be considered in connection with the English Bill, and a large number of intricate and difficult points have had to be decided in that connection. In the case of the English Bill the Committee have been content with the intimation of the Government that the Superannuation Bill would be in the hands of Members before the discussion on the particular clause of the main Bill dealing with the application of the money to police superannuation came on; and before the Committee embarked on the discussion of the particular clause dealing with this question in relation to Scotland, the Scotch Superannuation Bill will be in the hands of hon. Members. I hope the right hon. Gentleman, after having made his protest, will accept my reasons for the non-production of the Bill, and my assurance that before the particular clause comes on for discussion the Bill will be in the hands of hon. Members. Its proposals will be found to be closely analogous to those of the English Bill.

(10.20.) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): We now know how we stand in regard to the representation of Scotland, and why it is the Government are anxious to postpone this clause. They suggested that it should be postponed, and now we have it before us we find that the Scotch Department is not represented by the Minister who is chiefly responsible to this House for the administration of Scotch affairs. We have often complained of the way in which, under the present system, that Department is represented. There is a Secretary for Scotland, who is chiefly responsible for Scotch administration, whom we never see at all, and who, I believe, is at the present moment cruising about the North of Ireland, but even were he in London we should not be able to see him, as he is not a member of this Assembly. But we have in this House the Lord Advocate, who represents the Chief Secretary, but although he is an officer in receipt of a high salary we do not find him here. He is said not to be to blame because his Colleagues have supported him in his absence; still we have the fact that he will not forego his private functions for those he ought to perform in this House. Under such circumstances we ought not to be called upon to deal with this question, while the absence of the Scotch Superannuation Bill is a further reason for not dealing with this matter. For my part,

I believe there ought to be some system of superannuation for Government servants, because they have peculiar duties to perform, and there are many reasons why they should have consideration, but it is not only the principle of superannuation with which we have to deal; we are called upon to vote a distinct sum. Now, I ask, can we judge whether that sum is right or wrong unless we know what the scheme of superannuation is? In England there is in most counties and boroughs a superannuation system, but in Scotland no such system has been adopted. At present, we have not the least idea of what is to be the system on which we are asked to vote a grant of money, and under these circumstances I beg to move, Sir, that you report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Sir G. Campbell.)

(10.25.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I desire strongly to support the Motion of my hon. Friend. I admit that there is a strong case for police superannuation, and for 20 years I have supported that proposal, on account of the exceptional duties the police are called on to perform, through a large portion of their lives. But, although supporting this view, I admit there is great diversity of opinion in Scotland on this subject. No case has been made out for calling on us to give a blank cheque for police superannuation. We ought to have the Bill before us. I desire particularly to direct attention to the humiliating position in which Scotland is constantly being placed. It is not enough that we have no one here sufficiently representing Scotland. It is not enough that we should take at second hand from the Lord Advocate the opinions of the Chief Secretary, but we are told to-night for the first time that so little do the Government consider the interests of Scotland that they have assured the Lord Advocate he may leave the House at a time when important Scotch business is about to be considered.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is now going into matter which is very wide of the question before the Committee.

MR. ESSLEMONT: I do not desire to do that. I am only endeavouring to show that because the Lord Advocate is not here, and we have no Bill dealing with this question, we are not in a position to discuss it at the present moment. I desire to show that the position in which Scotland is placed is the reason why Progress should be reported, so that the Lord Advocate may be able to be in his place when the matter is discussed. The Lord Advocate is the only Minister entitled to speak for Scotland. ["No, no."] Let those who say "No, no," tell me who is entitled to speak for Scotland?

An hon. MEMBER: The Solicitor General.

MR. ESSLEMONT: The Solicitor General for Scotland has already said he is not in a position to speak.

*MR. M. T. STORMONTH DARLING: I beg pardon; I said nothing of the kind.

MR. ESSLEMONT: I should be very sorry to misinterpret the hon. Gentleman, who, if anything, is always most conciliatory and courteous, but he has told the Committee that the Bill is not ready, and that the lines on which it is to be drawn are not settled.

*(10.28.) MR. M. T. STORMONTH DARLING: The hon. Member, most unintentionally no doubt, entirely misrepresents me. I did not say that the lines of the Bill were not settled, nor did I say that I did not fully represent the Scotch Department in the absence of the Lord Advocate. The lines of the Bill are settled, and it will be published very shortly, and in what I have said I have spoken with the authority of the Government.

MR. ESSLEMONT: I am exceedingly glad that the interruption has brought about so important a statement. Now we know where we are. We know that the Lord Advocate has delegated his duties, and that the Secretary for Scotland has also delegated his duties to the Solicitor General for Scotland, and that he knows exactly the lines on which the Scotch Bill for the superannuation of the police is being drawn, and yet he asks us to give a blank cheque on the faith of the Bill being entirely satisfactory to the Scotch Members—to grant this sum of £40,000 for police superannuation without knowing one of the provisions of the Bill, or the lines on which it is being drawn. The statement of the Solicitor General furnishes a sufficient reason why this clause should be postponed, and why we should not be called on to discuss it till we have the details of the Bill before us.

(10.30.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I cannot understand on what ground this Motion is resisted. This will be an admirable opportunity for the few Scotch Members who sit on the other side to show by their vote that they think Scotch business can be very well conducted in this House without the presence of the right hon. Gentleman who represents the interests of Scotland in the Government. We have heard a great deal about Home Rule for Scotland, and, if there ever was a reason for it, it is to be found in the contempt with which the interests of Scotland are to-night treated by the Government. They knew that Scotch business was coming on, and the absence of the Lord Advocate at such a time is a thing for which no excuse whatever can be made. I knew something in the old days about the management of Scotch business in this House. The executive officer in the person of the Secretary for Scotland, or the Lord Advocate, is the official to represent the interests of Scotland, and to inform Members for Scotland of the policy of the Government with regard to Scotland, and the notion of relegating a duty of that kind to the Solicitor General for Scotland is a thing I never heard of. I am delighted to see that the Tory Scotch Members are going to vote for that mode of conducting Scotch business, for, they may depend upon it, the incident will not be overlooked or forgotten in Scotland. The people of Scotland have already had some indications that their business is neglected and not treated with the attention it deserves and demands, and now we have a Scotch clause before us—a clause dealing directly with the interests of Scotland, under many heads, such as education, police, and licensing—and we have the Government bent on forcing the clause through in the absence of the Lord Advocate. I have no doubt the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury will undertake to explain these Scotch subjects as affected by the Bill. We shall be very happy to hear what he has to say, as we are informed that the whole principle of police superannuation in Scotland has been settled. I trust the right hon. Gentleman will get up and state what those principles are. The Scotch Members will hear that announcement with great interest and satisfaction; but, in the meantime, we protest against this method of treating Scotch business and Scotch Members. I venture to say it is a thing which Scotland has a right to resent, and the Government may depend upon it that Scotland will resent it. The Scotch people have demanded, and they will continue to demand, a much fuller control of the affairs of their own country, especially when they have before them the conduct of the Government to-night.

*(10.35.) MR. W. H. SMITH: The right hon. Gentleman has challenged me to explain the principles of Scotch Police Superannuation. I would reply that the principles on which the Scotch Superannuation Bill are framed are to be found in the Bills for which the right hon. Gentleman opposite was responsible in 1883-4-5, allowance being made for application to Scotland. The Scotch Superannuation Bill is in course of preparation, and is only slightly different from the English Bill. The principle of superannuation is the same in both countries. The right hon. Gentleman has referred in strong language to the absence of the Lord Advocate. My right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board has stated why the Lord Advocate is absent. ["No, no."] Yes, I think he has. I take the full and entire responsibility for the Lord Advocate's absence.

SIR G. TREVELYAN: What is the cause?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: There are occasions when hon. and learned Gentlemen opposite are not in their places; and although I admit it is the duty of Members of the Government to be present whenever the circumstances of the case require it, there are occasions which are of importance to their position as members of the Bar when their absence is excusable. There are Members of the House who are aware of the sacrifices which a Lord Advocate has to make in order to be present in the House; and I am sure I am speaking to hon. Gentlemen who are not without sympathy for the ability of the Lord Advocate in this House, and will not desire to comment harshly upon a temporary absence. The Government are represented by the Solicitor General for Scotland, and what we ask for now is merely an admission of the principle of superannuation in Scotland. It will be remembered that the principle of superannuation was recognised as regards England before the English Bill was in the hands of hon. Members. Surely the Committee do not desire to negative the principle of superannuation for the Scotch police? The Bill to give effect to that principle will have to be considered on Second Reading, in Committee, and in the House; and hon. Members can then deal with its details. The question the Committee are now considering is whether we shall not accept the principle of superannuation for the police of Scotland as well as for England.

(10.40.) SIR G. TREVELYAN: The right hon. Gentleman the leader of the House appealed to me as being in some manner bound to extend a special indulgence to the Lord Advocate. Well, I will tell him how I look on it. There was a time—three or four years ago—when the Secretary for Scotland sat in this House. I was present during the discussion on the Crofters Bill, which was a measure (dealing as it did with several counties) quite as important as the question of the superannuation of the police, and at the side of the Secretary for Scotland were both the Lord Advocate and the Solicitor General for Scotland, who acted as his advisers. Now the Secretary for Scotland is in the other House, and the Lord Advocate is more than an adviser—he is virtually the Administrator of Scotland. The Lord Advocate gets a magnificent salary, and the idea that gentlemen of the Long Robe are justified in postponing public to private interests is one I do not share. Any gentleman of the Long Robe who has public duties to perform, and at the same time private interests to serve, should make those public duties and private interests coincide with some propriety. This is the first piece of important, practical Scotch business of the Session, and the First Lord not only asks the Committee to accept the absence of the Lord Advocate, but to pass in an hour without any discussion on the merits what is, in fact, the Second Reading of a most important Bill. What is the state of police superannuation in Scotland? I do not happen to have before me the Return issued the other day, but I know the essence of it very well, and I know there is only one burgh in Scotland where there is a regular system of police superannuation—namely, Greenock, and the 17 policemen superannuated there are practically the whole of the superannuated police in Scotland. Besides this a few allowances are given by the Town Council of Glasgow. Superannuation does not exist, practically speaking, in Scotland at this moment. I do not say whether it is right or wrong; but I do say that to set up a system of superannuation in Scotland is equivalent to passing the Second Reading of a most important Bill, and that Bill is not before the Committee. We are told by the First Lord of the Treasury that we are to gather what is proposed for Scotland from Bills which were introduced, but which did not pass, years ago—when half the hon. Gentlemen who are now in Parliament were not Members of this House. That is impossible. It is too great a task to put upon any Parliament which is of human birth. What would the First Lord of the Treasury say if the First Lord of the Admiralty were in the House of Lords, and the Secretary to the Admiralty were absent, and the most important Naval Estimates had to be moved by the Civil Lord?

(10.44.) MR. A. ELLIOT (Roxburgh): I doubt very much whether the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, and the right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken, were quite serious in the reasons they gave in asking for a postponement. They seem to think it palatable to Scotchmen that they should rebuke the Lord Advocate and insult the Scotch Solicitor General who takes his place and endeavours to discharge the duty of representing Scotland in his absence. This pretence on the part of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen is most patent. If they simply wish to cause delay let them get up and say so. That pretence is really too absurd. It is incumbent on the right hon. Member for Bridgeton to show, what he has entirely failed in showing, that if the Lord Advocate had been present he could have given one single reason or advanced any argument which it is not in the power of the Solicitor General to do. We all know that the Lord Advocate is not only an able man, but that he attends strictly to his duties and works hard at his business. It is the merest nonsense to suggest that the Committee are not in a position to proceed with this clause. I resent the pretensions of Members who make occasional visits to Scotland for electioneering purposes that they know anything about the sentiments of the great masses of the Scottish people. Above all things the Scottish people like their business to be done well and effectually. If the Committee are going to reject the scheme let them do so; but do not let them make a pretence, which no one believes to be genuine, that the Committee is not competent to deal with the matter.

(10.50.) DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): The Scotch Members have the reputation of being a practical set of men, and I wonder it did not occur to some of them to take note of the statement of the Solicitor General for Scotland that we should look at the provisions of the English Bill as an indication of the intentions of the Government as to superannuation. I procured a copy of the Bill to see what enlightenment it would afford, and here I would say that the hon. Member who has just sat down, and who spoke with an eloquence which drew forth the cheers of the Ministerialists, did not seem to know what he was talking about. He accuses us of obstructing the business of Parliament on what he calls a mere "pretence." But what is the plea on which we are recommending that this particular business should be postponed? I venture to say that if hon. Members will listen to what it is, they will no longer be inclined to cheer such observations as those which fell from the hon. Member. The hon. Member for Aberdeen has pointed out that practically there is no superannuation in Scotland. We have come to a sub-section of Clause 2, by which £40,000 is to be applied for the purpose of police superannuation in Scotland. It is pointed out by the Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Hunter) that there is no system of police superannuation in Scotland, while in England there is. The Scottish Members wish for an explanation as to the scheme which is proposed. Turning to Clause 4, I find there an argument against the proposals of the Government, for while it is proposed that £150,000 shall be granted for the superannuation of the police of London—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman must not enter into the question of the merits of the proposal. The Question before the Committee is that of reporting Progress.

DR. CAMERON: I am merely pointing out that while £150,000 is proposed to be granted for the superannuation of the police of London, only £40,000 is to be granted for the purpose in Scotland—the population being about equal. That is a point which I think justifies us in demanding an explanation. What explanation have we had?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman must not examine the merits of the proposal. The Question before the House is one of reporting progress.

DR. CAMERON: We know nothing about the merits of the scheme, and that is what we want to know. The President of the Local Government Board has referred us to the English Bill. I have got a copy, and I will read two clauses to show—[Cries of "Order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is again examining the merits. It is quite irregular. I must again ask him to address himself to the Question of reporting Progress.

DR. CAMERON: I would submit that the unsatisfactory replies we have received are the best possible reason why we should report Progress. I am in favour of the principle of superannuation; but, as far as I understand, the proposals of the English Bill are absolutely impossible of application to Scotland. The Lord Advocate, if he had been present, might have told us something. The Solicitor General knows nothing about the matter.

(10.56.) MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I shall certainly support the Motion to report progress, and I am sure it will be supported by a vast majority of the Scottish Members. They have not before them, as they have a right to have, the measure dealing with the superannuation to which this sub-section applies; and, again, they have not in his place the Officer of the Government who could have given them information—the Lord Advocate. The Government cannot pretend that they have not had fair notice. [Ministerial cries of "Divide."] I am perfectly determined to have my say out. The inarticulate groaning of the hon. Member for Dumbartonshire (Sir A. Orr-Ewing) will have no influence upon me. The Government had fair notice that Scotch Members desired to see the Bill before dealing with this clause, and, while various reasons have been given for the non-introduction of the Bill, the Solicitor General for Scotland is unable to tell us anything about it. Certainly, the delay in the production of the Bill is not due to overwork in the Scotch office. But it is worthy of comment among Scottish Members, that when it is important that a Bill of this sort should be produced at an early date it is continually promised but never produced. I think we should enter a protest against a mode of proceeding which has been adopted on several occasions—making one measure depend on the production of another. That occurred in the case of the Inland Revenue Bill and in the case of the Contagious Diseases (Pleuro-Pneumonia) Bill. Then we have the clauses of this Bill, which are dependent upon the clauses of another Bill which is not introduced. I think the House of Commons is bound—[Interruption].—I think the House of Commons is bound—[Interruption].—I think the House of Commons is bound—[Interruption].—

to show its independence by refusing to proceed further at present with this Bill. This is the first occasion during the present Session that Government business dealing with Scotland has been before the House, and yet upon this occasion the Lord Advocate for Scotland, the Member of the Ministry who is responsible for Scotch Government business, is not present. I do not think my hon. Friend the Member for Roxburghshire (Mr. A. Elliot) was altogether happy in his defence of the Lord Advocate's absence. [Interruption.]

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh N.): Mr. Courtney, I wish to draw your attention to a very serious matter, namely, the continual interruption indulged in by hon. Members opposite.

THE CHAIRMAN: Mr. Buchanan.

MR. BUCHANAN: I am perfectly indifferent to the interruption which my remarks meet with on that side. What I was saying was that my hon. Friend was not very successful in his defence of the Lord Advocate's absence. My hon. Friend said the Lord Advocate as everyone will acknowledge, works hard at his own business. I would like to ask my hon. Friend and the House what part of his own business it is the Lord Advocate is working hard at at the present moment. We know that the Lord Advocate is appearing in a very important will suit before the Scotch Courts, but the question is—it affects all the Law Officers of the Crown—how far the Law Officers are justified in allowing private practice to interfere with their public duties. To-morrow the Police Vote is to be brought on for discussion. What would be thought if the Home Secretary, who is primarily responsible in the matter, were not in his place to defend his conduct? In this matter we are bound, not only as Scotch Members but as individual independent Members of the House of Commons, to enter our emphatic protest against being kept further in the dark as to the Government's views in regard to police superannuation. A gross insult has been cast upon Scotch Members, not so much by the Lord Advocate as by the Government, who, when they bring a small modicum of Scotch business before the House, have not the decency to see that the Minister who is responsible for its conduct should be present.

(11.6.) MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I rise not so much for the purpose of supporting the Motion, but to suggest a way out of the difficulty. I do not see much in the objection that the Lord Advocate is not here. The First Lord of the Treasury has told us that there are occasions when the Lord Advocate for Scotland is justified in being absent, and that this is one of those occasions. I think that explanation is more disrespectful to the Lord Advocate than it is to Scotland or the Scotch Members. But the man who ought to be here is not the Lord Advocate but the Secretary for Scotland. I for one would be prepared to go on with the discussion of the Bill with the Lord Advocate represented on this occasion by the Solicitor General for Scotland, who, as far as I know, is just as competent and as well entitled to the respect of the House as the Lord Advocate. But there is one condition to my assent, and that touches the second ground on which the Motion to report Progress is based. We do not know the meaning of the sub-section we are called upon to debate. In putting this sub-section in its present form the Government are sinning against the positive warning they received a week ago in respect to a similar sub-section to the English clause. We protested against discussing a sub-section which did not explain its own meaning, and which could only be explained by reference to a Bill which, as far as we know, is not in existence. The Solicitor General for Scotland has admitted he knows the contents of that Bill. I will not vote for this Motion if the Solicitor General for Scotland will, after the Motion is withdrawn, get up in his place and state what the contents of the Bill for the superannuation of the police in Scotland are. But if the Solicitor General stands upon his silence or sits upon his silence, and refuses to give the House the knowledge which is essential to the discussion of this sub-section, then I shall have no alternative but to go into the Lobby in support of the Motion to report Progress.

*(11.10.) MR. SEYMOUR KEAY (who was received with cries of "Divide!"): I will not detain the Committee more than one moment after this uproar has ceased. I merely rose to support the Motion for the purpose of asking the President of the Local Government Board for some reply to the pointed question I put to him during my speech at the dinner hour.

THE CHAIRMAN: That speech I understood to refer to licensing.

*MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: If I am not in order I will sit down at once. My impression was that on a Motion to report Progress a Member might elicit from a Minister of Her Majesty's Government some reply to an important question asked in a speech which had been made. If that is not so I must take another opportunity of obtaining a reply.

(11.12.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I must confess some astonishment at the extraordinary attitude of hon. Members opposite. I suppose that after the races they want a little fun, but Scotch Members are entitled to insist that business shall be conducted in a manner beneficial to the nation they represent. The Lord Advocate is absent, but there is another Member of the Government who might conveniently be present—

AN hon. MEMBER: Will you kindly speak up?

DR. TANNER: I am afraid the hon. Member's hearing is as obtuse as his intellect. I should have thought that upon an occasion like the present, especially when the Lord Advocate is absent, the Chief Secretary for Ireland might have been in his place. I regret extremely that the Solicitor General for Scotland does not consider it part of his duty to remain in the House, and accordingly I shall with a great deal of pleasure support the Motion to report progress. It is obvious to the mind of the meanest, the most ordinary observer—(Cries of "Hear, hear!")—of course, if the cap fits I do not object. Seeing the jaded condition of the Treasury Bench I think it would be well to report Progress and proceed with other business of benefit to the country. There is the Barracks Bill upon the Paper. We are assured that is an important Bill. I suppose I should be out of order in discussing that Bill, and I always strive to keep in order, but—

Mr. LAMBERT rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

(11.20.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 274; Noes 221.—(Div. List, No. 149.)

(11.30.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 230; Noes 273.—(Div. List, No. 150.)

Question again proposed, "That Sub-section (i.) stand part of the Clause."

(11.49.) Dr. CAMERON: This, Sir, is a very unfortunate matter. The question of police superannuation, whatever view we may entertain about its merits, is one on which there is very strong feeling one way or the other. It is a matter on which I think hon. Members will be called upon by their constituents to justify the vote they have given, and I would ask whether it is proper that at this hour of the night we should start discussing it. There has been practically no discussion whatever upon the merits of the proposal. The hon. Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Hunter) moved the rejection of the sub-section, and he was followed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman). These were the only two gentlemen who discussed the merits of the proposal. They were followed by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir G. Campbell), who moved to report Progress. I would point out that if we postpone the consideration of the question now, we shall have the discussion on the Vote for the Police before it can come on again. On the smallest sign that the Government assent to this course I will sit down. As we cannot have the Motion for Progress twice in succession, I move that you now leave the Chair.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."—(Dr. Cameron.)

(11.51.) Dr. TANNER: I was Closed when I supported the Motion for reporting Progress, and, accordingly, I understand that the proper Motion now is that you, Sir, do leave the Chair. I regret extremely that Her Majesty's Government are in such a ridiculous position, and I sympathise with the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is not speaking to the question.

Dr. TANNER: I really regret if I have in any way transgressed; but having been Closed just now on the Motion to report Progress, I felt bound to vindicate my position, and to show that the right hon. Gentleman was in the wrong, whereas I was in the right.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed, "That Sub-section (1) stand part of the Clause."

*(11.54.) Mr. RITCHIE: Of course, it would be perfectly useless for the Government to press forward with the Bill during the time that is still at their disposal; but I wish to take notice of some remarks that fell from the hon. Member for the College Division (Dr. Cameron). He says that there has been no discussion on this clause. Why has there been no discussion? Because the time of the Committee has been deliberately wasted.

Mr. A. SUTHERLAND (Sutherland): I rise to a point of order. I wish to know whether the right hon. Gentleman is justified in saying of any hon. Members of the House that they had deliberately wasted the time of the Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Gentleman is not out of order.

*MR. RITCHIE: The question was spoken to by the hon. Member who moved the rejection of the clause, and by other hon. Members. [Opposition cries of "Withdraw!"]

THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Gentleman is entitled to uninterrupted speech.

*MR. RITCHIE: Then the Debate was interrupted by the Motion to report Progress, moved because of the absence of my right hon. Friend the Lord Advocate. The Committee were aware that one of the Law Officers of Scotland was in his place perfectly prepared to defend the provisions of the Bill. It was alleged, also, that the Bill was not produced, though my hon. and learned Friend and I myself stated that the provisions of the Bill with reference to police superannuation in Scotland were precisely the same as the provisions of the Bill relating to England. So far from there not being a Minister here in charge of Scotch business, and so far from the Committee not being in full possession of the proposals of the Government—[Opposition cries of "Question!"]

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I beg to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman is in order in discussing the merits of a Motion which has already been decided by the Committee?

THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Gentleman is certainly not strictly in order, but he is replying to the observations which I think he is entitled to reply to.

*MR. RITCHIE: I shall not trespass further on the time of the House. I maintain that the allegations I made at the commencement of my remarks are fully justified.

(11.59.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): This experience will be a lesson to us not to allow any other clause of the Bill to be taken, as we allowed the 1st clause practically without any discussion.

It being midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I wish to ask the President of the Local Government Board what business it is intended to take on Monday? The business, I hear, is the Procedure Order for carrying over Bills.

MR. GOSCHEN: Will the right hon. Gentleman ask a question of the leader of the House to-morrow?

MR. J. MORLEY: I really think we have a right to know.

MR. GOSCHEN: If the right hon. Gentleman will repeat the question on the Motion for the Adjournment of the House I will attempt to give an answer.

MR. T. M. HEALY: What day is the Bill going to be put down for?

*MR. RITCHIE: Monday.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING ACTS AMENDMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 239.)

Bill considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time to-morrow.

PHARMACY ACT (IRELAND) (1875) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 241.)

COMMITTEE.

(12.7.) Order for Committee read.

DR. TANNER: I object.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I hope the hon. Member will not press his objection.

DR. TANNER: I object. I must do so, for the simple reason that a great many objections have been raised to the Bill. I think the hon. Member in charge of it would do wisely to get it referred to a Select Committee.

(12.8.) MR. SEXTON: I hope my hon. Friend will allow this Bill to proceed. There are about 3,000 persons in Ireland interested in the trade. The matter has been the subject of negotiations between the bodies interested, and the questions of difference have been fined down to a very small point; while my hon. Friend the Member for North Longford has agreed to postpone the Amendment standing in his name. I hope my hon. Friend the Member for Mid Cork will not make himself the sole opponent in this House of a very useful Bill.

(12.9.) DR. TANNER: I have heard from so many medical gentlemen in Ireland specific objections to this Bill that it is solely on that ground I object.

I would with the greatest possible pleasure allow the Bill to go through if I could conscientiously do so, but I must really object on the present occasion.

(12.10.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I would suggest to the hon. Member that his Amendments could be brought up on the Report stage.

DR. TANNER: I must object.

Committee deferred till to-morrow.

POOR LAW (IRELAND) RATING BILL.

(No. 149.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

(12.15.) MR. SEXTON: I object to this Bill not because of its proposals, but because of the manner in which it is drafted. Still, with this protest the Bill may proceed.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 2.

MR. SEXTON: It appears to me that this clause, as amended, is not sense. Surely it is intended to combine Clauses 2 and 3.

(12.16.) MR. MADDEN: I would suggest to the hon. Member to allow the Bill to pass; it can be re-committed if necessary. In the Bill, Clauses 2 and 3 will become Clause 2.

MR. SEXTON: The difficulty is that the Amendments apply to separate clauses.

(12.17.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I cannot see why a proposal to rate a house according to the time it is occupied should have to be assented to by the Irish Local Government Board. Surely that ought not to be insisted on?

MR. MADDEN: If the hon. and learned Member will put an Amendment on the Paper, I shall be happy to consider it before the Report.

DR. TANNER: As the Amendments make this measure so intricate, I move that we report Progress.

THE CHAIRMAN: It would greatly facilitate Progress if the hon. Member would allow these Amendments first to be carried.

Dr. Tanner

MR. T. M. HEALY: I think the Bill had better proceed. The Government undertake to re-commit it if necessary?

MR. MADDEN: Certainly.

MR. CHANCE: I trust the Government will re-print the Bill.

MR. MADDEN: Yes.

Bill reported; as amended, to be printed [Bill 350]; re-committed for Monday next.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS (IRELAND)

BILL.—(No. 7.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House will, upon Wednesday 2nd July, again resolve itself into the said Committee."—(Mr. Lea.)

MR. T. M. HEALY: I object. Under these circumstances, I think the Bill must be set down for this day (Friday).

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: No; July 2.

Objection having been taken, MR. SPEAKER ascertained by the preponderance of voices that the House was in favour of Wednesday, 2nd July.

Committee deferred till Wednesday 2nd July.

TENANTS' COMPENSATION BILL.—

(No. 259.)

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

INFANT LIFE PROTECTION BILL.

The Select Committee on the Infant Life Protection Bill was nominated of:—MR. Bartley, MR. William Corbet, Lord Francis Hervey, MR. John Kelly, MR. Knowles, MR. William Lawrence, MR. Walter M'Laren, MR. Storey-Maskelyne, MR. Mather, Sir Herbert Maxwell, MR. Patrick O'Brien, MR. Powell, MR. Parker Smith, MR. Francis Stevenson, MR. John Wilson, MR. Woodall, and MR. Stuart-Wortley.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Five be the quorum.—(Mr. Stuart-Wortley.)

House adjourned at half after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

*Friday, 20th June, 1890.*FLASHING SIGNALS — ADMIRAL COLOMB'S INVENTION.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

*LORD ELPHINSTONE: Before the noble and gallant Lord puts his question whether Her Majesty's Government are now in a position to state what reward they propose to give to Admiral Colomb for his invention of flashing signals, I hope I shall not put him to any inconvenience if I ask him to postpone it. The fact is, I am not in a position to give him an answer, for the matter has been out of the hands of the Admiralty for a considerable time now, and is before the Treasury. My noble Friend, however, must not imagine from that that the matter is in any way hung up or has found its way into the proverbial pigeon hole, because it is only a few days ago since we received a letter at the Admiralty from the Treasury asking for further particulars in the matter. If he will postpone his question until next week, I hope to be able to give him an answer.

*LORD SUDELEY: My Lords, I am very happy to put off the question, but I sincerely trust we shall soon receive an answer as to when this matter is likely to be settled. It has been pending now for several years, and it certainly seems a long time to have the matter hung up.

COST OF PUBLIC EDUCATION.

*LORD NORTON: My Lords, the object I have in moving for the Return of which I have given notice is simply that the public at large may be made aware of the amount of the Treasury Votes made yearly for public national education, wholly irrespective of the charge on local rates, voluntary contributions, endowment, fees, and any other private sources. I hear many men boast that this country is so magnificent in support of education that it votes £5,000,000 a year for the purpose; but I suppose, when this Return is made, which adds to the Public Education Votes those for the Science and Art Department, the Reformatory and Industrial Schools, English, Scotch, Welsh,
VOL. CCCXLV. [THIRD SERIES.]

and Irish Colleges, Military and Naval Colleges, Academies and schools, it will be found that the £5,000,000 will be increased to £10,000,000, at least, from the Treasury alone; and if to that were added the voluntary contributions, endowments, and other private contributions, I fancy the actual expenditure of this country for national education would be very little short of £20,000,000 a year. I do not in the slightest degree grudge that sum. I think, on the contrary, that £20,000,000 a year spent in such an object of first-rate national importance would be well-spent—that is, if it were well-spent. But that, I think, is not the case. What I want to call your Lordships' attention to is whether it is not very ill-spent, very wastefully spent, a great deal of the money going for things which might be very much better done otherwise. Now, the Resolution suggests that all the education which is above what may be called elementary, ought to be defrayed by parents who are both able and willing to defray the expense of the education of their children. Elementary education being the proposed object of these Treasury Votes and the only education wanted by all the nation, higher kinds of instruction in science and art should be paid for entirely from private resources, endowments, and fees paid on the actual receipt of the tuition. The only contributions from the Treasury should be by way of exhibitions and scholarships for poor children who show both the capacity and the desire for that higher education, and who should, in that way, have perfectly free access to the higher schools. I do not wish at this moment to refer to the elementary education given in rural districts at all. That, in fact, cannot be said properly to comprise higher education. In none of our rural districts do the elementary schools go into specific subjects, and very few of the children in those schools reach the Seventh Standard. I will say a word about that afterwards. What I wish to refer to now is higher education. As to the elementary education in rural districts, I still maintain that that should in all cases, except in cases of absolute poverty, be partly, at all events, supported by fees. In rural districts they do not attempt specific subjects, yet for them the higher grants are given, while properly higher fees should be paid, because for richer children. Mr. Forster expressed his intention that such subjects, being taught to those more able to pay for them, should not be aided by grants at all; and in that view he adopted the 9d. fee, at the top of a scale of payment from 1d. weekly. The cry for free education is already, I am glad to see, pretty well seen through and is subsiding. ["No."] The noble Marquess dissents as to the fact, but I can only say that some of its principal advocates have confessed to me that it is subsiding. The fact is, that freedom is seen to mean all being alike taxed, whether they use the schools or not. That is, I think, a very curious sort of free education. The extra 1d. or 2d. which a well-to-do labourer or artisan pays towards the education of his children in these schools is seen not only to be just, but most valuable in order that parents may have some notion that they are contributing at least towards their children's education, and that they are not wholly quartered upon the country. The argument that when attendance in the schools is made compulsory by the State, the State should pay the entire cost of it is now laughed at. Is the State to defray the cost of whatever it compels to be done? Take the case of removal of nuisances, and children brought up in neglect are the greatest of public nuisances. I am led by the cheer of the noble Marquess to say that I think the assistance which the country is expecting from him next year is a very different thing from what is called free education. But, my Lords, we must recollect what elementary education is. It is not mere instruction, elementary or higher, but it includes the religious, moral, and intellectual training of the great mass of the children of the people in whatever position they may afterwards have to live. My Resolution does not refer to the elementary education in rural districts; it refers to science and art. It does not seek to interfere with that early teaching and training which is wanted by the whole nation — that is, the elementary education for all; but it applies to that instruction which is wanted by those who are going into skilled employments; and what I want to call your Lordships' attention to is the question whether that scientific and technical instruction ought to be charged upon public taxation in all cases whether such aid is necessary or not. We must bear in mind that many towns in this country are supplied with sufficient and efficient means of tuition of that kind from private resources, and from the fees of those able and willing to pay for it; and the means for providing this higher education often come from endowments which are as much private contributions as if their founders were still alive. Should anything more be contributed to that by the people at large than scholarships for children, fit and wanting to use it, whose parents are unable to pay for it? The Commissioners of 1868 proposed to develop, and adapt in three grades to the various localities in the country, such endowed or private middle schools. They calculated that, with very moderate endowments (and the third grade without any endowment), the very best quality of this science teaching, would require fees from £3 to £6 a year. I have a letter here showing that that calculation is correct. The United Westminster School of 850 boys at this moment exemplifies the highest development of the third grade of Board School at a total cost of £7 a head per annum. In the Cowper Street School, with 1,000 boys, the total cost is £6 per annum. The writer says that if the education is to be really good, and to comprise proper science teaching, perhaps it can hardly be done in London for less than £6 per head; but in country towns such schools would cost less, say £5, and for girls the charge would be less than for boys, say £3. With all such schemes are combined free scholarships for poor, clever children winning them. The parents who want to send children to these middle-class schools mainly consist of two classes. That fact should be borne in mind, in regard to the children generally wanting this secondary instruction beyond the elementary training. The Commissioners of 1868 described one class, the poorer of these middle-class parents, as journeymen, managers of works, clerks, and petty tradesmen; and the richer as larger manufacturers and professional men. It was proposed by the Commissioners that the graded middle schools should be in two divisions, in order to accommodate that difference of wealth and station, those two divisions being the usual commercial and classical sides. Unfortunately, the re-distribution of existing endowments involved in the Commissioners' recommendations, owing to the shifting of the population from the agricultural to the manufacturing localities, was so resisted as to frustrate their proposal. Otherwise, I have myself no doubt that new endowments would have sprung up to meet the full requirements of the case. But persons were checked in providing such endowments, because what are called higher Board schools were allowed to spring up in various towns throughout the country, not only where middle schools were wanted, but in some instances in absolute competition with endowed and private middle schools which were sufficient for the purpose, and efficiently doing their work. Government Board schools have been allowed to undertake this advanced tuition, checking and even competing with private supply, at an almost unlimited and wasteful expenditure to the public, on what was so much better provided for. Only yesterday I was presenting prizes at a first-rate grammar school at Chesterfield, and I found that the numbers there were kept down very much owing to a Board school giving precisely the same education—it might not have been really as good, but thought good enough by rich manufacturers, who were tempted to send their children there because they could get by aid of rates this education for 9d. a week, instead of £8 or £9 a year. They were thus, by the rivalry of the Board school, starving their own grammar school. I suppose no one would dispute that parents of private means providing equally good requisite education for their own children is infinitely preferable both for the free and independent spirit of this country, and for the unfettered and unofficial training of children, than an eleemosynary and Government system. I think it will be admitted that an independent system of education is infinitely superior for the nation to any Government plan. Another great fault of the higher Board schools in towns is that not only do they compete with the endowed schools, but they are also in mischievous competition with the elementary Board schools, because, pretending to give higher instruction, they begin at the bottom like the others, and so become practically only aristocratic editions of the same school used by the aristocracy of the towns, paying 9d. a week to have their children educated free from contact with the dirty 2d. children for whom the public education was primarily intended. Two amendments in our practice seem to me to be called for to meet these faults—first, that wherever there are endowed or private schools, sufficient and efficient for the purpose, in any town, the Department should not sanction the establishment and competition of higher Board schools at the public charge. That is my first proposition, and I hope it will meet with general assent. My second proposition is that where such higher Board schools are set up children should not be admitted to them under the fifth standard. If those two amendments were carried out I think a good many of the faults complained of in the present system would be met. That is all the alteration I ask for. I suggest that the only contribution to such higher schools from the Treasury should be in the way of free scholarships for the cleverer children of the poorer classes who are able to make use of them, that is to say, those showing capacity and a desire for higher instruction, but whose parents cannot afford to keep them longer at school to qualify them for skilled employment. But it seems to me that the folly of the public undertaking the higher education of the children of richer parents, and the folly of having two sets of so-called higher and elementary schools undertaking the same work, is not unlikely, by extravagant waste of money, to cause a far greater moral mischief by causing a rough reaction against the whole system of education altogether. There are two sets of Board schools beginning at the elements and going on to science; the elementary schools attempting science in the most unscientific manner, and the scientific schools beginning at the elements as if there were no elementary schools. Those who advocate these things will find that they are only forcing on the great mass of the community to crowd the employments, not a bit more honourable than manual labour, that are ordinarily filled by the artisan. The London Board schools are at this moment expending nearly £5 per head for every child in them per annum, while the calculation in 1870 was that 30s. would be sufficient. The total expenditure for the children in these schools is, I believe, £4 17s. 6d., and there is this cause for dissatisfaction, that while they are making this enormously increased expenditure they are not increasing the number of children for whom they provide schools according to the ratio of the increase of population. The additional number last year was 3,000, while it ought to have been nearer 10,000. They are not doing one-third of their work in providing for the increased numbers of children. People have argued as if the Scotch plan or the American plan were ours, and our manufacturers are eager for apprentices trained at public expense. But that is not the fact. The Scotch provision for public schools comprises grammar schools and high schools, and those who in England hope to get such a public commercial education upon our elementary education basis are making a great mistake. The Fraser Report to the Commissioners of 1868 shows that Americans are not using the School Rate for all classes. The richer classes are mostly using private schools, and the poorer classes are complaining at having to pay anything for the education of the richer. In saying that, I do not now suggest anything about rural elementary schools. I do not intend to express satisfaction with the mode in which they are dealt with. I consider that in the higher standards children should pay higher fees and receive smaller grants than in the lower standards, as representing education for which parents can easily pay. I think that where there are higher middle schools the elementary schools should stop at a certain standard, and that the children should go from that standard into the higher school instead of the higher school beginning at the A B C, and overlapping the other. Nowhere should boys going to manual labour be kept at school and deprived of the apprenticeship they can only acquire by early practice in their work. A boy sailor, kept at school until he could read in the Fifth Standard one of Shakespeare's plays to the satisfaction of Her Majesty's Inspectors, would be prevented from taking his proper place among British seamen. I know I cannot affect the existing Code of this year. It is too late now to do that; but I cannot help hoping that by calling your Lordships' attention to this subject I shall have more or less affected the concoction of the Code of next year, which, we are led to expect, will be a final edition. We may hope that there will be some definite principle adopted, and not a mischievous uncertainty in the whole of our system of national education. The new Code, while admitting that the system of payment by results is condemned, retains far too much of it. Yesterday a conference of managers, like birds of prey, were gathering round the decaying old system to see what pickings they could still get out of it. As to technical schools, the Report which was only presented yesterday by the Science and Art Department shows that anything yet done under the Act of last year is still merely in embryo. Everybody who desires to act upon it wants to know what it means, and how to set it in motion. I know the difficulty of attaching a meaning to that vague term "technical education." In the Act it means anything which South Kensington says it shall mean; but few attempts have been made chiefly in the way of drawing, which is done in the elementary schools, or, as I have seen in Birmingham, where children are set to work to saw and plane bits of wood. It is only a pretence to call these schools technical, and to undertake them by public means is really standing in the way of manufacturers, such as Whitworth, each in his own line training apprentices for his own work. That would be the best way for competition with the foreign market, and would afford the most practical instruction in various trades. The Government should cease to dream of teaching even the elements of arts everywhere. My Lords, I hope you will agree that the cost of higher education, that is, instruction in science and art, above the elements (and my proposition involves a definition of what elementary education is), should be borne as far as possible by the parents who are perfectly willing and able to pay proper fees, or by endowments, which are as much private contributions as if the founder were still alive. The only way in which the Treasury should contribute to schools of special apprenticeships is by providing exhibitions and scholarships for children who show capacity, but are unable to pay.

Moved—

“For a Return of all money voted by Parliament for education in the year ending April last :

1. For public education, elementary and technical, in England, Scotland, and Ireland ;
2. Science and Art Department, including agriculture ;
3. Reformatory and industrial schools ;
4. Queen's colleges, Ireland, and Welsh colleges ;
5. Military and naval colleges, academies, and schools ;

And “That in the opinion of this House elementary education should be more distinctly defined in ‘the Code,’ as recommended by the Royal Commissioners, and the cost of all public instruction above such limits should be met by fees, or by exhibitions for children of the wage earning class capable and desirous of availing themselves of it, or by endowments.”—(The Lord Norton.)

*LORD COLCHESTER: My Lords, I agree very heartily with what has been said by my noble Friend in calling the attention of the House to this matter. In the first instance I think there can be no doubt that what is being done in many cases out of the rates in aid of schools goes beyond the original intentions of those who promoted the Elementary Education Act. The object of passing that Act was to remove the great weight of ignorance pressing upon the poorer classes, whose children are compelled to leave school at an early age. There are some people who seem to think that the best system is that of Switzerland, where almost every grade of education, high and low, is paid for by the State ; but that is not the principle, I think, which England is prepared to accept. Then it has been said that everyone who pays the rates in support of these schools would be at liberty to use them for the education of their children. That, I think, is very much on a par with the argument that everyone who pays the poor rate is entitled to the benefit of outdoor relief. I think the expense thrown upon the public at large by this system of elementary schools doing the work of secondary education produces great waste, because they are driving out of the field other classes of schools which can best carry out the work of higher and technical education. Now my noble Friend has referred to the Commission which reported in 1868, and whose Report has been the foundation of all the Acts subsequently passed in relation to endowed schools. That Report certainly did say that a third grade of schools was a great want in this country, and that the higher education should be more efficiently provided for. As the noble Lord has said, they considered that it was the great use of all the smaller endowments throughout England that they should be applied for that purpose. It was to provide for the education of a class rather better off than those who attend the elementary schools, or of those who might be selected from the elementary schools, and as to whom it was considered worth while that, having shown capacity, they should be afforded the means of continuing their education to a greater age, and of entering upon the higher subjects. But, my Lords, I know that in a great many cases those endowments have been almost rendered useless, and they have been almost driven out of the field by the competition of the rate-supported schools, which are maintained out of public funds contributed by the ratepayers. There are a great many of these endowments which for obvious reasons ought to be applied to the lowest form of secondary education. Those endowments were intended, to a great extent, for the benefit of the poorer classes, and they would give those classes a benefit which they could not obtain in any other form. Then, if they are applied a step higher, to the higher secondary education, it would be necessary to raise the fees paid by those who receive it, because there would then be given an education which is not so very much required or desired by the poorer class, for whom, as I have stated, in many cases the smaller endowments were largely intended. The reason their administration has been so much attacked in many quarters is that they are used to a great extent for the middle instead of for the poorer classes. At the present time the schools are undertaking what is the proper work of the endowments, and they are now being made very difficult to apply for any useful purpose. It may be said, "That is all very well; but though there are many places which have, there are many places which have not these endowments." If it were recognised that this is a want of the country which can be supplied by a little relaxation of the restrictions hitherto imposed upon them, these endowments might be made useful over a considerable extent of the country. Then the noble Lord has referred to the voluntary efforts which have been made to supply schools throughout the country; and I think it would have been shown that by voluntary efforts these requirements could have been met, had it not been that to a great extent they have been killed by the competition of the schools subsidised from the rates. There is another point to which I will refer. Many people say, "Why should not the elementary schools keep on a certain number of boys a little longer for obtaining the higher education—why should not the boys be allowed to go on who have been educated from the beginning in the elementary schools?" Well, there is this difficulty: that the whole plan of secondary education from the first being different you cannot have it carried on on the same lines as the primary education. If a boy is to remain at school up to a certain age there is no reason why, if he is fit for them, he should not take up the higher studies at an earlier age than that at which the education of others ceases, why he should be educated in the elementary school until 12, and then only begin the secondary education within the last two years. He would probably be able to take it up at a much earlier age. But I think it is undesirable that the primary and secondary schools should be mixed up together. On the other hand, not only is the secondary school more expensive, but it is attended by a class who are better able to pay, and for that education higher fees ought to be paid. The argument that clever but poorer children should not be deprived of the opportunity of obtaining that higher education, may be met by the proposal that exhibitions and scholarships should be provided out of the public money if they cannot be provided out of educational endowments. By this system of allowing elementary schools to enter upon a province which is not theirs you are not only increasing the expense, but deranging the proper course of education. The objection to the present system is not merely pecuniary, it is also educational. I can vouch for the accuracy of the figures which have been stated by my noble Friend as to the cost at which the Third Grade education can be carried out and the expenditure now entailed by attempting to give this lower form of technical education. I think the employment of endowments is the proper mode of carrying out that object, and that the present system is a derangement of the proper educational system, which brings together and mixes up what ought to be kept entirely separate. It puts an end to private action and tends to kill voluntary effort.

*EARL FORTESCUE: My Lords, the point which I wish principally to dwell upon in the few remarks I shall have to offer to your Lordships is the urgent need which exists of some definition, if not of what elementary education is, at any rate of what elementary education is not. There seems to me no very intelligible line drawn which can serve as a guide between even the highest University curriculum and elementary school teaching in the schools under the direction of the Minister of Education; because it is to be remembered that Ministers may take different views, and may introduce many things into a Code, and, as that becomes law after lying on the Tables of both Houses for 40 days, there is no saying what we may find done by some future Minister of Education. The urgent need of some intelligible line being drawn between elementary and non-elementary schools is one that I have long felt, and have often pressed, both vis à vis in your Lordships' House and in print. I have repeatedly protested against Government aiding by grants, and therefore securing the right to interfere with higher education, which was in that masterly Report of the Commission of 1868 described as "secondary education;" but now secondary education is liable to come before us disguised under the name of technical instruction, or of advanced elementary schools, which one of the highest educational authorities in the country—Bishop Temple—said "ought to be called non-elementary," and he added that it was about "the worst way in which money could be applied in the promotion of education." Now, my Lords, Parliament and the public generally have been trying in various ways to encourage thrift, especially among the wage-earning classes, and that not merely for the sake of promoting the accumulation of capital and of preventing waste—an accumulation which, in the aggregate, is considerable, though made up of very small sums—but even more for the purpose of encouraging a spirit of independence and of self-reliance, as well as self-denial among the poorer classes of the people. Well, my Lords, we are now, on the contrary, threatened with what I venture to say is mis-called "free education." But the real description of what is called free education is State-paid or rate-paid education. It may not, in some instances, be the result of private benevolence that gratitude is elicited; but all experience shows that alms given by an individual—how often, as a rule, injudiciously given!—at least elicit some feelings of gratitude; but anything eleemosynary given out of rates and taxes is grudgingly given by the ratepayers and thankfully received by the recipients. It altogether misses all the wholesome beneficial influences which emanate from eleemosynary gifts made at the expense of self-denial in the giver. I may say that, apart from this idea of free education, a most mischievous system has grown up of late of sanctioning Government grants of money for educational purposes on a greatly enlarged scale, which has been encouraging the very reverse of the principle which in other capacities we have been trying to develop. We have been thus encouraging a habit of constant reliance on the Government, and constant applications from various bodies for assistance. One industry after another appeals for Government grants, and the great important agricultural interest, which generally moves rather slowly, has at last joined in the general scramble, and has been moving earnestly to get some public money. Everyone seems to be trying to get something out of the rates and taxes—a melancholy change within the lifetime of some of us from the habitual love of independence and self-reliance, which was supposed to be the characteristic of Englishmen. We have had examples at South Kensington of grants being sought for and obtained, especially in a very little agricultural department there, by schools in the heart of London, and in the heart of such large towns as Liverpool, for instance. A very large proportion of those little grants have been obtained by schools in towns not in the least for the benefit of the scholars, but for the benefit of the teachers, not with any reasonable prospect of improving the work of agriculture in any agricultural district, but to obtain a certain number of pounds sterling for the particular schools. I will not repeat on the present occasion what I have often reminded your Lordships of, that the tendency of Government establishments is towards stagnation, and too often after a time to jobbery. Stagnation is particularly to be deplored in the case of higher education; and it would be a terrible misfortune if the higher education of the country comes to be manipulated by a Government Department. As to jobbery, the worst part of it is not the waste of money, but the demoralisation and the degrading influence which it exercises in all directions. We surely ought not to extend Government interference further than is absolutely necessary for the good of the country. I understand that that high educational authority, Lord Lingen, says that elementary education ought as such to be considered to stop at the Fourth Standard. I entirely agree with him. Any child who has reached the attainments certified by passing the Fourth Standard has the requisite means of extending his knowledge indefinitely, and particularly if, as both my noble Friends have, I think, very truly said, assistance is given from public money by means of scholarships and exhibitions to superior schools. If there are only one or two children pursuing the higher studies in an elementary school, those higher studies which we find some wishing should be carried on in every school, they will study at very great disadvantage as compared with those who are carrying on the same studies in a class with others in the same state of proficiency, for the spirit of emulation and sympathy will be very much wanting to them. Besides that, for a very small, infinitesimal number of students you will demand a great deal of energy and time from the already, too often, rather overworked teacher in a small school. Now, scholarships from the elementary schools to the higher ones may be provided either out of the taxes by the State or by the Local Bodies out of the rates, which is a little questionable in principle perhaps, but still open to little objection, or by the benevolence of those who are interested in education, many of whom have (as I have myself) contributed for the purpose of giving scholarships to higher schools for the most promising boys from the elementary schools who are ex hypothesi capable of profiting by the higher instruction and are desirous of doing so. As my noble Friend has very truly said, the great majority of children cannot be expected in the short time that precedes the necessity of their earning, or helping to earn, their livelihood, to make very much progress; and their detention at school in order to attain a particular standard and a certain amount of book-learning, the retention of which is very short and precarious in their case, prevents their learning what is of greater consequence to them. In order to do that you prevent their learning, at the most favourable time, the business of their lives, and thus qualifying themselves to become skilled instead of unskilled workmen. You do this at considerable cost and at the sacrifice of an amount of work for employers, and especially for agricultural employers, which, though small perhaps in the case of each child, is in the aggregate very considerable; and all this because you will not recognise the essential difference there is between those who are naturally capable and desirous of profiting by the opportunities of higher education placed within their reach, and those who are willing and desirous, as are their parents also, to learn more of the future business of their lives instead. Perhaps I have detained you too long with my own strong convictions on this subject, though I may remind your Lordships they are shared by many others. I will only say that they are borne out by the elaborate Report of the Education Commissioners which was presented in 1888. In the summary of their recommendations they say that "As the meaning and limits of the term 'elementary school' have not been defined in the Education Acts, nor by any judicial or authoritative interpretation, but depend only on the annual Codes of the Department, whose power of framing such Codes no limit has hitherto been imposed, it would appear to be of absolute necessity"

—very strong words, my Lords, for a strong Commission to use—

"That some definition of the instruction to be paid for out of the rates and taxes should be given by the Legislature. Until this is done, the limits of primary and secondary education cannot be defined."

In the Report they describe the successive Codes as emanating from successive Ministers, and Lord Lingen very much disapproves of that system, and describes that unlimited power as "dangerous." But the Commissioners elaborate this, and it is one of the conclusions they arrive at. In giving their summary they say, at page 145—

"Since 1870 the practice of the Department has continually raised and extended the various limits of elementary education so as gradually to include a range of subjects proper to schools for higher education. It is given in evidence that languages, classical and modern, advanced science"

—just what may be taught, my Lords, and is being taught, at the Universities of the land—might be taught in elementary schools, and that parents of all classes had a right, and were at liberty, to send their children to them.

"Not a few of the children of the wealthy classes," as my noble Friend has already stated,

"are attending the Board Schools. It does not appear that in 1870 this result was contemplated; and it has become a matter of serious complaint, especially to those of the poorer classes, who are compelled to pay the School Board rates. The Act of 1870 enables the Department to frame and impose a Code which after lying a month on the Table in the Houses of Parliament become law."

Now, my Lords, I will just give a sample of the great power, I may say the legislative power, exercised by the Department. The Act of 1870 says that it does not include any school in which the ordinary payments in respect of the instruction for each scholar exceeds 9d. per week. It seems from that that the intention of the Legislature was very obvious that 9d. a week was the utmost limit. What says the Code of a few years ago?—a Code which I was not so much surprised to find emanating from a Government presided over by a master of subtle distinctions, and who, as Mr. Forster, I think it was, said, "Could persuade most men of most things and himself of almost anything." That Code speaks of—"The ordinary payment for each scholar . . . will, as a rule, be found by dividing the total amount of fees payable by the number of scholars on the registers for that week."

So that 3s. might be the amount of the fees for some, provided there were a sufficient number of 1d. scholars to bring the actual average down to 9d. My Lords, even the Minority Report says, "It is not desirable that the Department should defeat the plain meaning of an Act of Parliament." I would appeal to your Lordships whether the passage in the Code I have just read does not do so. I must say, my Lords, that it is with great regret I have seen the subsequent Codes at the hands of different Ministers continuing that, in my opinion, very objectionable clause, a clause unquestionably defeating the obvious intention of the Legislature. The Commissioners go on to say in their Report—

"It would appear, therefore, of absolute necessity that the instruction to be paid for out of rates and taxes should be fixed by the Legislature. Until this is done the limits of primary and secondary education cannot be fixed."

And they say that this is desirable, because—

"The indirect inclusion of the higher education in the elementary schools is injurious both to primary and secondary education."

Not only does this ruin and drive away the private adventure schools and reduce the endowed schools, founded by our ancestors, to a state of comparative inutility, but there is in consequence of it an immense waste of teaching power. Not only has it that bad effect, but it is sapping the spirit of independence and self-reliance, and inducing even the wealthy to lean upon the rates and taxes, and to endeavour to take advantage of these petty grants in aid of the education of their children, which are made out of the rates and taxes paid by their neighbours. Well, my Lords, this language which I have just read to you emanates from 15 out of the 23 Commissioners, and those conclusions were arrived at after an exhaustive inquiry. Those Commissioners were many of them men identified not only with education, distinguished not merely by their zeal for it, but by the services they have rendered to it; and, perhaps, I may be allowed to say that for the last half-century, I myself, in a much more humble way and on a much smaller scale, have devoted to education a great deal of time and thought, and in proportion, too, of money, more a good deal to elementary education than even to middle-class education. It is, therefore, from no indifference to the subject, from no desire certainly to keep back any poor child who is capable and desirous of profiting by the higher education, but from a deep conviction that the present system is wasteful in practice, inadequate in results, and enervating to the national character, that I have ventured so long to occupy the attention of your Lordships' House.

*THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): My Lords, I feel some difficulty in coming to a conclusion as to the points to which I am expected to reply, because my noble Friends have made speeches so discursive upon the whole subject of education, that I hardly know where I should begin and where I should leave off. With regard to the Returns which my noble Friend asks for, I can only say that, as far as my Department is concerned, we are quite prepared to give them, and, so far as I understand, the other Departments are also prepared to do so, with a slight alteration which has been suggested, and which my noble Friend has acceded to. My noble Friend told us first of all he was not going to enter into the question of elementary education at all, and he did not, I admit, go very far into the question; but my noble Friend who followed him has gone at great length into the point, and has questioned all the different measures connected with elementary education, not only in reference to the present Code, but in regard to the provisions under previous Acts. He has also called attention to other matters in reference to carrying into effect the present system of education, and has ventured upon an assertion, as far as I gather, that it has been stated by Lord Lingen that all elementary education should end at the Fourth Standard. I do not remember ever seeing or hearing such a statement of that noble Lord.

*EARL FORTESCUE: It was mentioned to me. I only say that I have heard it.

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: It is immaterial to the argument. I do not desire to dwell upon it, but I thought I would ask my noble Friend for his authority.

LORD LINGEN: If I may be allowed to interpose for a moment, I did not hear the noble Lord make the statement now referred to, but the statement that is attributed to me, to the best of my recollection, I never did make.

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: Then we are called upon by my noble Friend to define what elementary education is not, if not what it is. That is a very extraordinary demand, for this Commission, upon which my noble Friend sat so long, with others who were so well qualified to deal with the subject, after sitting for nearly three years, came to the conclusion that they could give no definition, and they thought they had better throw it upon others to get that definition in some shape which would be satisfactory to the country. Well, my Lords, I heard that it had been defined in a Scotch Act, and, as we know that Scotchmen are said to be so good at definitions, I looked up the Act to see if I could get any assistance there. I found the Scotch were not at all before us in the matter, for they only referred to it as "such education as may be given in the State-aided schools in Scotland pursuant to the provisions of the Education Act." I do not think that carries us very far. Then, as far as we are concerned, we endeavour to lay down a limit; because the Department I am connected with has only to deal with elementary education. Therefore, my Lords, the Code we have produced would be supposed to state how far we think elementary education can be carried; but, after all, if we go into particulars, there is no such thing as can be by a hard line be limited as "elementary education." Elementary education embraces, among other things, religious education. Well, that is excluded from the present system of elementary education. It is not necessary for any State-aided school to give any religious education at all. There is no saying what elementary education is, and, therefore, as far as any definition is required I must decline to make any attempt to give it. No one, however, will suppose that in laying down that you shall teach under elementary education reading, writing, and arithmetic, that merely mechanical process shall be carried out, and that it does not involve anything more. Nor can you say, even if those were prescribed as the limits of what was to be taught, that you could be sure of obtaining only elementary education. I think if you were to introduce Max Müller to teach the alphabet he would be able, in doing so, to give very advanced instruction indeed, which would carry those taught into very far-off regions of science, philological, ethnological, and otherwise. And so it goes on by degrees, so that I defy anyone to say where primary education ends and secondary education begins. The distinction can, however, be made in a rough way, and the Department has made it in a rough way. My noble Friend wants us, as far as I can see, to say where fees shall begin and where they shall end. If I understand his Resolution I should read it to imply that up to the point at which he considers elementary education to end fees should not be paid, and yet I understood him in his speech to say something the very reverse of that, for he went on to say that beyond that the educational requirements of the poorer classes should be met by exhibitions and scholarships. My noble Friend opposite also would allow those additions to come in. Why is the State to come in and provide exhibitions and scholarships out of the public funds, and not to apply the public funds for the purpose of supplying the same education in another way, if it thinks best? My noble Friends say that voluntary effort has been dried up by what the State has done. Does anyone who is aware of the foundations of scholarships and technical schools, which we see day by day, venture to say that? A gentleman told me the other day that one of the great manufacturers of the County had, within about two years and a half, given away as much as £150,000 for purposes of education in this country, and, therefore, I think it is absurd to say that we are stopping all voluntary effort. I object altogether to arguing the question of education on such a Resolution as this. What we want in this country is something concrete to argue upon, not something merely abstract as is this Resolution which has been put down on the Notice Paper by my noble Friend. Then the "wage-earning classes" are referred to. My noble Friend spoke of exhibitions for the children of the wage-earning class. Why of the wage-earning class only? I am sorry to say there are many people in this country who do not belong to the wage-earning class who are just as poor as the wage-earners. Why are not they to be included? It would, I think, be the hardest case in the world that people often almost on the verge of pauperism, but not in the position of labourers, should not be allowed, simply because they are not labourers, to have their children taught in the higher schools by obtaining these scholarships and exhibitions. So that I object altogether to the terms in which my noble Friend has put this Resolution down. I should like also to call your Lordships' attention to this point. We have laid down, as far as we can, in the Code what we think fairly comes within the limits of elementary education. I say at once there is not one of the subjects put down there which cannot be taught in a manner which would carry it far beyond what would be considered elementary. If you examine the discussions which took place with the witnesses who were called before the Commission with regard to elementary education, you will find that it means one thing in one man's mind and another thing in the mind of another. Therefore, it shades off by degrees, primary education into secondary, without any possibility of drawing a rigid line between the two. Up to the Seventh Standard I consider that we are within the Code for elementary education, beyond that I consider we are outside it. With regard to the point to which my noble Friend Lord Fortescue called attention, it is quite true that the Commission was very anxious to make a distinction between secondary and primary education, but they did not do it. Nor did they altogether disclaim these higher grade schools to which my noble Friend has referred. On the contrary, they regretted that there were no means of extending them. They say on page 169 of the Report—

"It is to be regretted that no practical suggestion was made for extending such higher education to rural districts or to populations below 10,000 or 15,000."

But they also said this—

"If the curriculum of the higher elementary schools is restricted within due limits, avoiding the ground belonging to secondary education, and if due precautions are taken to secure that promising children of poor parents shall have the privilege of education afforded by the higher schools, then we are of opinion that such schools may prove useful additions to our school machinery."

What for? Secondary education? No; "for primary education." It may be urged that grants from the Government should not go to them. That is another thing, but I think it will be agreed that children should be allowed to go on, that they should have the opportunity of going further; and Scotland has been instanced, where they are allowed to go on even to the age of 18, and the advocates for continuing education do not see why that should not be so in England. I feel as strongly as anyone that we have infringed upon secondary education in our educational scheme, and there has been no doubt, in certain cases, some amount of competition; but I would say also that where the School Boards have entered into competition they represented the ratepayers, who have not debarred them from going into that competition. Therefore, whatever has been done in that respect has been done under the influence of the great body of public opinion, and not merely at the instance of one or two persons. Mention has been made of Chesterfield. I do not know the case to which my noble Friend refers, but I think it very likely that if a school is of a high character, with a fee payable not exceeding 9d. per week, many people would be ready to send their children there. My noble Friend (Lord Colchester) who has been connected with the Charity Commission told you that they have endeavoured to meet the wants of the country by these scholarships and exhibitions. Your Lordships must remember that these scholarships and exhibitions are only to be won by competition, and they are only obtained by the ablest children. I would venture to call my noble Friend's attention to a point which he has perhaps not studied. It appears that in some of these cases where the Charity Commissioners have instituted scholarships and exhibitions, they have forgotten that if they give a scholarship of a certain class to a poor boy, that is not enough unless they give him maintenance money, and in certain cases, especially in large towns like Liverpool, it has been found that poor children have been unable to hold a scholarship because they have not the necessary maintenance, and they have, therefore, been obliged to give it up; but now as the Liverpool County Council provide the maintenance, no scholarships are thrown up, showing that there was no disinclination to allow the children to go on advancing in their education, but that it was the absolute necessity of the case which prevented. That raises a very grave question, how far you are to give assistance in these cases from the rates; but that the State should provide for children and undertake their maintenance, as well as to give them allowances in the nature of scholarships, is one of those serious questions which I would rather not go into on the present occasion. My noble Friend has spoken of assisted education in prospect. I must decline altogether to enter into an argument with regard to free, as distinguished from assisted education. I will only now say this, that nothing would induce me to go into that system of assisted education by grants if I thought it would interfere with the independent spirit of parents, or with the system of religious education in the country, which I hope will continue, as the whole education of the country begun upon it. My Lords, I do not know that I should in any way further the interests of education by entering into any further discussion on this question. If I had been addressed by my noble Friend in reference to any particular points of the Code, I should have been ready to give any explanation in my power; but that has not been the case. The discussion has been academic. It has been a discussion on the system. I do not think it has been a useful discussion, that it can serve any useful purpose, or that your Lordships, from the appearance of the Benches, take a very deep interest in it; and, therefore, I will for the present adjourn it, believing that next year we shall be able to discuss the subject with far greater facilities than we have at present.

Viscount Cranbrook

Great changes have been made in our system of education within the experience of my noble Friend, and I am quite sure he will look to the change in public opinion in dealing with any future system of education; but what we have all to do is to look at the matter in the concrete form in which it will be before us next year, and any discussion on those issues will, I hope, be far more valuable than any present expression of shadowy views. I hope, therefore, my noble Friend will not press to a Division this Resolution, which would pledge us to nothing, and could only throw us into confusion.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

EDUCATION.

"Return of all money voted by Parliament for education in the year ending April last, for

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 20th June, 1890.

QUESTIONS.

AMERICAN CATTLE.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if his attention has been called to the resolution passed on the 11th inst. by the United States Senate, calling on the President to negotiate for securing the modification of the present rules regarding the importation of American cattle into the United Kingdom; and if Her Majesty's Government will, in the declared absence of any other commercial lever for the reduction of hostile tariffs, require that the modification by America of the proposed prohibitive duties upon the products of the United Kingdom shall be a condition precedent to any negotiations whatever?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): Restrictions upon the importation of cattle into the United Kingdom are based solely upon sanitary considerations, and have no regard to the fiscal system adopted by other countries.

GROCERS' LICENCES.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether grocers' licences are included in the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Bill?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): Perhaps I may be allowed to answer the question. Grocers' licences are not included.

MAJOR RASCH: Are other off-licences included?

*MR. RITCHIE: No; there are no off-licences included in the Bill at all; but there are Amendments on the Paper asking the House to insert off-licences in the suspensory clauses of the Bill.

THE UNITED STATES TARIFF BILL.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, by the Tariff Bill passed by the House of Representatives of the United States nemine contradicente, and only awaiting the confirmation of the Senate and President to come into force, it is proposed to increase the duties on Sheffield pocket knives to 100 per cent. ad valorem from 50 per cent. as now, on Sheffield razors to 75 per cent. ad valorem from 50 per cent., on Sheffield carving and cooks' knives to 70 per cent. ad valorem from 35 per cent. as now, on Sheffield table cutlery to 50 per cent. instead of 35 per cent. as now, on Sheffield scissors and shears to 45 per cent. instead of 35 per cent. as now, on Birmingham breechloading guns from 80 per cent. to 100 per cent. ad valorem; and if analogous prohibitive duties are placed by the Bill upon other productions of Great Britain, and notably of South Wales, Lancashire, Glasgow, and Belfast?

MR. H. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): It is also proposed by the Tariff Bill to increase the duty on hops.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I cannot say offhand whether it is proposed to alter the duty on hops. In reply to the question on the Paper, I stated, in answer to a somewhat similar question on the 6th of May, that

"It appears to be intended in the new Tariff Bill, submitted to the House of Representatives of the United States, on the whole to increase the Import Duties on Sheffield cutlery and edged tools from 50 to 100 per cent., though in some classes of edged tools a decrease seems to be intended. Her Majesty's Government are not in a position to judge what the amount of value will be."

The duties on the productions of the other districts named in the question will also be increased; but as in certain instances the basis of duty—namely, from ad valorem to weight—is altered, it is not prudent to hazard an opinion what the rate of increase will really be, nor whether the new rates will be "prohibitive duties." We must, however, assume that the effect will be to enhance the existing duties.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to give notice, in consequence of the answer of my right hon. Friend to this question, and also to my previous one, that as the American Tariff proposals will inflict great injury upon the trade of Sheffield and upon British traders and artisans in other parts of the country, I shall, if they are carried into operation, invite the House to consider, as soon as practicable, whether a free market should be longer given to the competing productions of a foreign State putting prohibitive duties upon British goods.

THE TELEPHONE.

SIR J. PULESTON (Devonport): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether any decision has been arrived at as to the action to be taken in reference to the telephone; and, if so, whether he can state it to the House?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): I have to announce that the Government do not intend to give notice to purchase the undertakings of the telephone companies at the end of the first period of their licence, namely, the 31st of December next.

LLANDILO LOCAL BOARD.

MR. LLOYD MORGAN (Carmarthen, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the conduct of the Local Board of Llandilo, Carmarthenshire, in expending a sum of money in a manner which they are not by law authorised to expend it; whether, on the 12th of June, in reply to a communication on the subject, he stated that the Board had acted illegally in authorising such expenditure, and that the decision of the Auditor in allowing it could not be sustained in law; whether he declined to interfere with such unauthorised expenditure by the Board, and such illegal decision of the Auditor; and whether he will re-consider the matter with a view to compelling the Board to act legally, and to directing the Auditor to disallow the amount?

*MR. RITCHIE: The Local Government Board received an appeal from two ratepayers of Llandilo against a decision of the District Auditor in allowing £3 18s. 4d. in the accounts of the Local Board for the year ending Lady Day, 1889, in respect of the lighting and repair of a clock in the tower of Llandilo Church. The clock in question, it appears, was presented to the town in commemoration of Her Majesty's Jubilee, and is stated to have been placed in the Church tower because it was regarded as the most suitable place for it. The Board, upon the appeal against the disallowance, decided that as the clock, although presented to the town, was not the property of the Local Board they had no statutory authority for the expenditure which they had incurred, and the Board informed the Local Board and the District Auditor accordingly. The Board, however, considered that the circumstances were not such as to require that the members of the Local Board who had authorised the payment should be called upon personally to refund the sums in question, and they therefore in the exercise of the discretion vested in them by the statute allowed the charge to remain in the accounts. The Board's decision applies only to the expenditure in the year ended Lady Day, 1889. If future expenditure of the kind is incurred and charged on the rates it can be objected to at the audit, and will no doubt be disallowed by the Auditor.

MEETINGS IN TRAFALGAR SQUARE.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the proclamation of the last Chief Commissioner of Police but one (Sir Charles Warren), relative to meetings in Trafalgar Square, still holds good after two years; if the police will receive orders to interfere with a meeting called in Trafalgar Square of Temperance Reformers, to discuss the Compensation Clauses; and if the Home Office will confer with the London County Council on this matter?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): The Regulation issued by Sir C. Warren on the 18th of November, 1887, as to meetings in Trafalgar Square, still holds good, and I am advised that no re-issue is necessary. I have no information as to any intended meeting in the Square; but I must repeat what I stated in this House on the 15th of May, 1888, that until this Regulation is countermanded the duty of the police will be to prevent any public meeting being held in the Square, or in the adjacent thoroughfare.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK (Whitehaven): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the inhabitants of London are entirely opposed to the holding of meetings in Trafalgar Square?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes; I believe that is so.

WAR OFFICE CONTRACTS—MATERIEL.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if the quality of the projectiles recently obtained from abroad, by reason of the lower foreign tender, was equal to that proposed to be supplied from Sheffield at a somewhat higher price; and in what way it was or will be tested to show that the £14 per projectile saved in cost was not lost in the material and the excellence of Sheffield manufacture?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The tests for armour-piercing projectiles are laid down by the Ordnance Committee, and are the same wherever the shells may be manufactured. The contract is placed with a firm of great reputation, and the proofs have been quite satisfactory.

THE MILITIA.

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Newington, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether a considerable number of Militia battalions are still without musketry instructors; and, if so, what is the reason of the deficiency?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: There are 31 vacancies for musketry instructors. Candidates for commissions in the Army are not allowed to take these appointments; and most of the present subalterns are thus debarred. On the other hand, captains, though eligible, do not care to give up their company duties, hence the deficiency. During training, however, there is no difficulty in obtaining suitable officers, either from the line or from other Militia battalions.

PIRACY OF BRITISH COPYRIGHTS.

MR. QUILTER (Suffolk, Sudbury): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that a large quantity of American piracies of British copyright publications of engravings and etchings are being imported into this country, with the cognisance of Her Majesty's Customs, without any steps being taken to seize the same for their infringement of the Merchandise Marks

Act, inasmuch as they bear no imprint showing where they were printed, in accordance with that Act; and whether steps will be taken to put a stop to a trade which is highly injurious to the interests of British Art?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The Merchandise Marks Act does not require a statement of origin. The Commissioners of Customs inform me that they have no knowledge of the circumstances mentioned in the question, but will be glad to make inquiry if specific information is laid before them.

ENGINEER STUDENTS.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he can state the reason why the standard of qualification for the entry of engineer students was raised this year, and why, since the examination, that standard has been lowered to that of last year; and how many candidates attained the higher standard of qualification, and how many inferior candidates have been, or are to be, accepted below that standard?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (LORD G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The standard of qualification for the entry of engineer students was raised this year, because the advantages offered by the engineering branch of the Navy were such as to justify the Admiralty in believing that a more capable class than heretofore would compete. This expectation was justified in the main. This standard still remains in force; but, as I explained before, six candidates who came up to the previous standard were specially entered in order to complete the number of entries required for the year.

CAPE COLONY.

SIR DONALD CURRIE (Perthshire, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he will be good enough to lay upon the Table of the House Copies of the letter from the Foreign Office, dated the 12th February, 1889, addressed to the Colonial Office, with the enclosure therein referred to; also, Sir Hercules Robinson's Despatch to Lord Knutsford, dated the 15th April, 1889 (No. 270), with the enclosure to the said letter, being a Minute of the Prime Minister of the Cape, Sir Gordon Sprigg, addressed to the Governor of Cape Colony, and dated Cape Town, 9th April, 1889?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: These Papers form part of a correspondence, and cannot be given separately. It will be considered what Papers it is desirable to present to the House, and I will inform the hon. Member as soon as I can.

H.M.S. EGERIA.

SIR T. ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if the Report of the investigation into the circumstances of the mutiny on board H.M.S. Egeria will be laid before the House?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The Report of this inquiry has not yet been received at the Admiralty. It has never been customary to make such Reports public and there is no reason in the present instance to depart from that rule.

THE COMPOSITORS OF THE SCOTTISH LEADER.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been directed to the alleged action of the Scottish Leader newspaper in forcibly removing, by the aid of the police, all the compositors who were members of the Trade Union (on the 26th May 1890); if they acted in their legal right in so doing; and if the terms of agreement, which the men were compelled to sign, have been brought to his notice; and, if so, do they constitute a violation of the Truck Act? In putting this question, I wish to make a brief explanation. I believe this is the first occasion in which such a question has been asked in this House. These men consider themselves to have been ill-treated, and they come to Parliament as a last resource in order to guide the public in the matter. The compositors in question were employed on the Scottish Leader newspaper in Edinburgh, and they were dismissed for joining a Trades Union—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is exceeding the limits of a question.

Sir Donald Currie

MR. C. GRAHAM: Do I understand that I am at liberty to put my question?

*MR. SPEAKER: The question on the Paper is perfectly in order.

MR. C. GRAHAM: Then I beg to put it.

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Scotch Office and by the Chief Inspector of Factories that they have no information as to the facts referred to. Inquiries will, however, be made by both Departments without delay.

THE ANGLO-GERMAN AGREEMENT.

MR. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Stevenson Road is itself the boundary between the English and German territories; whether the boundary is drawn with regard to the strategical requirements of any future railway or other means of communication connecting the Lakes Tanganyika and Nyassa; and whether there is already existing free transit for English goods across Damaraland; and, if not, whether, in view of the German extension permitted to the Zambesi, this matter will receive the attention of Her Majesty's Government?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The Stevenson Road itself is not to be the boundary. The boundary is certainly intended to be drawn so as to facilitate communication by railway or otherwise between the two Lakes. Transit across Damaraland is subject to local imposts and conditions, as in other territories where no special agreement to the contrary exists; but negotiations are still proceeding with reference to that quarter, and the matter will be borne in mind.

MR. O'KELLY (Roscommon, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the principle laid down in the Agreement with Germany in reference to East Africa, "that the Hinterland belongs of right to the Power holding the Coast Line," will be applied to the Portuguese possessions in Africa in cases of dispute between Great Britain and Portugal?

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): May I ask whether the same principle is to be admitted by Germany as applicable to the territory running eastwards from Walfish Bay to the corner of Bechuanaland?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: It is evident that the principle cannot be of universal application. Each case must be considered on its own merits.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Are the Government prepared to recommend the cession of some of the Channel Islands to France in return for concessions in respect of the Newfoundland Fisheries?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. BUCHANAN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Heads of Agreement published in the Berlin Official Gazette, and reprinted in the Times of June 18th, represent the terms of Agreement with Germany so far as yet concluded; whether this Paper will be laid upon the Table of the House; and when other Papers relating to the negotiations with Germany as regards Africa, and as regards the proposed cession of Heligoland, will be circulated?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Either in translation or transcription the text of the publication in question does not appear to be quite accurate. Lord Salisbury's Despatch, which has been laid on the Table, represents the outline of the proposed Agreement as in the hands of Her Majesty's Government. That outline is in course of development, but the details are subject to modification. It is, therefore, inexpedient to present anything further until the Convention has been completed.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is the intention of the Government to present to Parliament Papers relating to the Agreement with Germany for the settlement of African questions before the Bill for the surrender of Heligoland is introduced; and, if so, when these Papers will be presented?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Papers relating to the Agreement will be presented to Parliament. I understand that it is intended to introduce the Bill for the cession of Heligoland in the House of Lords. The hon. Member's word surrender is inappropriate. The Papers cannot be completed until the negotiations are finished, but they will be presented as soon as possible.

VOL. CCCXLV. [THIRD SERIES.]

MR. BRYCE: Can the right hon. Gentleman give the House any idea when the negotiations are likely to reach a point that will enable a Bill to be introduced?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I cannot say whether it will be possible to introduce a Bill before the Convention is signed.

SIR T. ESMONDE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if the Government will take steps to ascertain whether the people of Heligoland are satisfied to become Germanised?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): We have ground for believing that the arrangements made will have removed the chief objections to the transfer; but we could hardly expect or wish that we or the Heligolanders should part without mutual regret.

SIR T. ESMONDE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if the Government will take steps to ascertain whether the people of Heligoland are satisfied to become Germanised?

MR. W. H. SMITH: We have ground for believing that the arrangements made will have removed the chief objections to the transfer; but we could hardly expect or wish that we or the Heligolanders should part without mutual regret.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): Might I ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury whether he seriously intends to desert the loyal minority in Heligoland?

MR. O'KELLY (Roscommon, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, before agreeing to the cession of Heligoland, Her Majesty's Government consulted the Naval Authorities on the actual or possible strategic value of the Island of Heligoland; and, if not, whether Her Majesty's Government will do so before further proceeding with the proposed cession?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Yes, Sir.

MR. O'KELLY: I am sorry I did not catch the drift of the answer. Will the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury not give a more intelligible answer to my question as to whether the Naval Authorities have been consulted, or whether they will be consulted in the future?

3 H

MR. W. H. SMITH: I am sorry that the answer I gave was not intelligible to the hon. Member. It was a distinct affirmative to the question put—that the Government had consulted the Authorities before they came to a decision on this question.

MR. O'KELLY: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that General Sir Andrew Clarke has publicly denounced the cession of Heligoland?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Very likely, Sir; he has denounced a great many things.

SAMOA.

SIR T. ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs why the recent Treaty has not yet been put into force at Samoa, and when it will be?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The necessary steps have been taken by Her Majesty's Government and the Governments of the other contracting Powers, but some time is required for making the local arrangements.

THE CASE OF CHARLES JACKSON.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if his attention has been directed to the case of Charles Jackson, formerly constable under the Metropolitan Board of Works, and dismissed for bringing certain accusations against the officials of the Board of Guardians of Wandsworth and Clapham?

*MR. RITCHIE: Several letters have been addressed to the Local Government Board by Charles Jackson. I have no information as to the circumstances under which he was dismissed from his employment under the Metropolitan Board of Works; but in the letters which have been received from him he makes no allegation that he was dismissed in consequence of bringing accusations against the officials of the Board of Guardians. He has been an inmate of the workhouse of the Wandsworth and Clapham Union, and has made certain complaints. Copies of his communications have been forwarded to the Guardians.

CHINESE GAMBLING HOUSES IN HONG KONG.

MR. GROTRIAN (Hull, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies if he is aware that it is reported from Hong Kong that Chinese gambling houses are on the increase there; and, if so, whether the Government can adopt any means for their suppression?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de Worms, Liverpool, East Toxteth): No Report on the subject appears to have reached the Colonial Office, but inquiry will be made.

THE COUNTY COUNCILS AND THE LOCAL TAXATION BILL.

CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will inform the House how many County Councils have passed and forwarded to him resolutions in favour of the Compensation Clauses of the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties Bill, and how many resolutions condemning them?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Goschen, St. George's, Hanover Square): So far as I can find—and a special eye has been kept on communications from County Councils in the mass of correspondence I have received—two County Councils have sent me resolutions against the so-called Compensation Clauses of the Local Taxation Bill, and one County Council, while expressing a general approval of the Local Taxation Bill, has declined to offer an opinion one way or another on the clauses to which the hon. Member refers.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): Does the answer of the right hon. Gentleman apply to Corporations as well as County Councils?

MR. GOSCHEN: I have answered the question on the Paper, which relates to County Councils.

GRANTS FOR SCIENCE.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he has received remonstrances from the principal Educational Authorities and Managers of higher elementary schools in England and Scotland against Article 40 of the Science and Art Department, which excludes scholars in public elementary schools from being henceforward examined or earning grants in science; whether he has seen the statement of the National Association for the Promotion of Technical Education, which describes this circular "as one of the most serious blows which have been struck for some years at the development of scientific and technical education"; and whether, having regard to the feeling with which the circular has been received, he will cause it to be withdrawn?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): Representations have reached the Department that the effect of the circular in question will be detrimental to science instruction in many schools, and, although I am not prepared to endorse the language in which the circular has been described, I have already stated in answer to a question that this matter is under consideration, with a view to a serious modification of the Minute.

NAVAL UNIFORM.

CAPTAIN PRICE (Devonport): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty what alterations in Naval Officers' uniform have been sanctioned; and whether, for the convenience of officers, he will cause such to be made known without delay?

LORD G. HAMILTON: No alterations in the established uniform of Naval Officers have yet been sanctioned by the Admiralty. A Committee of Naval Officers, under the presidency of Admiral his Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh, is at present inquiring into the subject, but I cannot state when they will be ready to make their Report.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

MR. J. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in view of the intention of the Treasury to secure uniformity as to the regulations with reference to leave and sick leave throughout the Civil Service, paragraph 9 of the Order in Council of 21st March, 1890, will be made to apply to all clerks in the Second Division; and, if so, whether the annual holidays referred to in paragraph 8 of such Order in Council are to be subject to deductions for sick leave under Departmental regulations which were in force prior to the issue of the Order in Council?

MR. GOSCHEN: Clause 9 applies to all clerks of the Second Division, and I think the terms of it are sufficiently clear to require no further interpretation.

CHARGE AGAINST AN ENGLISH CONSUL.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has observed the following statement in the Primiero de Saniero of 12th June, an Oporto daily newspaper, respecting a serious crime alleged to have been practised in Shiré by the English Consul: (translation)

"Persons who have arrived by the African Packet, which also brought the protest of the Governor of Quillimane, confirm the facts. One of the two Sepoys was shot against a tree. The other was beaten to death with sticks at Chicomo, where Consul Buchanan had recently hoisted the English flag . . . The two Sepoys had been sent on a mission to Inhacuna Lundo by Jose Cardero, Governor of Massangire . . . The two Sepoys were made prisoners when crossing the river, and were murdered;"

and whether he has received any information in respect to this transaction; and, if so, will he communicate it to the House?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The latest Despatches from the Acting Consul mention no such occurrences, but inquiries are being made.

"SHARP V. WAKEFIELD."

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I had intended to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he will lay upon the Table, as Parliamentary Papers, the following documents in connection with the licensing case of "Sharp v. Wakefield," the statement of the case, and the judgments delivered in the Court of Appeal? but at the request of the right hon. Gentleman I will postpone it.

THE RUNNING DOWN OF THE OSPREY.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will instruct the Public Prosecutor to act, in reference to the verdict of manslaughter returned by the Coroner's Jury, 9th June, in the case of the running down of the smack Osprey by the steamship Henry Morton?

*MR. W. H. SMITH : The Director of Public Prosecutions undertook the prosecution in the Osprey case on the 13th inst., and procured the committal of the defendant for trial on a charge of manslaughter on the 18th inst., and will conduct the case at the ensuing Maidstone Assizes.

IRISH LIGHT RAILWAYS.

MR. DALTON (Donegal, W.) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether General Sankey, in his recent visit to Donegal to decide on the fittest route for a light railway in North West Donegal, was officially accompanied and advised by a Mr. Edmund Murphy, J.P., an official of the Board of Works; whether he is aware that Mr. Murphy is a Grand Juror of County Donegal, and in that capacity took a prominent part at the last Assizes in advocating one of the competing lines proposed for that district; and whether, though himself an official of the Board of Works, he was one of a deputation that waited on the Board of Works in connection with this railway line; whether, as a matter of fact, the line advocated by Mr. Murphy, and presumably recommended by him to General Sankey, meets with general opposition from the people of North West Donegal; and whether he has sanctioned the practice of officials of the Board of Works taking part officially in securing the adoption of a line of railway in which they are personally interested; and, if not, whether he will convey an expression of his opinion to the Board of Works for the guidance of their officials?

MR. JACKSON : I am informed that General Sankey at Easter paid a visit to Donegal for the purpose of informing himself as to the best route. He was accompanied by Mr. Murphy, but there was no official character attached to the visit. I am not able to enter into details with regard to the question.

MR. W. REDMOND : The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the last part of the question, whether he has sanctioned the practice of officials of the Board of Works taking part officially in securing the adoption of a line of railway in which they are personally interested?

MR. JACKSON : No, Sir. I have neither sanctioned it nor said anything about it. I am not aware, as a matter of fact, whether Mr. Murphy is an official of the Board of Works. I take it that it was the duty of General Sankey to avail himself of the resources or knowledge of anyone who was capable of giving him information.

MR. W. REDMOND : The hon. Gentleman says he is not aware whether Mr. Murphy is an official of the Board of Works or not. I regret that that answer will render it necessary that the question should be repeated, because the crucial point is whether Mr. Murphy was an official or not.

MR. JACKSON : In my judgment it does not affect the question at all.

MR. DALTON : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he can give any further information as to the cause of the delay in granting the sum of £116,000, recommended so strongly by the Light Railway Commissioners, and approved of unanimously by the Grand Jury of County Donegal at the last Spring Assizes, in favour of the Stranorlar and Glenties line; whether it is a fact that no opposition to the proposed line has been received from any quarter; and whether, in view of the Board of Works' Report—

“That the merits of the proposed Light Railway were superior from all points of view as compared with any other Light Railway which might be constructed opening up communication through the same district as the proposed line,” the works will be proceeded with without delay?

MR. JACKSON : I regret that I am not in a position at the present moment to make any statement in regard to this line. Any declaration of the decision of the Treasury might seriously prejudice the negotiations now going on.

MR. T. M. HEALY : Can the right hon. Gentleman give the House any idea how soon the Government will be able to approach the question?

MR. JACKSON : I hope the House will be content for the present with the answer I have given. Negotiations are going on with regard to these lines, and I am doing the best I can to bring about a satisfactory arrangement, so that I may be able to make an announcement to the House. I can assure the hon. and learned Member and the House that, as far as I am concerned, no unnecessary delay will take place. I am endeavouring to make arrangements that will be to the interest of the counties through which these lines will pass.

MR. T. M. HEALY : Is it not the fact that all the arrangements have been before the Treasury for a period of six months? I do not say whether the time has been too long or too short; but they have been under consideration for a considerable period. May I hope that before the end of the Session, or before the Irish Estimates are brought on—which may not be until December—the arrangements will be completed?

MR. JACKSON : There will be no delay on my part.

MR. COX (Clare, E.) : Does not this line run through a large portion of an estate that is merely waste land, but for which the owner asks for compensation?

MR. JACKSON : I have no knowledge.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.) : Will the final arrangements in regard to these lines be made before the matter is brought before the House? If so, what use will there be in bringing the matter before the House at all?

MR. JACKSON : I hope that final arrangements will be made shortly, but it will be very difficult to make them unless the Government assume the entire responsibility.

MR. GILHOOLY (Cork, W.) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Treasury are prepared to sanction the grant recommended by the Board of Works for the construction of the Baltimore Extension Light Railway, and what is the cause of the delay in proceeding with the undertaking which passed the Grand Jury of the County of Cork at the Summer Assizes last year?

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. LONG, Wilts, Devizes) : My right hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury has asked me to state that negotiations are going on which he hopes will result in the making of the railway.

POOR'S RATE IN LONDONDERRY.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY (Londonderry) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what is the amount of Poor's Rate due in respect of holdings valued under £4 5s., for which the immediate lessors are liable under 1 and 2 Vic. c. 56, in the Union of Londonderry?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.) : The Local Government Board are informed by the Clerk of the Londonderry Union that the total amount of Poor's Rate due by immediate lessors in respect of holdings in the Union valued at and under £4 per annum is £13 14s. 5d.

POLICE SHADOWING IN IRELAND.

MR. COX : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Mr. John Malone, cattle buyer for a Glasgow firm of salesmasters, has been systematically followed by policemen when attending to his business at fairs in the County Clare; whether he will state the reason for this proceeding; and if Mr. Malone's claim for compensation in consequence of loss incurred by reason of this police shadowing will receive the favourable consideration of the Government?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : John Malone was watched at certain fairs because there was reason to believe that he was a boycotting agent. I am not aware, nor do I believe, that he was prevented from doing any legitimate business.

MR. T. M. HEALY : Does the right hon. Gentleman act on the principle that because a man is suspected of ruining other people's business his own business ought to be ruined also?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I have explained that I do not believe this man's business has been ruined.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.) : May I repeat a question which I put the other day? Is a permanent record kept to justify a responsible authority in ordering a particular individual to be shadowed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I imagine that there are records kept in all cases of shadowing, but I must ask the hon. Gentleman to put the question on the Paper?

CASTLEBLANEY UNION.

MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what is the amount of Poor's Rate due by the immediate lessors in respect of holdings valued at £4 and under in the Union of Castleblaney?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Local Government Board are informed by the Clerk of the Castleblaney Union that at present only one immediate lessor in the Union owes Poor's Rate in respect of holdings valued at and under £4 per annum, the amount due being £4 6s. 1d. Payment has been promised.

MR. BLANE: As the holding is so very small will the Local Government Board insist on payment being made?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot answer that question.

LAND COMMISSION—ROSCOMMON COUNTY.

MR. O'KELLY (Roscommon, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, whether complaints have reached him that, although Mr. Stephen Connor, of Daughloon, Strokestown Union, County Roscommon, served his landlord, Mr. J. H. Mahon, with a notice to have a fair rent fixed on the 11th October, 1887, no hearing of the case has yet been had?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners report that the facts are substantially as stated. The application, however, is being inserted in the list for hearing at Strokestown on the 24th July.

POINTMENT OF CATHOLIC MAGISTRATES IN IRELAND.

MR. MATTHEW KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if the Vice Lieutenant of County Tyrone has rejected the prayer of a Memorial, very extensively signed by the principal inhabitants of Dromore and vicinity, asking for the appointment of Mr. P. M'Laughlin to the Commission of the Peace; if the refusal to appoint Mr. M'Laughlin is due to the fact that he is a Catholic; if, at the same time, the Lord Chancellor has appointed an additional Protestant (Mr. Frederick Guy) to the Dromore Bench of Magistrates, although it has been recently brought to his notice that there are already nine Protestant and only one Catholic Magistrate in the district; and if he is aware that the Catholic population in the district largely preponderates?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that a Memorial in favour of the appointment to the Magistracy of the County Tyrone of Mr. M'Laughlin, a farmer residing in the Dromore District, was presented to the Vice Lieutenant of the County, and was not acceded to, but the refusal to appoint Mr. M'Laughlin was not on the ground of his religion, as the Vice Lieutenant is always glad to recommend Roman Catholics when properly qualified persons of that religious denomination are brought to his notice. The Vice Lieutenant, in recommending the appointment of Mr. Frederick Andrew Guy (who is a Presbyterian), informed the Lord Chancellor that Mr. Guy was recommended to him by persons of every religion and class in the district, and that, having inquired into his qualifications, he found him to be well-fitted to be a Magistrate. I have no information as to the relative proportion of the several religious denominations in the district.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): What are the grounds of the refusal?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot say; it is a matter which rests in the discretion of the Vice Lieutenant.

MR. M. KENNY: I beg to give notice that I will raise the question again.

MR. WELDON, J.P.

MR. FINUCANE (Limerick, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with regard to the case of J. Weldon, J.P., Ashill, Kilmallock, County Limerick, who assaulted a cattle dealer from Tipperary, at Knocklong Fair, in October last, and in whose case, at the last Spring Assizes in Limerick, a Jury awarded to the said cattle dealer a sum of £50 and costs, whether the attention of the Lord Chancellor will be directed to the conduct of Mr. Weldon?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand the Lord Chancellor has considered this case, and taking the circumstances into account sees no reason for further action.

MR. SEXTON: What were the circumstances which, in the opinion of the Lord Chancellor, induced him to treat this case of assault lightly?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is not my duty to explain, but I believe it was found that the facts of the case were of a very trivial nature.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Was not Mr. White, of Glengaruff, removed from the Commission of the Peace when he assaulted a man in the same way, although it was only a case of debtor and creditor?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The fact that it was a case of debtor and creditor may have made the circumstances more important.

BOYCOTTING.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in reference to the prosecution of Patrick Keefe, William Kent, Thomas Kent, George Mulcahy, John Tuohy, Pat Walsh, John Donovan, and James Donovan, of Coolagowan, Cork, on a charge of boycotting, whether he is aware that a large number of prosecutions and imprisonments (including that of Father O'Dwyer and a number of respectable farmers in the locality) have already taken place in connection with charges arising out of the alleged taking of this same farm at Towermore; and whether it is open to Mr. Robert Browne, the present holder of this farm, to bring these prosecutions under the Criminal Law and Procedure Act; and, if so, why have the Local Constabulary Authorities gone to the expense and trouble of instituting this large number of prosecutions when it lay within the power of the private individual concerned to move in the matter?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that there were three previous prosecutions in connection with offences committed in consequence of the farm having been taken by a new tenant. The boycotting conspiracy in this case was so determined, and its results were so serious, as to affect in a most prejudicial manner the peace of the whole district, and was carried on so generally as to be even introduced into the Roman Catholic Chapel, where, for over two months, the most disgraceful scenes were enacted Sunday after Sunday. It is open to any person to prosecute for any offence committed against himself. But in prosecutions for criminal conspiracy, unlawful assembly, and all prosecutions where the general public peace is involved, the prosecutions are invariably instituted by the Crown.

MR. FLYNN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that more than 20 persons, including a Roman Catholic priest, have suffered terms of imprisonment for refusing to work with or deal with particular individuals?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must ask for notice of that question.

LAND COMMISSION—VALUERS' REPORTS.

MR. M. HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he will state what the present practice of the Irish Land Commission is as regards obtaining the Report of an official valuer on the hearing of fair rent appeals; whether such Report is now obtained by the Land Commission on their own Motion in all or in any, and, if so, in what cases, and at whose expense; and whether either of the litigant parties can, on application, cause such a Report to be procured on payment of any fee or without payment?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): The Land Commissioners report that in appeal cases where the appellant has stated that the appeal is brought merely with reference to the holding for the purposes of rent, the Land Commissioners, so far as is possible, direct valuations to be made by the Appeal Court valuers prior to the hearing of the appeal. The Commissioners obtain each valuation on their own motion, and in such cases and for such sittings as they consider most desirable. The valuations are obtained without expense to the parties. When obtained, the result is forthwith communicated to the appellant free of charge. Either party can obtain a detailed copy of the Valuer's Report for 1s. The valuer communicates the date of his intended inspection to both landlord and tenant. Both prior to, and at the hearing, if either party makes it manifest to the Commissioners that special circumstances exist which render a valuation desirable, the Commissioners, when it is possible to do so, order a valuation to be made.

MR. M. HEALY: Do I understand that there has been a violation of the Act in all cases where a valuer has been employed?

MR. MADDEN: No, Sir; where a question of value arises, the Commissioners have power to appoint a valuer. It is not absolutely imperative.

POSTAL ACCOMMODATION IN GALWAY BAY.

MR. FOLEY (Galway, Connemara): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that a population of over 4,000 people, inhabiting a group of islands at the mouth of Galway Bay, are altogether unprovided with postal accommodation, the group including the islands of Garamna, Littermullen, and Littermore, with other smaller islands; whether he is aware that among the inhabitants of these islands are two Roman Catholic Clergymen, two Poor Law Guardians, 11 National School Teachers, and a considerable number of shopkeepers and other residents, who feel it a great hardship in having no postal communication with the mainland; and, whether in view of the fact that the cost to the Government of a three day service, with which the people would be satisfied (including an office on one of the islands), would only be £12 16s. a year, while smaller communities in the immediate neighbourhood are provided with a daily post at more than quadruple the amount, he will consider the possibility of granting the request for this postal service?

*MR. RAIKES: In reply to the hon. Member, I am glad to be able to state that I have sanctioned the establishment of a post three days a week from Carraroe to Tiernee, an arrangement which I understand will be acceptable to the inhabitants of the islands referred to by the hon. Member.

CASE OF MR. H. D. FISHER, MUNSTER EXPRESS.

MR. RICHARD POWER (Waterford): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Mr. H. D. Fisher, of Waterford, has been imprisoned for the publication of reports of National League meetings in the Munster Express, although it was proved at the trial that he did not sign the certificate of registration as publisher, and no evidence was given that he was the editor or publisher of that newspaper?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that, notwithstanding the circumstance mentioned by the hon. Member, ample evidence was produced that Mr. Fisher was printer and publisher of the newspaper mentioned.

MR. SEXTON: Was there evidence forthcoming that Mr. Fisher signed the certificate? Will he indicate what the nature of the evidence was which fixed him with the responsibility?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No Sir; I cannot. If there is any doubt as to the legality of the conviction, it is possible for the person aggrieved to obtain a remedy.

MR. W. REDMOND: Was the charge against Mr. Fisher that he had published reports of branches of the Irish National League which had not been attempted to be suppressed by the right hon. Gentleman?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the hon. Gentleman requires details, I must ask him to put the question on the Paper, but I have no doubt that the reports were of a criminal nature.

THE BALLYMENA GUARDIANS.

MR. M'CARTAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the report in the Belfast News Letter of the 17th instant, of the proceedings at the last meeting of the Board of Guardians at Ballymena, County Antrim; and whether, considering the serious charges preferred against the master and other officials of the workhouse there, he will direct a sworn inquiry to be held for the purpose of investigating these charges?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Local Government Board inform me that they had this matter before them, and that, in accordance with their usual practice, they purpose in the first instance to forward to the master and matron a copy of the complaints made against them, and to require them to furnish an explanation in writing. The Board will then be in a position to determine whether a sworn inquiry should be held.

THE LAND PURCHASE ACTS.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the application for advances up to the end of March last, under the Land Purchase Acts of 1885 and 1888, amounted to £8,708,808; for what sum applications have been lodged between the end of March and 15th June; and, if the average of applications per month be maintained, at what date the funds at the disposal of the Land Commission would be exhausted?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners report that the applications under the Land Purchase Acts to the end of March last amounted to £8,708,808. The amount of advances applied for between the end of March and the 16th of June, inclusive, was £257,356. The total amount of advances applied for to the 16th of June, 1890, was £8,966,164, from which is to be deducted for applications refused £930,571. This leaves a balance of £1,964,407 available for future applications. Assuming that the amounts sanctioned will continue per month at the average of the past, which, however, must be mere conjecture, the funds in question at the disposal of the Land Commission would be exhausted in about 14 months.

THE ACCIDENT TO THE CITY OF ROME.

MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, with reference to the City of Rome having struck the Fastnet Rock on Sunday, 8th June, about 5 a.m., whether, although daylight, the lamp of the light-house was alight; and whether it was only after the vessel struck that the gun-cotton fog signalling apparatus on the rock was put into operation?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The Board of Trade have directed an inquiry to be held into the circumstances attending this casualty. Until the Report of the Court has been received I am unable to express any opinion in the matter.

CASE OF MR. M'ENERY.

MR. O'KEEFFE (Limerick City): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if, on the occasion of a professional visit by Mr. O'Meara, solicitor, to Mr. M'Enery in Tullamore Gaol last week, Mr. O'Meara was compelled to hold his interview in an open corridor, and in the presence of a warder; and whether, on return to his cell, Mr. M'Enery was subjected to a searching of his person?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Governor of the prison reports that the interview was held in the usual place and in the usual way. There was no departure from the usual practice, nor was any objection taken at the time.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): How is it that Mr. M'Enery is unable to have an interview with his professional adviser except in the presence of a warder, whereas, in another case, Mr. Shannon, for the Times, was able to see prisoners alone?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Speaking from recollection I do not think the hon. Gentleman has stated the facts correctly, but I have answered the question on the Paper.

MR. MAC NEILL: Perhaps the Home Secretary will say what the practice is in England.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That ought to be made the subject of a specific question.

THE POTATO BLIGHT.

SIR T. ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the potato blight has appeared in the South of Ireland; and, if so, whether the Government intend taking any action in connection with it?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have received no report on the subject, and I must ask the hon. Gentleman to put down the question for another day.

IRISH POST OFFICE OFFICIALS.

SIR T. ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he will dismiss any Post Office official or employé in Ireland who joins the Postmen's Union?

MR. RAIKES: No postman in England has been dismissed on the grounds suggested by the hon. Baronet, and I certainly shall not follow a different practice in Ireland from that prevailing in England.

THE LEASEHOLDERS (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the wide-spread demand among the leaseholders of Ireland in favour of the Leaseholders (Ireland) Bill, and of the postponement of the Land Purchase Bill, he will afford facilities for the passage of the Leaseholders (Ireland) Bill into law this Session?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; apart from other objections I think a conclusive objection is the present state of public business.

EDUCATIONAL INSPECTORS.

MR. HARRISON (Tipperary, Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether there is any rule of the Commissioners of National Education compelling District Inspectors, when examining for results, to mark the answers of the pupils secretly, so as to prevent either teacher or pupils from observing the marks recorded for each pupil in each specific subject; and whether, if there be no such rule, he is prepared to represent to the Commissioners of National Education the advisability of issuing general instructions to their Inspectors to have the marks recorded in the marking paper in presence of the teacher and pupils, as a guarantee of the good faith and impartiality of their marking?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Commissioners of National Education report that there is no such rule as that indicated in the question. The marks of the oral portion of the examination are recorded in the marking paper in the schoolroom as the examination proceeds, and, as a rule, in the presence of the teacher; those of the written part cannot be entered until the exercises of the pupils have been read. All the marks of the oral and written portions appear on the examination roll, which is sent to the school and retained there. The Commissioners do not deem further instructions to Inspectors on the point necessary.

DAMAGES AGAINST AN IRISH CONSTABLE.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the fact that in an action before Judge Gibson and a special jury, in Dublin on the 18th instant, Rev. M. B. Kennedy, C.C., Meelin, County Cork, obtained a verdict for £100 damages and costs against Sergeant Hyde, R.I.C., Meelin, for trespass, and assault on the reverend plaintiff; whether the Constabulary Authorities will take note of the conduct of this policeman as detailed in the trial; and have the Constabulary Authorities or the Government paid the expenses of this constable in whole or in part or do they intend so to do?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe that a new trial will be applied for. I cannot, therefore, enter into particulars in regard to the case.

MR. FLYNN: Will the Government pay the £100, and from what source will it be paid?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot reply until the whole case is settled.

CLARE INFIRMARY.

DR. KENNY (Cork, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that last year, when the two honourable Members for Clare (Mr. Cox and Mr. Jordan) attended at Ennis in response to a summons sent to them by the Registrar of the Clare Infirmary, of which institution they are Governors, to take part in the election of a physician to the infirmary, they were shadowed by the police during their entire stay in Ennis, and that during the entire time the election above mentioned was proceeding, a police guard was stationed in the immediate vicinity of the infirmary; and whether he can state by whose direction the police acted in the manner above described?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not had sufficient notice of the question, and must ask the hon. Member to defer it.

MR. C. P. REDMOND.

MR. P. J. POWER (Waterford, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Mr. C. P. Redmond, editor of the Waterford News, has been sentenced by Messrs. Considine and Irwin at Waterford on June 6th, to three months' imprisonment for publishing a resolution of the Kilgobnet Branch of the Irish National League; whether Mr. Redmond was sentenced to a further term of imprisonment for publishing in another issue of the Waterford News another resolution of the same branch; whether Mr. Redmond was convicted on a third charge, stated by the Court to be a graver offence than the other charges, to 14 days'.

imprisonment, and ordered at the expiration of that period to enter into security himself in the sum of £200, and two sureties of £100 each, to be of good behaviour, or in default to go to prison for four months; whether there is an appeal from the last sentence; whether the Magistrates refuse to impose a sentence which would give a right of appeal; whether the same course of refusing an appeal has not been adopted recently by the same Magistrates in the case of Mr. Fisher, editor of the Munster Express; and whether he is aware that every decision of Messrs. Considine and Irwin brought before Judge Waters has been reversed by him?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Mr. C. P. Redmond was sentenced, as stated in the question, to three months' imprisonment for using intimidation towards three persons by means of a published report of the proceedings of the Kilgobnet branch of the Irish National League, which appeared in the issue of his newspaper of April 5, 1890. He was also sentenced on the 7th of June to a like term of imprisonment for using intimidation towards three other persons by means of a similar publication in the issue of his newspaper of April 12, 1890. This sentence was ordered to run concurrently with the previous one, as the two publications were connected with the one matter. The order mentioned of 14 days' imprisonment and to find sureties was made on the same date for using intimidation towards Matthew Walsh by means of a published report of the proceedings of the Dunganran Branch of the Irish National League, which appeared in the issue of his newspaper of April 26, 1890. The case was a very bad one; I presume the character of the sentence was modified by the fact that on the same day the same man had been sentenced to imprisonment for three months. There is no appeal, nor does there appear to have been any doubt connected either with the law or the facts of the case which rendered an appeal necessary. I believe there has been a difference of opinion on more than one occasion between the County Court Judge in question and the Magistrates; but in every case where the difference came up for decision by the High Court, that Judge was proved to be wrong, and the Magistrates to be right. Matthew Walsh has for a long time been subjected to boycotting and intimidation, and the Magistrates stated the report was of a most intimidatory character, and the worst that had come before them; that if they had had cognisance of this offence before the previous cases they would have felt it their duty to impose a very severe sentence; but as they had already sentenced Mr. Redmond at the same sittings to imprisonment, and desired rather to restrain such conduct than to punish the defendant, they would not make a cumulative order, but exercise their preventive jurisdiction. There is no appeal from the last sentence, but if it was made without any sufficient evidence it can be reviewed by the Superior Courts. The Magistrates refused to alter the order on the ground, which was not disputed, that there was no legal point involved, and also on the ground that in a similar case the Queen's Bench Division had recently held on a case stated that there was ample evidence to justify the conviction. An appeal was refused in the case referred to for similar reasons as in Mr. Redmond's case.

MR. T. M. HEALY: May I ask the Chief Secretary whether, when the Criminal Law Amendment Bill (Ireland) was before the House, he did not distinctly promise that there should be an appeal in every case?

MR. W. REDMOND: May I also ask in regard to one of the Magistrates—Mr. Considine—if it is not the fact that he is completely without legal training of any kind? When under cross-examination as to his legal qualifications did he not admit, in the most candid manner, that his only qualification was that he had kept two dinner terms in the Inner Temple?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir. I am not aware that that is the fact. With regard to the allegation that I could have control over the judicial acts of the Magistrates, I beg to give it—and not for the first time—an emphatic contradiction.

MR. CLANCY: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the practice of giving short sentences by the Irish Magistrates in order to prevent appeal began immediately after a speech he made at Birmingham?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; I am not aware of it.

THE CLANRICARDE TENANTRY.

MR. SHEEHY (Galway, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Head Constable Judge and the police in Portumna have been going amongst the Clanricarde tenantry with a list of the tenants who they say paid their rents; who supplied this list to Head Constable Judge; and by whose orders this constable and the police under him are doing this duty of bailiff for Lord Clanricarde?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: A full Report has not yet reached me. I must ask the hon. Member to defer the question.

CASHEL.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland by what authority, and for what reason, groups of policemen hung about the entrance to the Town Hall of Cashel at the time appointed for the last meeting of the Municipal Commissioners, and took down the name of each Commissioner as he entered?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that it is not the case that there were groups of police as alleged. Only four men were on duty at the time; of these, two were on ordinary beat duty, and two who happened to be on patrol and who observed those who entered and left the Town Hall, but no note was taken as alleged.

FLASHING SIGNALS—ADMIRAL COLOMB'S INVENTION.

MR. BALLANTINE (Coventry): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether any decision has been arrived at by the Treasury with regard to the claim of Admiral Colomb for compensation in respect of his invention of flashing signals?

MR. JACKSON: I am sorry I am not able to answer the hon. Gentleman, who has been good enough at my request to postpone this question; but I hope in a few days to give him a definite answer.

THE CHIEF COMMISSIONER OF POLICE.

MR. W. LOWTHER (Westmoreland, Appleby): I beg to ask the Home Secretary whether anything has been decided with regard to the appointment of the new Chief Commissioner?

MR. O. V. MORGAN (Battersea): On this subject I wish to ask whether it is true, as stated in yesterday's Standard, that there is reason to believe that through the action of Lord Salisbury the differences between Mr. Matthews and the Chief Commissioner of Police will be adjusted, and in that event Mr. Monro's resignation will be withdrawn?

*MR. MATTHEWS: In answer to my hon. Friend, I have to say that Her Majesty has been graciously pleased to approve of the appointment of Sir Edward Bradford as Commissioner of Police, to the office just vacated by the resignation of Mr. Monro. I need say nothing to the House of the distinguished career and services of Sir E. Bradford.

MR. C. GRAHAM: Is Sir E. Bradford an old military officer or not?

MR. O. V. MORGAN: Was Sir E. Bradford the gentleman who has been a distinguished Resident and Representative in Jeypore?

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): Can the right hon. Gentleman state what experience Sir E. Bradford has had with regard to the control of civil bodies responsible for order?

*MR. MATTHEWS: Sir E. Bradford has had a wide and varied experience in many offices of the Public Service. At the present moment he is employed in the India Office. He was for some years Governor General's Agent for Rajpootana. In that capacity he conducted the whole military and civil service of the district, and rendered most valuable services to his country. He has also been for many years an officer in the Madras army.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): Has he ever been in charge of any police force such as we have in the Metropolis?

*MR. MATTHEWS: I am not quite sure what the hon. Member means.

MR. C. GRAHAM: Among Europeans.

*MR. MATTHEWS: He has commanded the police, as I have stated.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I wish to ask whether the services of this gentleman have always been employed in Asiatic countries, and not among people of English race.

*MR. MATTHEWS: No, Sir; he has been employed in this country in connection with the India Office since 1887.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: Has he in the India Office been connected with bodies which can at all be considered to have such functions to perform as the police of the Metropolis have?

*MR. MATTHEWS: I believe Sir E. Bradford to be, both by character and experience, thoroughly qualified.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

THE NEW STANDING ORDER.

MR. WHITBREAD (Bedford): I beg to give notice that when the Leader of the House moves the proposed Standing Order [Mr. W. H. SMITH here rose, but Mr. WHITBREAD declined to give way] for carrying over Bills from one Session to another, it is my intention to move as an Amendment—

“That the Motion for a Standing Order involving so great a change in the usages of Parliament and the Constitution ought not to be considered until the House, agreeably to former practice, has had the advantage of the previous consideration of the subject by a Committee of this House.”

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I was anxious to save the hon. Gentleman the trouble of giving notice of his Amendment. I have considered the suggestion which was made in the notice of the Amendment given by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian during the past week, and the many suggestions which have reached me from hon. Friends in different parts of the House, and it was my intention to give notice of the following Resolution:—

“That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire whether, by means of an abridged form of procedure, or otherwise, the consideration of Bills partly considered in this House could be facilitated in the ensuing Session of the same Parliament.”

I propose to move this Resolution on Monday next, in the hope and belief that it will be accepted by the House in the spirit in which it is offered, as a step towards the consideration of a question which is of great importance to the House itself, and that the Debate will be postponed until we receive the Report of the Committee. I trust that I shall have the support of the right hon. Gentleman opposite.

MR. LONG AND THE BREWING INTEREST.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): With your permission, Sir, I beg to ask the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Local Government Board a question of which I have given him private notice; and as the matter is one that is personal both to him and to myself, I trust the House will allow me very briefly to recall the circumstances. On Tuesday night last I named the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Local Government Board as one whose vote I asked should be disallowed because he was pecuniarily interested in the matter affected by the Bill. I was not allowed to make the Motion, and the hon. Member rose and, as I understood him, stated to the House that his only connection with the matter was that he had lent his brother money, and that he was not a shareholder in a brewery. I say that is what I understood him to say. A great many other hon. Members on this side of the House also understood the same, and I am bound to say, having examined a very large number of the principal newspapers of the country, I find that, almost without exception, that was the idea conveyed to them. For instance, the Times—if that can be called a principal newspaper—says: “Mr. Long and Sir M. Hicks Beach have denied that they were interested in any brewery.”

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Member, but I am bound to say that what occurred took place in Committee, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Committees is the sole judge of it. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman intends to make any Motion, but if he does I think it ought to be in Committee, provided that fresh circumstances have occurred that would justify the reopening of the question. If the hon. Member is going to ask a question he would be in order.

MR. STOREY: That is what I am going to do—to ask a question. I am bound to say that since the hon. Gentleman made his statement in Committee he has sent a letter to the Times, in which he states that he did inform the Committee that he was a shareholder in a brewery company. I, for one, accept that statement. My questions to the hon. Gentleman are these: (1.) Was he not one of the founders of the Bath Brewery Company? (2.) Does not his name appear on the Memorandum of Association? (3.) Was he not, and is he not now, one of the directors and chairman of the company, receiving the usual fees? (4.) Has he not all along been, and is he not now, an ordinary shareholder, entitled to his proportion of the profits of the company, and has not the said Brewery Company in its possession no less than 90 tied houses, which are affected by this Bill?

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. Long, Wilts, Devizes): I desire, in the first place, to thank the hon. Member for Sunderland for the very full and sufficient notice he was good enough to give me of his intention to bring forward this subject. I desire also to thank him for having given me this opportunity of making a short, and I hope a satisfactory, explanation to the House. I make no complaint of the fact that the hon. Gentleman did not carry away from the Committee that impression of my remarks which I intended to convey. I desire to apologise to the House for not expressing myself on that occasion so clearly and fully as I ought to have done. I hope the House will allow me to say in excuse for this omission on my part that I was completely taken aback at the moment. I had no notice that such a question was to be referred to, and was not in the House when the hon. Member for Cirencester made his speech. I did at the time feel somewhat acutely what appeared to be an imputation implying dishonourable motives in connection with my Parliamentary action. With reference to the question, Was I not one of the founders of the Bath Brewery Company? I am not quite sure what a "founder" is. I had no interest in this company until I was asked by local gentlemen personally known to me if I would accept that position in the company, and I said I would if all things were satisfactorily and properly conducted. Secondly, I believe my name does appear as one of the first shareholders. I should like to be allowed to add that my interest in this concern amounts to £1,000, and that I am chairman, and receive my fees as such. I believe the statement as to the tied houses to be correct. I feel I owe an explanation to the House as to why it was that when the question was raised I did not enter upon this point. The fact is, as I have already said, that I was somewhat taken aback, and, in the second place, my attention was directed solely to the point raised by the hon. Member. I admit that it ought not to have been so, but for the moment it did not occur to me that my position as the Chairman or a Director of the Company was a matter which I ought to have mentioned to the Committee. I did mention the fact that I was a shareholder. I should like to be allowed to add that after I sat down it occurred to me that I had not sufficiently taken the Committee into my confidence. I went into the Lobby and consulted one or two hon. Gentlemen as to whether I ought to add a further statement to what I had said. Hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House assured me that my statement was sufficiently complete, and, following their advice, I did not make any further statement. I hope the House will believe what I most sincerely assure them, that I had no intention whatever of concealing my connection with this Brewery Company or in any way minimising my position with regard to it. My desire was to state fully what my position was, and I very much regret I omitted to state I was Chairman of that Company. I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving me this opportunity of correcting what I said.

MR. STOREY: Perhaps the House will allow me to say I accept the statement made by the hon. Gentleman with willingness, fully believing that he acted from pure inadvertence. But, of course, in saying that, I still retain my own conviction that it is not desirable that this Bill should be pushed forward by the votes of Members interested in the trade.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): Is it intended to go on with the Local Taxation Bill on Monday, or will it be dropped?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I hope it will come on on Monday after the Motion I shall make at an early hour in the evening.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, S.): Will the right hon. Gentleman take care that the Lord Advocate shall be in his place on Monday when the Bill comes on?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I regret the hon. Gentleman should have thought it necessary to ask that question. The House is well aware that the Lord Advocate is most constant in his attendance in the House, and most assiduous in the discharge of his public duties.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I desire to call attention to Mr. T. W. Russell's letter on the licensing question in Ireland, which appears in the Times of to-day, and to ask the Government when the Amendments extending the Licensing Clauses to Ireland will be laid on the Table?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the hon. and learned Gentleman's memory has somewhat failed him in this matter. In the course of the animated discussion which took place some time back on this question, I stated not once, but many times, that the Government would not be responsible for putting Amendments of the kind suggested on the Paper; but that if hon. Members put Amendments on the Paper the Government would consider them.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Drafting Amendments to a Bill is a work of almost inconceivable trouble. Are hon. Members to take all that trouble, and is the only return to be that the Government will consider them?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The labour of drafting Amendments may be considerable, but it seems to have been got over somewhat successfully in regard to this Bill. I prefer the Bill in its present shape, and do not think we should gain by introducing the innumerable questions which would be raised by the Amendments suggested. I think the whole thing should stand over until Local Government has been established in Ireland.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when that will be?

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): When will the Scotch Police Bill be introduced?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I hope the Scotch Superannuation Bill will be printed and circulated to-morrow.

ON-LICENCES.

Return ordered—

"Of (1) the number of On-Licences in each licensing district where the tenant and owner on the register are different persons; and (2) the number of persons in each district, and the names of such persons, who are on the register as owners of two, three, four, and any greater number of premises in respect of which On-Licences have been granted, with the number of such licences attached to each name."

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS III.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £37,586, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1891, for the Salaries of the Commissioner and Assistant Commissioners of the Metropolitan Police, and of the Receiver for the Metropolitan Police District, the Pay and Expenses of Officers of Metropolitan Police employed on special duties, and the Salaries and Expenses of the Inspectors of Constabulary."

(5.0.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I do not think that, during the 60 years which have elapsed since the Metropolitan Police Force was established, the House of Commons has ever come to the consideration of this Vote in circumstances more grave, and, I may say, more dangerous. Nobody can deny that the condition of things in reference to the Metropolitan Police at this moment is most profoundly unsatisfactory. We had occasion more than a year ago to discuss this matter, when, unfortunately, differences of opinion had arisen between the Secretary of State and the then Chief Commissioner of Police, Sir C. Warren, which led to Sir Charles Warren's retirement. The Home Secretary has now parted with a second Chief Commissioner of Police, Mr. Monro, and an open breach, which, in my opinion, is most mischievous and dangerous to the discipline of the Metropolitan Police, has taken place between the authorities at the Home Office and the authorities at Scotland Yard. This is not a matter to be considered in a Party spirit, or from a Party point of view. I think I have some claim to say that, because in the difficulties that arose between the Home Secretary and Sir C. Warren I did my best, not to support the Government or the right hon. Gentleman, but to support the authority of the office that he held. I am sorry to say that with precisely the same object and with every desire to support the Secretary of State, and the authority and dignity of his office, I have come to a totally different conclusion, and I also regret to have to state that what I have to say must be in entire condemnation of the course which the right hon. Gentleman has taken on this occasion. On the previous occasion—and I recall the fact with pleasure—I had the gratification of being thanked by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury for the course I then took. I do not know whether he will thank me now, but I intend now to act on precisely the same principle that I acted upon then. It is natural for anyone who has discharged the duties of the responsible office of Home Secretary to have a certain sympathy with those who hold that office, and to desire to maintain the authority and the traditions of that office; and certainly it always has been and always shall be my wish to do so. But I cannot help asking how the Secretary of State has acted in this matter. If I condemn the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman, it is because, in my opinion, he has strained the authority of his office and has lowered its credit by the course which he has pursued. The situation which arose a year and a half ago in connection with the case of Sir Charles Warren filled me with surprise as we had had no former experience of such a state of things existing between the Home Office and Scotland Yard. During the time of my predecessors in office, Sir R. Cross, Mr. Gathorne-Hardy, and Sir G. Grey, there was complete confidence between the two Departments, and there was a complete absence of conflict and of friction between the Secretary of State and those who, as his subordinates and his assistants, were at the head of the police; and therefore I view the new spectacle of conflict and friction between the Home Office and Scotland Yard with surprise and regret. For my own part, I had the advantage of acting at the Home Office with the most eminent public servants who were at the head of the Metropolitan Police. I have always borne testimony and I always shall bear it to the signal qualities which were possessed by Sir Edmund Henderson, whose judgment and good sense were beyond all praise, and I have always regarded what I may call the accidental misfortune which led to his retirement from his office as a grievous loss both to the public and to the police. I had also the advantage of acting with the late Colonel Pearson, whose death all who knew him will regret. I was also very sorry when the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield left the Police Force, not because of any difference which had arisen between himself and the Home Office, but because he was seeking another and a larger career. I am sure that the hon. and learned Member will bear testimony to the fact that in his days the relations between the Home Office and Scotland Yard were of the most friendly description. There was in those days no question as to the supremacy of the Secretary of State—he undoubtedly was supreme, and he must be supreme, because he is responsible to this House; and in the future, as in the past, the head of the police must be responsible to somebody, either to the Secretary of State or to the County Council. But in those days no question arose about the supreme authority of the Secretary of State. There was no occasion for it to arise; that authority was never questioned; it was never disputed; it was never, I hope, asserted offensively or tyrannically. The Secretary of State and the Chief Commissioner of Police were upon the footing with regard to each other of confidential colleagues, who were acting together in discharging a very responsible public duty. In my opinion, the first principle of good administration is that the chief of any Department should seek to acquire and to command the sympathies and the goodwill of the men with whom and through whom he has to work. In the present case what do we see? There is a constant conflict between the Secretary of State and the Chief Commissioner of Police, and certainly there are indications of a great deal more conflict than has actually come to our knowledge. There have been retirements of one Chief Commissioner of Police after another, and beyond that there is a discontented and dissatisfied Police Force as the result of the administration of the right hon. Gentleman at the Home Office during the past four years. In my opinion, it is impossible that such a state of things should be allowed to go on. The retirement of Sir Charles Warren, necessary as it was, was to my mind a great blow to the discipline of the Police Force. The spectacle of the Home Secretary divided from the Chief Commissioner of Police was one which the Police Force had never seen before, and it had a most injurious effect upon that force. But the resignation of Mr. Monro, and the circumstances by which it was accompanied, are of a much more serious nature, because it is no secret that at this moment the Police Force have rallied round the Chief Commissioner and against the Home Secretary. That is a very grave situation, and one of which we have had no previous experience. In my opinion, that is not a safe state of things for the Metropolis, and it is one which constitutes an extremely evil condition of things for the police. What has brought about this extraordinary and deplorable result? We do not know. We have had a statement from the Secretary of State. The right hon. Gentleman the other day read a letter from Mr. Monro, and made a statement with reference to it which Mr. Monro has declared to be an incomplete and ex parte statement. I have asked over and over again for further Papers on the subject, but they are not forthcoming. This is the statement of Mr. Monro in a letter of his which has been published—

"My views as to police administration, unfortunately, differ in many important respects from those held by the Secretary of State, and I have received clear indications that the duties of the successor of Colonel Pearson are to be intrusted to a gentleman who, however estimable personally, has no police, military, or legal training."

We, therefore, know that the Secretary of State was at issue with the Chief Commissioner of Police in many important respects on matters of police administration. This is a very unfortunate state of things. The two particulars which have been given, in reference to which there has been a difference of opinion between the Home Secretary and the Chief Commissioner, are, first, the appointment of Colonel Pearson's successor; and, secondly, the question of police superannuation. In Mr. Ruggles-Brise, whose name has been imported into this discussion, I take a very strong personal interest. I had the pleasure, and I consider it an honour, to have introduced Mr. Ruggles-Brise into the Public Service. He was the son of a respected Member who formerly sat on the other side of the House, but that was a fact that I did not take into consideration when I appointed him, because I think that, in making appointments in the Public Service, we ought not to be influenced by political considerations. Mr. Ruggles-Brise entered the Public Service with the highest character to recommend him—he had distinguished himself at the University, and he more than fulfilled the expectations that had been formed with regard to him, and in a remarkably short space of time he reached a very distinguished position, and he has filled the office of private secretary, not only to myself, but to all my successors. Certainly there is no man more deserving of public preferment than Mr. Ruggles-Brise. But, in appointing a successor to Colonel Pearson, one of the first conditions was that the appointment should be made with the cordial co-operation and sympathy of the gentleman who was to be the chief and the colleague of the person appointed. I wish to illustrate my meaning by referring to the case of Mr. Monro. I also had the high honour of introducing Mr. Monro into the Police Force when the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield retired. Mr. Monro was recommended to me. I did not know him personally. I suggested his name to Sir Edmund Henderson; and I confess that Sir Edmund had at the time some doubts whether Mr. Monro's Indian experience was sufficient to render his appointment desirable. However, upon consideration, Colonel Henderson said, "If your judgment is so, I shall be delighted to receive Mr. Monro and to have experience of his services." A fortnight afterwards Colonel Henderson called upon me, and he said, "I have to come to thank you for having placed in Scotland Yard one of the best and ablest men we have ever had there." In my opinion, there ought to be between the Secretary of State and the Chief Commissioner that sort of good feeling which leads to cordial concurrence in the making of appointments of that description. What does Mr. Monro say? He says that the duties of the successor to Colonel Pearson are to be intrusted to a gentleman who, however estimable, he does not think fit for the place. The right hon. Gentleman left Mr. Monro to retire under the conviction that he was to have as a colleague a gentleman he objected to, and that the Secretary of State was refusing to appoint a gentleman who had his entire confidence, and who he thought ought to be appointed. While accepting the resignation of Mr. Monro, tendered under that belief, the right hon. Gentleman said that all the time he was intending to appoint the gentleman named by Mr. Monro. I call that bad administration. If Mr. Monro was a valuable public servant, why was he to be allowed to resign under a misapprehension of this character? What led Mr. Monro to believe that Mr. Ruggles-Brise was to be appointed and that Mr. Howard was not to be appointed? Why was Mr. Monro not told that Mr. Howard was to be appointed until after his own resignation had been accepted? With reference to this office, of course the Minister who is responsible must be the best judge of an appointment; but still it is a grave responsibility for a Secretary of State to refuse to listen to the advice of the Chief Commissioner when he recommends that an office shall be given, by way of promotion, to a gentleman who is already in the force. I do not say that the force have any right to claim promotion; I do not say that there is any limit upon the discretion or upon the responsibility of the Secretary of State; but when it is placed before him that it may lead to discontent in the force if promotion is not given to one already in the force, it is a heavy responsibility he incurs in refusing the advice of the Chief Commissioner, or leading him to believe it is refused. What do the police think—what can they think—when they find Mr. Monro resigning and see it stated that he has resigned because a promotion was not made from the force, and the next day they see that, under the stress of his resignation, the appointment he desired to make has been made? In these circumstances, what becomes of the authority of the Secretary of State? How can it be sustained and respected? In my opinion, the whole proceeding, so far as we are permitted to know anything about it, was a most injudicious proceeding. The popular impression is that the Home Secretary did not intend to appoint Mr. Howard, or he did not let Mr. Monro know he intended to appoint him until he had allowed Mr. Monro to resign under the belief that Mr. Howard was not to be appointed. If that is not so, no doubt the facts as we know them will be altered by the right hon. Gentleman's statement. If he did not agree to the appointment of Mr. Howard before the resignation of Mr. Monro, and if he agreed to the appointment after the resignation, I say that is bad administration; and I cannot conceive that anything could be more injurious to the discipline of the police, seeing that the right hon. Gentleman is made by Act of Parliament the highest authority over the police. So much for the personal matter with reference to the appointment of a successor to Colonel Pearson. I now come to the greater matter of superannuation; and here, again, we do not know all that has happened with reference to the Superannuation Bill. We have the statement that the Chief Commissioner had come to arm's-length with the Secretary of State on the subject of superannuation: and a more unfortunate condition of things, with reference to administration, it is impossible to conceive. The other day the First Lord of the Treasury said that the Superannuation Bill of the Government was founded upon the lines of those Bills which were introduced by myself and my right hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, as well as by a Gentleman whose absence from this House we all regret; I mean Mr. Hibbert. We introduced those Bills with the friendly concurrence and support of the Chief Commissioner of Police; the provisions of those Bills were received with contentment and satisfaction by the Police Force, and the terms and conditions were fair and reasonable at that time; but whether you can have those terms again I greatly doubt. The mis-management and misconduct of the right hon. Gentleman, in my opinion, have made it very difficult, if not impossible, to recur to those terms. What has he done? He has allowed the Chief Commissioner of Police to resign upon a Superannuation Bill, and to gather the Police Force around him as their champion. Here is the Secretary of State at issue with the man who, up to five minutes ago, has been acting as Chief Commissioner of Police, and at issue upon this very question. That is the position into which the administration of the right hon. Gentleman has brought us. That being so, if you cannot now settle the matter upon the terms of former Superannuation Bills, the consequence must be that the ratepayers will have to pay a heavy price for your mis-management. Whatever rule you are going to apply to the Metropolitan Police you must apply to the police all over the country; they demand, and they have a right to demand, that they shall be dealt with on the same terms. Therefore, if you are obliged to alter those terms, you will have to alter your unfortunate Local Taxation Bill, because you will have to deal with the question of superannuation upon a different footing. What, then, is the situation in which we are placed? When the Metropolitan Police was instituted it was placed under the immediate authority of the Secretary of State. What authority has the Secretary of State had over the London Police during the last fortnight? Absolutely none. It has not been to him they have looked as the head of it; it has not been to him they have looked for instructions; they have looked to a different quarter. The position of the Metropolis is different from that of all other Municipalities. In all other Municipalities the police is under the control of a popular body, which has behind it the force of the public opinion of the community it represents. For reasons which were thought good at the time, and which I myself have thought good since, a different rule has been established in the Metropolis, and the police are put under the Executive Government and under the authority of the Secretary of State. He does not carry with him that authority which belongs to the Watch Committee of a Town Council. His authority must depend entirely upon the exercise of judgment and discretion. When that authority is subverted, what is your position? You have nothing to replace it. In the Metropolis you have something like a Prætorian guard, subject to no Local Authority, electing its own Emperor, and doing what it pleases. That is a situation which our Constitution does not recognise. You must choose between two things—you must either have ministerial responsibility to this House, or you must have a Municipality having authority over its own police. I am bound to say, holding the opinions I have held and being aware of the risks which might befall the popular administration of the police in the Metropolis, I think the evils existing at this moment in the Police Force in relation to the Secretary of State are greater than any risk which could arise under municipal control. In my opinion, the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman has inflicted a fatal and incurable blow upon the authority of the Secretary of State over the Metropolitan Police. I doubt whether it is possible to retrieve the position after what has gone on in London, with the police despising the Secretary of State, and holding meetings under the auspices of the Chief Commissioner, and with the Secretary of State and the Chief Commissioner at arm's length. If the Secretary of State could not agree with Mr. Monro, why was not his successor appointed at once, so that the Secretary of State might have had the co-operation of a Chief Commissioner with whom he was in accord, and the authority of his office might have been maintained? I can only conjecture it took some time to find anybody with courage to assume the office under the circumstances. I do not blame Mr. Monro; I do not blame the police; I blame the Secretary of State for a condition of things absolutely inconsistent with the discipline of the force. Just consider what was happening the other day. We begin with the Chief Inspectors and Superintendents holding meetings to discuss and condemn the legislative policy of the Secretary of State.

VOL. CCCXLV.

[THIRD SERIES.]

Is that a thing which, in the midst of a population of 5,000,000, can be permitted? Let me give a parallel. Suppose that under the auspices of the Commander-in-Chief the Army at Aldershot were collected to discuss the Estimates and to condemn the conduct of the Secretary of State for War. That is just parallel to what has been happening in London during the last fortnight, and the Secretary of State sits down calmly under it. One of two things ought to have happened. Either Mr. Monro was wrong, and should have been removed from authority by the Secretary of State, or, as I am much inclined to think, Mr. Monro was in the right, and the Secretary of State should have removed himself. To go on in this state of things is to exhibit to the police an example of indiscipline, between the Chief Commissioner and his chief, which is certain to demoralise and have a most injurious effect upon the police. What authority can the Secretary of State be expected to exercise? The whole Force have no regard for him at all, but look to the Chief Commissioner as the man to settle their grievances, to direct their policy, and positively to appoint the Assistant Commissioner. That is the position they have taken up. They took up that position in reference to the appointment of Mr. Howard, and, to their view, the Secretary of State has succumbed. They have taken up that position in reference to pay and pensions, and what will be the issue of that it would be a bold man who would predict. That is the position into which the Metropolitan Police have been brought by the administration of the right hon. Gentleman. As to the successor of Mr. Monro, paragraphs have appeared in the papers saying that Mr. Monro is to return. I never believed in that report, much as I should desire it to be true. How could Mr. Monro return—excellent Chief Commissioner as he is? Why, Sir, if he had come back, he must have come back as the master of the Secretary of State. Why has the Secretary of State put himself in a position in which so valuable an officer cannot return? I have known Mr. Monro, and I am sure there could not be the smallest difficulty in two persons of whom he was one coming to such an understanding as should exist between such officials. Mr. Monro cannot return.

Sir W. Harcourt

I would ask the right hon. Gentleman: Have the Government considered what may be the consequences of Mr. Monro's not returning? Have they considered the position in which Mr. Monro stands at this moment in reference to the Metropolitan Police? I do not want to aggravate the difficulty of the position, but, in my opinion, it is so grave that I cannot pass over it. I will say nothing with reference to the distinguished gentleman who has accepted the position of Chief Commissioner of Police. I know how difficult such a position must be for anyone coming fresh to it with things in their present condition. But, with reference to Mr. Monro, I think that one of the great merits and advantages of his position was that he was a civilian. I do not lay that down as an absolute rule. I have known distinguished men in the control of the Police Force who were military men; but depend upon it, in the control of a Police Force, let it be a large force or a small one, the only chance of success for a military man is to divest himself of the military spirit as Sir E. Henderson so admirably did. If you attempt to introduce a military administration it will be a great disaster. I hope the distinguished officer who has been newly appointed will enter upon the position with a sense of that fact. I should not be doing my duty if I did not express my opinion that the introduction of a military spirit into the discipline of the Metropolitan Police is one of the worst things that can happen to that force, or to the population committed to their charge. I have said that I regard the existing system as only a temporary system. I have arrived with regret at the conclusion that what has happened during the last four years has so shaken and undermined the authority of the Secretary of State that it will be impossible permanently to retain the authority over the police in the present hands. I believe the record of the right hon. Gentleman's administration will be that it has put an end to the present system. We have to think of the present and the immediate future. No change in the existing system can now be made, but it is impossible that in the present hands the system can go on. I do not believe that the right hon. Gentleman, in the present state of the feeling of the police—in presence of the fact that he has caused and maintained the resignation of Mr. Monro—can with advantage restore the police to that condition of discipline which is absolutely essential to the well-being of the Metropolis; and, therefore, in speaking of the right hon. Gentleman's position, and the course which he has taken, I regard in him the great obstacle to the restoration of a sound and proper feeling on the part of the police of London. I regret to have to make this statement, but nobody can doubt that the position of the police is getting worse from day to day. Yesterday it was a question of the Superintendents and their ultimatum; to-day, I see by the newspapers, it is a question of the Force itself, who desire to go further, and in a different direction to the ultimatum of the Superintendents. What is the situation of the Police Force on the dismissal of the justly-popular Chief Commissioner? They are, and have been, gathering under the auspices of that Chief Commissioner to remonstrate with, and to discuss and practically to destroy the authority of, the Secretary of State. That is a condition not creditable, not safe, and absolutely un-Constitutional. This is a state of things which ought not to be allowed to continue. It is a state of things which has never existed before, and I think the Government will make a great mistake if they do not recognise the fact that the police must be dealt with in a different manner and in different hands.

*(5.40.) THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I have, of course, no complaint to make, Sir, of the attack made by the right hon. Gentleman as far as it applies to me personally. But I should have been better pleased if he had based that attack upon a statement of facts somewhat more definite, in order that I could more readily grapple with it. The right hon. Gentleman has made me personally responsible for everything that has happened untowardly, and very much to my regret, for some weeks past; and he has done it without making that statement of fact which would justify him in bringing such charges, against even a political opponent, in a matter which, as the right hon. Gentleman himself justly observed, is not a Party matter. Most assuredly I cannot take to myself the blame of the slightest difference with Mr. Monro which is due to my own conduct. I have had, and have now, every feeling of sympathy for Mr. Monro. I selected him to be Chief Commissioner, knowing him to be a fit and able man for the post, and in many particulars he has discharged the duties of the office highly to my satisfaction. I deny in the most absolute way that there has been any personal difference between Mr. Monro and myself as to the discharge of his duties, which has led to his resignation. Nobody more regretted or was more surprised at that resignation than I was. The right hon. Gentleman has inquired into the causes of that resignation, and there, I think, he was not quite fair, because he put in the front rank the question about the appointment of an Assistant Commissioner. I say again—and I have good reason for the statement—that that question had nothing to do with Mr. Monro's resignation. If Mr. Ruggles-Brise had been appointed, Mr. Monro would not have thought it necessary to resign, and I have stated to the House, as I also stated to Mr. Monro, that I would not have accepted that as the ground of his ultimatum. As I said when the resignation was tendered to me, I had formed no decision on the question of whom I should appoint, and I had expressed no decision to Mr. Monro. I did in this matter what the right hon. Gentleman said every Secretary of State ought to do in distributing patronage in the police. The appointment, of course, is mine, and I am responsible for it; but I desired, above all things, to make no appointment against the opinion and feeling of the Chief Commissioner, and accordingly I took the opportunity, Mr. Monro having submitted to me a recommendation, of opening the subject. I need have no delicacy in mentioning names now, as they have already been made so public. Mr. Monro recommended Mr. Howard. I had, of course, numerous other applicants for the post, and, among others, was Mr. Ruggles-Brise. I am happy to join most emphatically in the praise which the right hon. Gentleman has awarded to Mr. Ruggles-Brise, but the right hon. Gentleman was incorrect in one particular. It was not due to the right hon. Gentleman that Mr. Ruggles-Brise entered the Public Service. He obtained a distinguished place in it by competitive examination, and he came with a first-class from Oxford.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I appointed him to the Home Office.

*MR. MATTHEWS: No; he came in by competitive examination. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that I am right. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman appointed him as his private secretary, but he entered the Civil Service by competitive examination, having shown his ability by taking a first-class at Oxford. In my experience of him—now lasting four years—I found that his ability, character, and capacity for business were such that I considered him a perfectly fit candidate for the position of Assistant Commissioner. He has served not only as private secretary to myself, but also to the right hon. Gentleman (Sir W. Harcourt), the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Childers), and Viscount Cross when he was at the Home Office. He has, therefore, for five years had—it is true, not an experience of the actual administration of the Police Force—but has had knowledge of all the principles of policy which have guided successive Secretaries of State in dealing with the Police Force; and that, in my judgment, eminently fitted him for the office of Assistant Commissioner. I discussed the merits of the candidates frankly and confidentially with Mr. Monro. I desired to hold that kind of confidential communication which I agree with the right hon. Gentleman ought to take place between the Minister in whom the patronage is vested and the chief of the Department in which that patronage is to take place. It was in order to ascertain the feelings of Mr. Monro on the subject that I had this conversation with him. This conversation took place on June 9, and the interview closed without my having formed or expressed any determination as to the person whom I should appoint as Assistant Commissioner. The right hon. Gentleman has found fault with me for appointing Mr. Howard. My reasons are these, and I will be perfectly frank with the House: I felt the moment Mr. Monro's resignation was in my hands on June 10 that the want of experience in Mr. Ruggles-Brise, which, under Mr. Monro's own guidance, would have been of comparatively small importance, now assumed, on the contrary, the gravest importance. While the scale might have been very evenly balanced between the two candidates up to that time, yet, after Mr. Monro's resignation, the claims of the candidate who had had daily experience of the police decidedly preponderated. That is the whole story of this matter of patronage. I regret that it was ever introduced at all to public notice. It must be disagreeable to both the gentlemen whose names have been mentioned. I think I am entitled to say, from communication I have had with him, that it was not, and could not have been, the cause of the resignation of Mr. Monro even if Mr. Ruggles-Brise had been appointed, and it certainly ought not to be suggested as the cause of my appointing Mr. Howard that Mr. Monro resigned because I at first proposed to appoint Mr. Ruggles-Brise. Now, I cannot disguise from the House the fact that this question of police superannuation is one of extraordinary gravity. The right hon. Gentleman has charitably said that the ratepayers will have to thank me for increased burdens. I can only say that for more than 12 months my best attention and endeavours have been given to devising some means of diminishing the burden, already too heavy, which weighs on the Metropolitan ratepayers in that respect. The rapid growth of the deficiency in the superannuation income has been the cause of grave anxiety to me for nearly two years. In 1870 this deficiency was £63,000, whereas in 1889-90 it was close upon £150,000. So heavily did the subject weigh upon my mind that, in the Autumn of 1889, I appointed a Departmental Committee for the purpose of considering the whole question of the superannuation of the Metropolitan Police and what changes in the system could best be effected so as to diminish the burden upon the ratepayers. That Committee was constituted in a way which must command the confidence of the House. The Commissioner and Receiver of the Metropolitan Police were upon it, as were also the Under Secretary for the Home Department, Sir Arthur Haliburton, Assistant Under Secretary at the War Office, and Mr. Mowatt of the Treasury. What I had in my own mind was to bring about, as far as possible, a reduction of the charge of superannuation. Before that Committee there was disclosed a fact unknown before, namely, that in the Metropolitan Police Force itself, which had always been considered to be favoured beyond every other force in the country with regard to superannuation, there was discontent—I will not put it higher than that—with the terms of superannuation allowed. When the Committee began to deliberate on the details of the superannuation scheme generally the attitude of the Commissioner was this: He alleged that a promise had been made by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir W. Harcourt) that the pensions of the Metropolitan Police should be improved, and that a similar promise was to be gathered from Bills presented to the House by successive Liberal Governments. Accordingly, he stated to his fellow-Committeemen that he regarded it as a vital principle underlying the whole matter, that a promise had been made to improve the pensions, and he declined even to discuss any detail in connection with the system that was inconsistent with that promise. The alleged promise of the right hon. Gentleman was contained in a speech delivered at a dinner or a luncheon or some festive occasion in favour of the Police Orphanage. I must say I do not gather from that language any promise, nor do I think that any promise can be fairly inferred from the Bills, but Mr. Monro held a different opinion, and this shows that the idea of his resignation was not hastily adopted. When the Commissioner expressed these views I suspended the deliberations of the Departmental Committee, for obviously a Report without the concurrence of the Commissioner would have been satisfactory neither to me nor to any one else. I then turned my mind to the framing of a Bill upon just principles which might meet the exigencies of the case, and I took for my guide the Bill which the two right hon. Gentlemen opposite introduced, but failed to carry. My desire in framing the Bill was most certainly to act as liberally to the police as my financial conscience would allow me. I had not the slightest intention or desire not to treat the police in the future, as I believe they have been treated in the past, with the utmost consideration and fairness, and although I could not share the view enunciated by the Commissioner that any promise had been made to the police by the right hon. Gentleman, or by anybody in this House, yet I could not shut my eyes to the fact that the introduction of Bills by successive Governments was a fact upon which just expectations might be founded. It went no further than that. I took these Bills as the basis of the scheme I have endeavoured to frame, and I feel sure that in my drafts I have not given less than was given in them. Indeed, I rather think that, on the whole, the terms I have given are somewhat more advantageous than those of the previous Bills. It was in the discussion of my draft that a cloud arose in a summer sky. I sent the Bill to the Commissioner for his perusal and opinion—a course which I do not think derogatory to the dignity of the Secretary of State, or more than was due to the Commissioner himself. Well, the Commissioner commented with considerable severity on that draft. I spent several hours with him in discussing the question, and I made alterations to meet certain of his views. Many of the points he raised were sound, and I adopted a vast majority of his suggestions. But the point upon which the Commissioner insisted, and without which he stated that, in his view, no Bill would be acceptable to, or would be accepted by, the police, was a pension of not less than two-thirds of the pay for 25 years' service, without condition either of age or medical certificate, and without liability to deduction in the event of service in another police force or in employment of the State. That the Commissioner considered a sine quâ non. Now, I believe, and I shall be prepared to argue it when the proper time comes, that with regard to the amount insisted upon by the Commissioner for ultimate pension the demand was not what fairness or even liberality required. I informed the Commissioner that the amounts and the details of the scheme in my draft must be regarded as provisional; that I had not had an opportunity of submitting the draft to my colleagues, and that I should have to get their approval and assent before the Bill was presented to the House, and before the scheme could be regarded as final. I had a difficulty in understanding that.

the head of the Police Force should, in the circumstances, treat the Bill, though in some points it might not have been in accordance with his views, as a ground of resignation. But on June 10, the day after we had discussed the Bill for hours, I received the resignation of the Commissioner, in the terms which have been published. The Commissioner said—

“The views which I entertain as to the justice and reasonableness of the claims of the Metropolitan Police, in connection with superannuation, being unfortunately on vital points diametrically opposed to those of the Secretary of State, I cannot, for reasons given in my Memorandum of the 5th inst., accept the Bill as adequately meeting such just and reasonable claims.”

In many respects I agree with what fell from the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir W. Harcourt) as to the relations that should exist between the Secretary of State and the Commissioner of Police. I agree that the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of State alone, must be responsible for the policy of the police. [Mr. GRAHAM: The London County Council.] I think that when there is a large force of policemen in the heart of this Metropolis it is not a matter for the County Council. I say that the police must be governed in the last resort by the Secretary of State, who is amenable and responsible to Parliament. Of course, I admit that executive details and the discipline of the Force should rest almost entirely with the Commissioner, and I should certainly abstain from interfering in matters of that kind; but on all questions of policy, involving the finance of the Force, the general rules of the Force, or the relation of the Force to the public—on all questions of this kind—the decision of the Secretary of State must be final. I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman that the Commissioner should be consulted, and that every attention should be paid to his opinions, and I readily admit the high capability of Mr. Monro to consult with and advise the Secretary of State. But I also think that on questions of policy it is expedient that the Commissioner of Police should be ready to accept the decisions of the Government, through the Secretary of State, and to cordially carry them out. After giving the most careful consideration I could to this letter of resignation, coming as it did, not merely as an act of hasty feeling, such as may occur to the best of men under given circumstances, but as the result of an attitude that had been persistently maintained for months, I came to the conclusion that it was my duty to accept the resignation. In view of the attitude of the Commissioner in assuming to treat, as if he were an independent power, as to the terms of superannuation of his Force, as to demanding from the Government greater pecuniary advantages for the men, and as to tendering his resignation upon the terms of a Bill which had not been placed before the House, and which no one could settle but the House, and that being not a momentary or hasty act, but the outcome and result of a continued line of action, and a continued expression of opinion, I came to the conclusion it was my duty to accept the resignation. The right hon. Gentleman says that is all my fault. He has not condescended to explain how or why. I can only say I exhausted my ingenuity in trying to frame the terms of the Superannuation Bill in such a way that they might meet with the assent of the Commissioner of Police. I desired, and I shall desire, to have the concurrence of that officer in the proposals which we feel it our duty to submit to Parliament on this subject. I am sure the Commissioner himself will say I was never wanting in consideration or in courtesy to him. Although in what may be compared to a Committee discussion which we held, we both expressed our views decidedly and positively, there was not the least heat, temper, or ill-will displayed. I have said I was surprised at the resignation of Mr. Monro. I have said I accepted it, not on the miserable ground of patronage, which never ought to have been introduced, but on the greater point. I felt I had no alternative but to accept the resignation. I accepted it with very great regret. I take leave to say Mr. Monro has displayed many admirable qualities. He rendered great service to the State as Assistant Commissioner. His organisation of the Department was efficient and successful, and his undertaking the management of the Police Force at the moment of the unfortunate resignation of Sir Charles Warren, to which I do not think it is necessary to refer further, was of itself a service to the public and the Government. In many respects his administration of the police has been extremely efficient and able. No one regrets more than myself the attitude Mr. Monro thought it necessary to adopt upon this question of legislation—an attitude which seemed to me totally inconsistent with the relative position of the Secretary of State and the Government, and of this House, and of Parliament, and the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman says it is all my fault. I listened with some interest and curiosity to know why. He did not enlighten me. I know not how or in what way I could have done more to studiously avoid anything which might lead to friction. The right hon. Gentleman went on to charge upon me, in language certainly of extraordinary vehemence, the state of things that has arisen since the resignation of Mr. Monro. There, again, I regret that the right hon. Gentleman has not taken more pains to ascertain the facts. I have most carefully watched, and most accurately ascertained what has been happening from day to day, and here I must defend Mr. Monro against the accusation that was rather suggested than definitely made by the right hon. Gentleman, namely, that he had, in some sense, encouraged or promoted something very much resembling disaffection in the Force.

SIR W. HARCOURT: What I did say was that, under the authority of the Commissioner of Police, meetings have been constantly taking place of various members of the Police Force to discuss the measures of the Secretary of State. That I gather from the newspapers. Of course, I assume the meetings were under the authority and permission of the Commissioner of Police, or they could not have taken place.

*MR. MATTHEWS: I repeat it is difficult to grapple with allegations that ended in nothing. The right hon. Gentleman must mean, I suppose, that in consequence of what has happened between the 11th of June and the present day, I ought to have dismissed Mr. Monro from Scotland yard. He is mistaken in his facts. He has accepted statements put forward by interested persons, without any warrant or authority. These alleged meetings, as reported in the Press, have not taken place; they are the inventions of certain persons—[Sir W. HARCOURT: The newspapers]—not only the newspapers—who have been attempting to get up an agitation. I have seen letters, and indeed, speeches, by members of what is called the Social Democratic Federation, in which they encourage the police to insubordination.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I was speaking of meetings of Superintendents; and I have seen documents signed by these Superintendents, and there have been sent to me documents purporting to be conclusions and the representations made by these Superintendents.

*MR. MATTHEWS: What actually occurred was this. Mr. Monro called before him the Superintendents, the Assistant Commissioners, and the Chief Constables, and informed them and directed them to inform the Force, that no meeting of the Force, no irregular agitation, and no combined action would be allowed, and I must, of course, strenuously defend Mr. Monro from the suggestion that, even at the period the right hon. Gentleman has alluded to, he did anything so disloyal, and so contrary to his duty, as to encourage, or foment, or allow anything resembling agitation. The only meeting which took place was a meeting of the chief officers of the police, summoned by the Commissioner himself, and summoned for the purpose of warning them that nothing of the kind now suggested by the right hon. Gentleman must take place. It was quite true, Mr. Monro went on to say, that the Superintendents, each of them in their own divisions, were at liberty to ascertain the best way they could, by private conference and otherwise, the feelings and opinions of the men stationed under them, and that they might then report to him. This I say, on the best authority, is what occurred. I was, of course, anxious to terminate the existing state of things at Scotland Yard, as rapidly as I could, but the right hon. Gentleman himself must know that the filling of such an office as that of Chief Commissioner of Police is a matter which requires grave consideration. He must also know that various steps are often necessary. I had, above all, to consider, which I did consider, the question of order in the Force, and I conceived that order in the Force would be in greater peril if I left it without a head, and, above all, if I withdrew, in any way resembling discredit, a chief to whom they were attached. Therefore, although I might not absolutely approve of everything that has taken place at Whitehall Place, since the 11th of June——

*MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: (Lanark, N.W.): I rise to a point of order. I wish to know whether the right hon. Gentleman is in order in imputing dereliction of duty to Mr. Monro?

*MR. MATTHEWS: I was imputing no dereliction of duty to Mr. Monro. Mr. Monro being at Whitehall Place was a security for the order and peace in the Metropolis, and a security for the good conduct and subordination of the Police Force, and, therefore, I do not admit I am open to the reproaches of the right hon. Gentleman for having allowed that state of things. I should have been glad if I could have terminated it earlier, but various matters had to be considered. Now, Sir, I am not aware that it would be seemly or right that I should discuss the personal qualities of the gentleman whom I have chosen to succeed Mr. Monro. His career speaks for him. So far as I have been able to judge that career has been distinguished and remarkable for every quality of ability and character. I share the feeling of the right hon. Gentleman that the military spirit is one to be deprecated. I do not agree with Mr. Monro when in his letter of resignation he treats police, military, and legal training upon an almost equal footing. I think the military training is of subordinate use, although I cannot deny that it is some use. Legal training I consider to be positively mischievous. I take the liberty to say that Sir E. Bradford will not bring the military spirit to the command of the police. He is a man whose civil services and whose civilian achievements far and away exceed and outweigh the military portion of his career. He did in India wield, control, and manage the whole civil as well as military administration of the State entrusted to him, and as Political Secretary at the Indian Office for some years he has acquired a more thorough and complete knowledge of civilian matters and pursuits than he even had before. I am quite sure he will not bring to the administration of the police any of those features the right hon. Gentleman and others desire to see absent. I think I have now travelled over the ground covered by the right hon. Gentleman. I cannot, of course, expect to have his approval. I should be glad if he had given me something more tangible to meet. It is a convenient course to say that everything has gone wrong since I was at the Home Office—to attribute it all to my misconduct.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The right hon. Gentleman forgets that I defended him on the resignation of Sir Charles Warren.

*MR. MATTHEWS: I have by no means forgotten his speech on that occasion. I think it worthy of him and of his best days; but the right hon. Gentleman will pardon me for reminding him that he has imputed to me the blame for the resignation of Sir Charles Warren as a sort of makeweight, or as though the second resignation coming on the top of that was only a proof of how much I was to blame. I have laid the reasons for the resignation before the Committee. I believe I have stated them fully, but I am quite ready to answer any question any hon. Member may put to me on the subject. I am unable to take to myself, or to impute to Mr. Monro, anything resembling blame. Mr. Monro is a man of strong will and energetic judgment, and men of that calibre and temper do find it difficult to recognise the Parliamentary exigencies of such a situation as this, and the way in which both they and the Secretary of State must obey the behests and the will of Parliament. Mr. Monro is a man whose opinions and convictions are so strong that he cannot reconcile himself to see anything but the adoption of those opinions. One must take these strong and adamant characters as they are. Therefore, I beg to exonerate Mr. Monro from blame and censure, beyond that which is a necessary consequence of what I have said. Just as emphatically do I beg to repudiate the charges which in his extremely energetic way the right hon. Gentleman has sought to make against me.

(6.30.) MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): Whatever view may be taken of the action of the Home Secretary, we must all regret a state of things which has given rise to grave apprehension. Up to this evening, it was possible to hope that the Chief Commissionership would have been resumed by Mr. Monro, a gentleman who, whatever may be said for and against him, is certainly regarded as the advocate of the just and legitimate claims of the men, and as having, at all events, this one essential qualification for such an office as this in question, that beyond all doubt and controversy, although he was a strict and rigid disciplinarian, he enjoyed to the fullest extent the confidence of all ranks in the Metropolitan Force. Now, the Home Secretary has laid down a general principle which, in his judgment, should govern the relations between the Home Secretary and the Chief Commissioner; and, if I may venture to say so, I think he has laid down a sound doctrine. If I understand him correctly, that doctrine is that, so far as policy is concerned, the Home Secretary is and must be supreme; but, so far as administration is concerned, as contra-distinguished from policy, the Chief Commissioner should have, not perhaps an absolutely free hand, but, at all events, that he should have considerable latitude. I regard that as a very sound doctrine, but the mischief of the case is, that there is very little correspondence, so far as the case has been disclosed to us, between the principles and the practice of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman has referred at length to the question of superannuation; but as we shall have another opportunity of dealing with that I had better pass it by for the present. But I am very much surprised that the right hon. Gentleman did not refer to another point of difference mentioned by Mr. Monro in his letter, which was read to us a few nights ago. The passage I have particularly in view, and which the Home Secretary seems to have entirely ignored, is as follows:—

“For many months I have found myself surrounded with difficulties in attempting to procure recognition of what seemed to me to be the very urgent demands of the Police Service in connection with other important matters.”

that is to say, matters apart from the question of superannuation. On this aspect of the case the right hon. Gentleman has said positively nothing, although it seems to me we cannot really appreciate the merits of the quarrel, if quarrel it may fairly be called, between the right hon. Gentleman and the Chief Commissioner until we know what the points are to which reference is made in the passage I have quoted. If I am correctly informed, one of the demands Mr. Monro has been pressing on the attention of the Home Secretary is an improvement in the pay of the Metropolitan Police. For my own part, having devoted some attention to the subject, I think that the question of pay is more important to the rank and file of the Force than the question of superannuation. I find that in the Metropolitan Force, as compared with other Forces, there are very few men over 50, and also very few men who have served over 25 years. Out of a Force consisting of over 14,000 men, only 300 odd have completed 25 years' service. I find also that existing pensioners are comparatively young, the average age being only 45, the average of service having been 21 years. In these circumstances, I think it will be obvious that the question of Superannuation, however important, must be considered also in reference to the question of pay. No doubt, so far as Superintendents and other officers in responsible positions are concerned, the question of superannuation is important, because it takes many years to become Superintendent, and the period when they can claim these pensions must be rapidly approaching. But among the rank and file, pay is even more important than pensions, and, unless I am misinformed, the men consider it so themselves. Now, a word or two on this question of pay, because I think the present scale of pay for constables in the Metropolitan Police is not adequate—first of all, it is not reasonably adequate for the class of men you desire to introduce into the Force, and, I may add, keep there; secondly, it is inadequate, having regard to the duty they have to perform. The peculiar circumstances of London enable us to make a comparison which certainly ought to have great weight; I mean a comparison between the Metropolitan Force and the Police Force of the City of London. An hon. Member the other day asked what was the rate of pay of the City Police, and the right hon. Gentleman, not unnaturally, was unable at the moment to give the information. Now, I propose to place side by side the wages of three classes of constables in the Metropolitan and City Forces. In the lowest class the pay in the Metropolitan Force is 24s. a week, in the City 25s. In the second class 27s. in the Metropolitan Force, and 28s. 8d. in the City Force. And in the first class, which, I understand, can be attained after eight years' service, 30s. and 32s. 3d. respectively. The Committee will see that the rate of pay in the City contrasts very favourably in the interests of the men with the rate in the Metropolitan Force, and I certainly think no reason whatever can be alleged why the Metropolis generally should pay its police at a lower rate than is paid by the London Corporation. We have to consider this question of wages in regard to all classes of public servants, with reference to recent events, which in many cases have raised the rates of wages in trades and occupations outside the Public Service. Take the case of the docker, with 6d. an hour; he works the same number of hours as the police ordinarily do—and I emphasise the word ordinarily, because there is an enormous amount of overtime. The ordinary docker making the ordinary number of hours of police duty receives 26s. a week, or 2s. a week more than the lowest rate of Metropolitan policeman. And I remember after the gas stokers strike seeing an advertisement announcing that, in consequence of the hours of labour in that occupation, stokers were required at 8s. a day. I mention this case particularly; it is not an occupation that requires any training or skill, but simply physical endurance, in this instance no doubt to a considerable degree. But then in the Metropolitan police physical strength is quite as much required as in the work of gas stokers. Now, workmen have recently, by means of combination, and I may say agitation, been able to raise their rate of wages. I am quite aware that combination and agitation are inconvenient, and particularly so in the Public Service, but if you dislike combination and agitation among public servants, surely the best and most reasonable mode of proceeding is to remove the ground and reason for such by a timely concession of the reasonable demands which policemen or postmen or any body of persons might, by means of combination, be able to enforce. There is another matter not immediately concerned with this discussion so far as it has proceeded, upon which I hope we may have some information which has not yet been provided. I refer to the increase of the Metropolitan Police Force by 1,000 men. It is certainly a matter of soreness, a legitimate grievance, as I think, to the ratepayers of London that the Force is to be increased by 1,000 men, and they are, of course, to provide the necessary cost, without being in any way consulted in the matter. I do think that, having regard to the exceptional circumstances of the Metropolitan Police, before such an important addition as this was made there ought to have been an inquiry—not a Departmental inquiry, though I do not understand there was even that—but I think there ought to have been an inquiry something in the nature of an inquiry by Select Committee before so important a step, necessitating so considerable an increase on the burdens of the Metropolis, was taken. I want the right hon. Gentleman to-night to give us a direct answer how the cost of these additional 1,000 men is to be provided. We are somewhat at a loss to know from what source it is to be taken. It has been suggested—I do not know whether the suggestion is well founded or not—that the £150,000 which this House, under the Local Taxation Bill, will pay over to the Receiver of Metropolitan Police, or a considerable part of that money, is to be applied to the pay and cost of these 1,000 additional men. If that is so, I do think a course has been taken which, I am afraid, I must call a rather surreptitious course. It ought to have been brought before the attention of the Committee in a more direct manner before being sanctioned. Is this increase really necessary? During the last year or two, I have noticed that members of the Force are being used in a way to which I have not been before accustomed; what I must call a political use is being made of these men. Sometimes, when attending meetings—very small meetings sometimes—I have seen from two to six constables waiting at the door or patrolling near. I have no complaint to make of the conduct of the men; they have always conducted themselves in a proper and civil manner; but in the interest of the ratepayers, in the interest of persons whose property has to be protected, I do complain of the presence of these men on such occasions, the waste of the Force, and I think they would be very much better and more usefully employed on their ordinary beats, or their ordinary proper duty of preventing and detecting crime. Upon the question whether or not the increase is necessary, let me compare the position of the London Police and the position of the police in other large towns. In London I find the proportion of police to inhabitants is one to 435. Manchester is the only town that comes near this high proportion; the proportion in provincial towns, and in the largest of them, is generally little over half that of London. Then, again, when I take the test of the number of inhabited houses, I find that in London there are 16 policemen to every 1,000 inhabited houses. No town in the country comes near this proportion, Manchester again coming next with 12 men to every 1,000 inhabited houses. Now, only having regard to this comparison, should it be necessary to increase the number of Metropolitan Police? I hope we shall have some definite and distinct reply from the right hon. Gentleman, and I press this question upon him for this reason: that I find the relation of the population to the criminal classes in London according to Police Returns is as 2,000 to one. In what the public call "pleasure" towns, such as Bath, Brighton, Scarborough, and so on, the estimate is 1,500 to one, and in large centres of industry, such as Birmingham, Sheffield, and Wolverhampton, the criminal class is estimated as one to every 500 of population. Having regard to this ratio, again, I ask why is a still further increase of the Police Force necessary? It is true that last year there was an increase of crime in London of nearly 10 per cent., but I suggest whether the reason of such increase was not that under the régime of the right hon. Gentleman the police were being withdrawn from their legitimate duties for purposes which partake more or less of a political complexion? The moral to be drawn from the whole of the unfortunate controversies between the Secretary of State and successive Chief Commissioners is very plain: it is that the control of the Metropolitan Police should be transferred to the London County Council. It is obvious that mischief results from what I may call this dual control, for it appears to me to be almost a dual control, of the Home Office and Scotland Yard. On the other hand, nothing but good can result from the transfer. Whatever Government may be in power will be relieved from the obstruction to business which Parliamentary discussion of Metropolitan Police matter brings about; but over and above that, I put it mainly on the right of the ratepayers of London to have control similar to that which is exercised by the ratepayers of other large towns—the right to control the civil force they are called upon to pay for.

*(6.53.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): The hon. Gentleman has raised a great many questions of importance which, no doubt, will occupy attention, but we must not for the moment pass from the question raised by my right hon. Friend (Sir W. Harcourt) to which the Home Secretary has made a reply, the condition of the Metropolitan Force as it is to-day. We have just listened to the defence, if I may so call it, of the Secretary of State of his present administration, and the right hon. Gentleman, I am sure, will pardon me for saying I regard that defence as both incomplete and inconclusive. We are in a somewhat unfortunate position in this Debate, and I think my right hon. Friend had good ground for complaint. Full notice was given several days ago of the intention of my right hon. Friend to impugn the administration of the police, and why have no Papers been laid before us? The Home Secretary was asked to lay Papers before the House, and he was understood to say he would lay correspondence before the House, but he has not laid one line from that day to this. We have had the letter from Mr. Monro, addressed to the right hon. Gentleman, upon which I shall comment shortly, and we know that a statement has appeared in the Press that Mr. Monro did not accept the statement of the Secretary of State as correct, and Mr. Monro stated that when the House is in possession of documents the House will be in a position to form a correct opinion. The right hon. Gentleman has told the House that on June 5 there was a Memorandum presented to him by Mr. Monro, embodying the whole of Mr. Monro's objections to the right hon. Gentleman's policy. Why has the House not had that Memorandum? In order to know what Mr. Monro's case is, the House ought to know what that gentleman has said, and said in writing. I do not think the right hon. Gentleman can claim that the Memorandum is a confidential document, because the whole relations of the past are altered, and the House of Commons is called upon to express an opinion as to whether the Home Secretary was justified or not, I will not say in driving things to an issue and to Mr. Monro's resignation, but in accepting Mr. Monro's resignation. So, I say, we ought to have Mr. Monro's statement in writing. The Home Secretary put the resignation of Mr. Monro entirely on the question of superannuation, and if that were the whole question there would be much to say for the right hon. Gentleman's position; but that was not what Mr. Monro said he resigned for. He gave four points in his letter, and the House has a right to know what were the "fair requirements and demands of the police in other important matters"—that is, besides superannuation—to which the Home Secretary would not lend an ear, and in consequence of which the Chief Commissioner resigned. The House is entitled to know what were the points of police administration on which Mr. Monro and the Home Secretary differed, and also the grounds on which Mr. Monro got the impression that Mr. Ruggles-Brise, and not Mr. Howard, was going to be appointed as Assistant Commissioner. There was a conversation in which the right hon. Gentleman says the claims and qualifications of candidates were fully discussed, and I give the right hon. Gentleman the fullest credit for desiring to do the best for the interest of the force, but Mr. Monro says the impression left upon his mind was that Mr. Ruggles-Brise was to be appointed. That is what Mr. Monro said. I do not say he is right; but I do say we are entitled to know all that passed from first to last, and then we shall know how these differences have arisen. Now, I will say a word or two about the position of the police, and I would suggest to the Home Secretary and the other Members of Her Majesty's Government that this is quite as important a matter as are many of the questions which the House is now discussing. In fact, I do not know any question of more importance to this House or the Metropolis than the condition of the police, and it is that question which the House has now to consider. My right hon. Friend the Member for Derby has criticised the administration of the Metropolitan Police by the Home Secretary, and has said that the Police Force now, for the first time, is in an unsatisfied, discontented, and unsatisfactory state, and the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary did not deny one syllable of this assertion. All the right hon. Gentleman did was to justify himself as far as he could. But what is it that the Home Secretary tells us on this head? He simply says he has heard nothing of any dissatisfaction, nor of any meetings; that he believes the police to be perfectly loyal and contented, and he uses some cheering words with regard to the Metropolitan Force. I do not suppose the Home Secretary ever reads so wicked a paper as the Daily News; but I may say that if the right hon. Gentleman has only looked at this morning's copy of that paper he would have seen a statement, which I will bring to the attention of the Committee. It is that—

"A crowded meeting of Metropolitan Police constables took place last night in order to discuss the grievances of the force. The meeting was in continuation of one that took place and was adjourned a week before, and the proceedings were of a particularly enthusiastic character. All direct references to Mr. Matthews and the Government were greeted with a chorus of groans and cheers."

I am not going to read the full account of that meeting. I have no doubt there was a discussion of the right hon. Gentleman's proposals; and, when the time comes, we shall be able to see whether or not a good deal may be said for them. But the real point is, that this meeting affords evidence that the police are dissatisfied and discontented, and that they have been holding meetings of which the right hon. Gentleman says he has heard nothing. With regard to superannuation, the right hon. Gentleman laid great stress on the promises of my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby. But I must point out that the promises made by my right hon. Friend were embodied in his Bill; and on this point there can be no mistake, for I was at the Home Office up to the time my right hon. Friend left, and I know that, in the Bill he had prepared and brought in in 1885, he gave full expression to his opinion as to what were the just claims of the Metropolitan Police to superannuation. But if, as we are told, Mr. Monro raised objections to the present scheme of the Home Secretary before the Departmental Committee which has investigated the matter, and relied on the Bill of my right hon. Friend, there must have been something in the new proposals very different from those of my right hon. Friend. I have gone over the matter carefully, and I may say that the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary is practically our Bill; indeed, I may say that I think it is a little better in some important point, probably because the right hon. Gentleman has found the Treasury a little more pliant than we did; but, subject to that remark, the criticism would be merely verbal as between the two schemes, the present superannuation scheme being virtually that of my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby. This being the case, we want to know why it is that Mr. Monro was satisfied with the promises of my right hon. Friend, and yet, when before the Departmental Committee, raised objections to the present scheme, thereby bringing the Departmental Committee to a deadlock. We can see, if we read between the lines, that the Home Secretary wanted to reduce the rates. The point is, however, that the Home Secretary evidently had in contemplation some modification of terms in the public interest. All these things are part of the history of the controversy between Mr. Monro and the Home Secretary, and are no doubt fully set forth in the Memorandum of the 5th June, which, I say, we ought to have laid on the Table of the House. The Home Secretary has told us that nothing could have surprised him more than the resignation of Mr. Monro; but only five minutes later he stated that Mr. Monro had maintained a hostile attitude persistently for several months. This, therefore, was the outcome of a continued line of action.

MR. MATTHEWS: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. I did not use the word "hostile."

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: Then, Sir, I at once withdraw the word "hostile;" but I made a note at the time of what the right hon. Gentleman did say, and it was

"that Mr. Monro's resignation was the outcome and result of a continued line of action," and, if this were the case, it is difficult to imagine how the resignation should have given so unexpected a shock to the mind of the Home Secretary. But the Home Secretary says there have been difficulties during the last four years as between the Home Office and the police, and when we are dealing with the administration of a force which really amounts to an Army, and with men who are virtually occupying the position of Generals, we may form some idea of the nature of the situation. We must look upon the Home Secretary as the head of that Army, and we find that, under his administration, there have been, during the past four years, strained relations as between the Home Office and Scotland Yard, and the Home Office and the public. The public have been brought into collision with the Metropolitan Police during those four years, but previous to that no such occurrence has been known since the establishment of the Police Force. We all know that Sir Charles Warren was under the necessity of resigning his post not so very long ago, and now his successor, Mr. Monro, feels compelled to take the same step under circumstances which certainly demand the careful attention of the House of Commons. It was the duty of Mr. Monro to represent to the Home Secretary what he believed to be the views and wishes of the force under his command. It was not his duty to dictate, and I cannot understand that he thought it right for him to settle the basis on which the superannuation scheme should be arranged. Well, we cannot pass over this question without putting to ourselves the question: why should London differ from Manchester, Birmingham, Liverpool, Glasgow, and the other great towns of England and in the counties? In those places there is no friction between the Government and the police, and the police are perfectly satisfied to be controlled and governed by the Representative Bodies in the large Municipalities and counties. What is there in London which should necessitate the placing of the Police Force under a different system of administration? I know there is in some quarters a feeling which may be illustrated by what was stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers) when he said he should always support, maintain, and defend the existence of an Imperial Police Force in London under what he called Imperial administration; but I think there is a general opinion that, had the Metropolitan Police been placed under representative control, our minds would have been set at rest with regard to all the questions that have of late arisen.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK
(Whitehaven): No.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Whitehaven indignantly denies that assertion, and I ask him for some ground for his denial; I ask him or any other hon. Member opposite to name one of the large provincial towns in which there has been any collision between the police and the authorities by whom they are controlled. I had the honour of sitting on the Watch Committee of the town with which I am connected for a good many years, and I know that there the police are able to bring legitimate public opinion to bear on the Governing Body, which is a totally different thing from what may happen in a crisis of this sort, where the police may be drawn—it will be a dangerous matter if they should be—into political action. I know of nothing which we in this House would more regret—whether in the case of the police, or the civil or military servants of the Crown—than that they should use their position as electors to approach this branch of the Legislature with a view of obtaining certain pecuniary advantages for themselves. These are questions which will arise again and again in this Metropolis until the House fairly faces the position and decides that the police of London shall be in no worse position than are the police of any other locality. I think that this Debate has, at any rate, shown—and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will pardon me for saying so, as I say it without any disrespect—that there are departments of public administration for which the Home Office is not exceptionally well-fitted. I feel that the present collision between the Home Office and the police is a very unfortunate incident. It is, of course, difficult to apportion the blame, and I am sure the House will not undertake to do so without further information. We ought to have all the papers before us. I would suggest that the best and wisest course the Home Secretary can pursue would be to take steps to relieve the Home Office, as soon as possible, from its present control of the Metropolitan Police, for which, under the circumstances which have arisen, the Home Office has shown itself to be peculiarly unfitted. As far as the Metropolitan Police are concerned, I cannot but speak of them with the highest respect, and I repeat that no man has been more generous to them than my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby. There is no indisposition on the part of those on this side of the House to do what is fair and just to the police, but we are bound to remember that our public system of pension and superannuation is a very wide system, and that we shall have to deal with other interests than police interests if we grant exceptional privileges to that Department of the Public Service. Undoubtedly the Metropolitan Police ought to be well paid, even better paid than the police elsewhere, because of the special expenditure they are put to, and because of the exceptionally hard duty they have to perform. They are, I think, entitled to a just and fair superannuation allowance. I regard the London police as an exceedingly intelligent Force, and also as a body of men actuated by the highest principles in the performance of the duty devolving upon them in the position in which they are placed. I do not say that in a Force of some 14,000 or 15,000 men there are not a few who will say or do things that are to be regretted, but I believe that, as a whole, they deserve and possess the confidence of the public. When we remember that this great city contains five millions of people, or one million more than the entire population of Scotland, and that it is kept in order by a Force of 15,000 police, I think we may say that one of the proudest features of our national life is the way in which the peace is preserved in the Metropolis. There is every disposition on this side of the House to deal with the police, not only in the fairest, but also in the most liberal manner, but we do apprehend that there is a public danger in the sustained friction which has been going on between the police and the Home Office. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary will not give us papers on the subject, and, as far as we know, at any rate, speaking what is my own opinion, this regrettable resignation on the part of Mr. Monro is not an act which will inflict great loss on the Public Service, for however distinguished may be the gentleman who is to succeed him, I very much doubt whether we shall find anyone better qualified than Mr. Monro to fill his post, while I am quite certain it will be a long time before any new Commissioner will gain the confidence of the Force to the extent that he has done.

*(7.18.) SIR L. PELLY (Hackney, N.): I merely rise for the purpose of saying that, however much we may regret and deplore the loss of the services of Mr. Monro, I cannot refrain from heartily congratulating Her Majesty's Government on the happy selection they have made of a successor to that gentleman in the person of Sir Edward Bradford. I have had the pleasure and the honour of serving with Sir Edward Bradford for many years. We were associated together in the Province of Rajpootana; and I have been more or less directly cognisant of his work under three successive Viceroys, namely, Lord Mayo, Lord Northbrook, and Lord Lytton; and I know that these three Viceroys entertained the highest opinion of Sir Edward Bradford in every respect. I do not desire to draw comparisons, but I may say that I am unable, after 40 years' service, to call to mind any officer of whom I have a higher appreciation in respect of temper, tact, patience, suavity of manner, firmness of mind, experience in the management of the most difficult affairs of the police for the whole of India, and also in regard to the peculiar genius which he has displayed in attracting those with whom he has been associated. He gains the affections of the men who work under him, and carries out his duties in a manner which, as I have already said, is in many of its characteristics unsurpassed. I know how dangerous it is to prophecy, but if I could venture to make a prophecy on this occasion, it would be that Her Majesty's Government will never have cause to regret the appointment of Sir Edward Bradford to the post of Chief Commissioner. I am sure he will endear himself in a short time to his subordinates, that he will thoroughly understand the work he has to do, and that he will bring to bear upon it an experience which will prove of the greatest value to the service of the Metropolis.

*(7.20.) MR. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I am sure we were all glad to hear the satisfactory testimony which has just been given to the ability of the gentleman who has just received the appointment of Chief Commissioner. But the question really is, how long is Sir Edward Bradford likely to retain the post now that he has been appointed? If he is at all like his predecessors he will go through what has come to be a uniform process. He will get into more and more difficulty and friction with the Home Office until some point, trivial or important, will inevitably arise, when the friction will become so great that he will be unable to bear the strain any longer, and his relations with the Home Office will come to an end. That is the history not only of one Chief Commissioner; but of two, namely, Sir Charles Warren and Mr. Monro, the gentleman who has just retired. The Home Secretary has made a most unsatisfactory reply to what was said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby. He has dwelt in the main on one single point in relation to Mr. Monro, namely, his dealing with the superannuation question, but I would remind the Committee that Mr. Monro has drawn attention to a long series of difficulties respecting the administration of the police and the proposed legislation, and we on this side have a right to know what these difficulties are, because that is in reality the gravamen of the whole matter. The question is, What have been the continued relations between the Home Office and the Commissioners of Police? To all appearance they have been such as to render it practically impossible that the Home Secretary and the Chief Commissioner could work together in peace, and where that is the case, there is, of course, an end to all good government. That would seem to be the state of things at present. Well, then, Mr. Courtney, we want to know whose fault is this. There have been two very different individuals occupying the post of Chief Commissioner, and only one man who, at the same time, has occupied the position of Home Secretary, and yet in the case of each Commissioner the same sort of difficulty has occurred. Perhaps after we have lived through another series of troubles between the Home Office and the gentleman who has just been appointed, we may then be able to come to the root of the difficulty. Very little sympathy was expressed by the Home Secretary for the difficulties connected with the Metropolitan Police. There can be little doubt that they have grievances to complain of at the present moment—distinct grievances from a money point of view. Doubtless a good Superannuation Bill is desired by them, and I think they have a right to it. Why, then, cannot the Home Secretary carry out some satisfactory measure? It is because he has not got the money. But why cannot he get the money? That seems to be his chief difficulty, and in order to get over it he resorts to a "juggle." He has to obtain the means of creating a Superannuation Fund, but he does not wish to do this by a direct increase of taxation, and, therefore, he wants to exclude from that Superannuation Fund a certain amount which has hitherto gone into it, in order that he may be able to provide for the contemplated increase of the Police Force. By obtaining money for what he calls a Superannuation Fund, and not using it for Superannuation purposes, he thinks he will be able to get what he requires for increasing the Police Force, which is now growing at a greater rate than the rateable value of the Metropolis. This is a state of things which contrasts unfavourably with what is going on in the large towns in the other parts of the Kingdom, where the increase of the police is in a smaller ratio than the increase of rateable value. But, I ask, why cannot the Home Secretary be content to obtain the necessary funds in a direct way? It is because he would have to come to this House for a Bill which would make the Metropolitan Police Rate greater than 9d. in the £1, and he dare not do this, because, in so doing, he would be placing a hindrance in the way of public business, and because he would be dealing with the £1,500,000 of money obtained from the people of London in a way in which the money raised from the taxpayers in no other part of the country is dealt with. The result is that the Home Secretary, unable to appeal to the House of Commons, because of the hindrance to public business at a time when there are more important matters to attend to, has had, as I have said, to resort to a "juggle" in order to obtain the means. But if the Government would only consent to the placing of the Metropolitan Police under the control of the County Council, all this difficulty would disappear. If the County Council had charge of the police they would have plenty of time, by means of Committees, to manage the affairs of that body. I know that the County Council is already full of work; but it is not nearly as heavily worked as the House of Commons, and in the control of the police the County Council would have one of its principal duties. I think it a great pity that we should be under the necessity of discussing this question as we have been doing to-night; but we are obliged to consider the matter, because there is no other body having power to deal with it. I am, however, glad that this discussion has taken place, if for no other reason than that this "kick-up" between the Home Secretary and the Commissioner of Police has called forth the declarations we have heard from the right hon. Gentlemen the Members for Derby and Wolverhampton. We know now for certain that these right hon. Gentlemen are prepared to place the control of the Metropolitan Police, under proper restrictions, in the hands of the County Council, as the representatives of the people of London. I certainly think that this is the only arrangement which would put an end not only to the pecuniary difficulty, but also to the friction which arises between the police and the people in this Metropolis, and which does not arise in any other town. We have in London a discontented police and a controlling administration with which they are at variance. If you go to the other large towns of England you have neither the one nor the other. I believe that we in this House, on both sides, have the greatest respect and admiration for the Metropolitan Police. We on this side, at any rate, think that they ought to be better treated; but we complain of the way in which they are managed at the Home Office. We object to the irresponsibility of that management, and we desire to see such a change as will tend in the future to a better state of things.

*(7.30.) SIR J. GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.): I have always thought that one of the greatest difficulties any Government has to deal with is the question of wages in the case of the large staff of men employed in the various Departments of the Public Service, and that is one of the reasons why I have been opposed to extension of the trade part of the Government work. A claim has been put forward for the presentation of papers, but I do not see how any papers would throw greater light on this matter than is now possessed by the Committee. I think I can see clearly what the actual position is. Mr. Monro, with whom I have had the advantage of being in contact on various occasions, is a man of strong and determined character, and if he does not always have his own way I believe he is a little mistaken in thinking that the responsibility will fall on him. It strikes me that Mr. Monro has a little misunderstood the situation. He was certainly right in representing to the Home Secretary, as strongly as possible, his views with regard to the payment of the men, and with reference to superannuation and other matters connected with the Police Force; but the decision on these things was a matter resting with the Home Secretary, because he is the person on whom the ultimate responsibility must rest. I cannot but think that Mr. Monro made a mistake in sending in his resignation as he did, and that, but for his precipitate action, a solution of the difficulties that had arisen might have been found. With regard to what has been said about the Metropolitan Police, I have, during the last few days, endeavoured to inform myself on that subject, and I must say that I do not think they are a discontented body. On the contrary, I believe they have always been loyal and ready to do their duty. What they now desire is that their claims should be laid before Parliament, and, as far as I am concerned (although on one point I do not quite agree with them), I think there is much to be said for the views they hold. At the present moment every metropolitan policeman may enter the service at any age above 18; but the pension which is proposed by the Bill is only to count from the age of 21. The complaint of the police is that they are subject to—

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not think the hon. Baronet is justified in entering into an examination of the Bill.

*SIR J. GOLDSMID: I did not mean to refer to the Bill, and the reference I made was accidental. I can, however, explain the complaints of the police without reference to the Bill. What they complain of with regard to the present situation is, that as far as the existing system goes they are only superannuated when they arrive at the age of 60, or previous to that upon a medical certificate. The demand is that they should be superannuated after 25 years' service, irrespective of the fact that they enter the service at the age of 18, 19, 20, or 21. Now, a good deal may be said with regard to this claim, and I would venture to point out that a medical officer who passes a man at 19 considers he is as fully capable of performing the duties of a metropolitan constable as a man of 21. It appears to me that—

THE CHAIRMAN: I am afraid the hon. Baronet is travelling a little wide of the question.

*SIR J. GOLDSMID: Then, Mr. Courtney, I will go to another point. In any arrangement with regard to the position of the police, as to which they say they have reasonable ground for complaint, it is quite right that the other side, namely, the metropolitan ratepayers, should be considered. Of course, we all know that the metropolitan rates have been steadily rising, and the ratepayers should not have burdens cast upon them which they cannot fairly be called upon to bear. But I believe Parliament will not have much difficulty in dealing with the matter, and that the police are prepared to discuss in the most generous spirit any claims which they may make upon the liberality of Parliament. But, at the same time, I think the leaders of the police should show, as I believe they will, a sense of moderation in the demands they make. I think most of us are inclined to agree that they should be properly remunerated and fairly superannuated. With regard to another point, which is one of considerable importance, I desire to say a few words. The right hon. Gentleman below me has said the public are frequently brought into collision with the police. Well, I may say that I have often attended demonstrations of various kinds, and what has struck me has been the very reverse of this. I have constantly had occasion to notice a kindly feeling as between the public and the police, which was really surprising. Living near Hyde Park, I have over and over again taken part in the public demonstrations held there, not as a demonstrator, but as an observer, and I have over and over again seen groups of people talking in a friendly way with the police, and sometimes complimenting them on the good feeling they have shown. Instead of the public being brought into collision with the police they have appeared to be on the most friendly terms with them. As far as the police are concerned there is this to be remembered—during the past two years, demonstrations and strikes of all kinds have taken place, and the Metropolitan Police have had to work very hard. A man has had to leave his home at 6 o'clock in the morning, and does not get home until 2 or 3 the following morning. That is very long and very hard labour, and I think the police perform it with the greatest temper and judgment. Consequently, the metropolitan ratepayers and the public at large owe a great debt to the police, who have taken this large burden upon themselves. At the time of the dock strike, for instance, a very large number of policemen were engaged. There was no ill-feeling between the strikers and the police; only, as a matter of course, when a large number of men congregate, it is the duty of the authorities to see that a sufficient number of police attend to prevent any disturbance. Nothing occurred of a hostile nature between the police and the strikers, and, in my opinion, both classes did themselves credit. I believe the Home Secretary has no desire but to meet the wishes of the men, as far as he can, with due regard to the interests of the metropolitan ratepayers; and as far as Mr. Monro's resignation is concerned, I must say it was Mr. Monro's own fault, and not that of the right hon. Gentleman.

Sir J. Goldsmid

(6.37.) MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I think the hon. Baronet who has just sat down has put a wrong construction on what was said about friction between the police and the public. Every speaker this afternoon has been particular to say that he had no fault whatever to find with the rank and file of the police. The argument of the right hon. Gentleman the member for Derby was not with regard to the constable or the officer, but with regard to the higher authorities having the direction of the Force. It is owing to the action of the authorities at Scotland Yard and the Home Office that you have had continued friction between the police and the people during the last four years. I shall not put myself forward as so great an authority on demonstrations as the hon. Baronet the Member for South St. Pancras, though I have taken part in a few, not as a mere onlooker, but as an active demonstrator. And I have taken part in them over a long period of years, and never has there been friction on account of the conduct of the men; it has always arisen because of the orders of their superiors. I have only to go back to the 7th of this month, when I saw the police so administered, that while they were put to the greatest inconvenience themselves, they were the cause of the greatest inconvenience to the public. With other hon. Members I have taken some trouble to ascertain what are the feelings of the Metropolitan Police, and at the proper time, when the Bill of the Government is brought forward, it will be found that more than one of the Metropolitan Members are prepared to discuss the demands of the Metropolitan Police, and to see that they are justly met. The hon. Baronet has settled the whole question between the Home Office and Scotland Yard, at least to his own satisfaction. The hon. Baronet says he knows the qualities of Mr. Monro, and he knows he is virtually in the wrong. But I must say that the position of the Home Secretary would be very much strengthened if the whole of the Papers were in our hands, so that we might see exactly what has taken place between the Home Secretary and Mr. Monro. If Mr. Monro has acted in this very heated manner, that the hon. Baronet would have us believe, the case of the Home Office would have been very much strengthened if the right hon. Gentleman had put into our hands that memorandum of the 5th of July, and the whole Report of the Departmental Committee to which the Home Secretary referred. We have reached the 20th of June, and we have not yet had circulated the Report of the Chief Commissioner of Police for last year. I may be told that last year we had it, but that was because I persistently put questions to the First Lord of the Treasury that we should have this Report before the Debate took place on the Police Vote. We did get it, true, but under a new system. It had been added to the year before, but a great deal of valuable information was cut out on this occasion. I think a great number of the Members who have listened to the Debate this evening must be thoroughly dissatisfied with the defence made on behalf of the Home Office. It is very characteristic that not one of the independent Members has spoken in support of the Government excepting in a very general manner. I am not going to set up as a judge of who is right and who is wrong in the dispute between Mr. Matthews and Mr. Monro. I have no evidence in my possession to enable me to do so, and I think the Home Secretary, in withholding Papers and information, has acted in a way which will not commend itself to this House. We are told by the Home Secretary that the relations between himself and Mr. Monro were so happy that his resignation came as a cloud on a summer's day. The only piece of evidence we have had, and on which we are bound to take our stand, is what the Home Secretary has chosen to give us in the letter which he read. All we can do is to keep referring him to the fact that in this letter Mr. Monro tendered his resignation, and continually refers to other things besides superannuation and the appointment of the Assistant Commissioner. We want a more direct statement from the Home Secretary than we have had as to the real relation between the Home Office and the police. We have had two Chief Commissioners since the right hon. Gentleman assumed office. One was not his appointment, but the other was. There has been friction, and we shall continue to have friction until a reasonable course is pursued with regard to the police of London. I at once traverse the statement of the Home Secretary, that so long as you have a large body of police in London it is necessary that they should be controlled by the Home Office. We have evidence of the failure of the Home Office in the strained relations between the authorities and the police, which would never have grown up in any provincial town, where members of the Watch Committee come into personal contact with the police, and ascertain their wants and wishes. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that the House of Commons does not want to control the police. It is not supposed that hon. Members coming here for Imperial purposes can be deeply interested in the question of the control of the Metropolitan Police Force. They know that these matters are administered by the Local Authorities in the country, and when they come here to discuss serious and important questions, they do not want to have their time wasted on discussions as to right of way, or some subject of purely local interest, and that, perhaps, possessing interest to only a few of the 670 Members. Notwithstanding, we have to thank the right hon. Gentleman for having done more than any other Home Secretary to show how bad are the relations between the Home Office and Scotland Yard, and how impossible it is that the present system can continue much longer. My Colleagues have a Bill which in the result may be assisted by the action of the right hon. Gentleman. We contend that if the ratepayers had the control of the police, the Force would be more economically administered than by the central authority. I looked over the Local Government Returns the other day, and I find that the cost of the London police, notwithstanding their inadequate pay and unsatisfactory superannuation, is in excess of the cost incurred by the large provincial towns. The Metropolitan Police serve an area in which there are two Corporations, the whole of one county, and parts of four other counties. The two Municipalities at present policed by the Metropolitan Force, lose control over £13,352 out of the total expended on the police in respect of their own district.

West Ham loses control of £11,924; Hertford of £4,144; Kent £10,419; London £457,765; Middlesex £53,519; Surrey £22,000; Croydon £10,000. These figures are exceedingly interesting, as showing, because of their excess over the expenditure in provincial places, that the people of London are placed in a very invidious position compared with the inhabitants of large provincial towns. The argument is used that large buildings, like the Houses of Parliament and other national structures, must be protected. That is a concession which has been made in every Bill brought before the House. Everyone knows, and no one wishes it to be otherwise, that the Home Secretary or some Member of the Government should have under his control a body of men to watch Imperial buildings and national places, and to do the work of the dockyards, at present done by members of the Metropolitan Police. You would have then a much smaller body under one authority than you have at present. You have 15,000 policemen under one central authority. Why not adopt the principle of popular control of the police? But there is another point I wish to enforce this evening. We want a clear answer from the Home Secretary to the question I put the other day as to the addition of 1,000 police to the Force. I believe 700 have already been appointed. Will the right hon. Gentleman tell us how he is going to get the money for these 1,000 men? We want him to dispute, if he can, that he is going to put the £150,000 obtained under the Local Taxation Bills into the revenue of the police, though there is at the same time a deficit of £145,000 in the Superannuation Fund. If you do this, and I do not see from what other source you are going to get your money, then you will virtually impose on the people of London an extra rate, while evading the Statute, which would necessitate your appealing to this House for power to increase the present rate of 9d. You are evading by this means a discussion of the whole question of the Metropolitan Police on the Second Reading of a Bill. We are thus debarred from bringing before the people of London the whole question of the cost of administration of the London Police. Many of us think the cost excessive, not because we think the police are paid too highly, but because the money is frittered away on high salaries on some of the chiefs who are not required. You may tell me that I am simply making an assertion, but it is an assertion you do not give us an opportunity of discussing. I do not know whether it is worth while taking up other questions in connection with the Police Force. There are many other minor questions that we should like to discuss, had it not been for the grave and important crisis which has arisen between the Home Office and Scotland Yard, and which must now engage the attention of the House. I do think, in all seriousness, that the Home Secretary ought to give us a more clear and definite statement than he has made. If we cannot accept his statement our justification is that the Home Secretary has failed to give us the Papers which he promised, and the means whereby we adjudge of the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman. If we cannot give him a verdict of not guilty, the blame is on his side for having kept the House in ignorance of the information at his disposal.

(656.) SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): I am unwilling to give a silent vote on the very important Metropolitan question that has come before us, for two reasons. The first is, that as a Metropolitan Member, I have the honour to represent a very large population very much interested in all that concerns the efficiency of the police of the Metropolis; and, secondly, I have had the pleasure for many years of being the friend and colleague of the distinguished gentleman who has, to my sorrow, recently resigned the position of Chief Commissioner of Police. I may say that I came down to the House this afternoon with a perfectly open mind on the merits of the unfortunate differences of opinion that have taken place between the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department and the late Chief Commissioner; but I must say this, also, that I came down with the full determination that, if necessary, I would speak or vote against the Government, if I found that any unfair or improper imputations were made against a gentleman of the character of my old friend Mr. Monro. But, Sir, I am bound to say that after I had listened to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, and to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton, and to the other speeches from the other side of the House, the general impression left on my mind was that Mr. Monro had been guilty of, at any rate, a certain amount of insubordination to his official Parliamentary superior. I believe that I express the general opinion of the House when I assert that no insubordination of any kind can be tolerated in the Chief Commissioner of Police towards the Home Secretary. But I go far beyond that and I say I am certain from my own knowledge of Mr. Monro that there is no one who would sooner repudiate the idea than Mr. Monro himself. The communication from Mr. Monro, which has been read in this House, shows that he was absolutely incapable of the conduct which has been imputed to him—at least by implication—in some of the speeches of hon. Gentlemen opposite. What did he say in that letter? Why, he spoke of his position when he found himself differing in some important points from his official superior. He said he felt it would not be fair to himself or the Government for him to remain and discuss the merits of this question as a medium between the Government and the Police. He declared that he had no wish whatever to trench on the prerogative of the Secretary of State, and I think that his conduct has shown that that is the case. I greatly regret that he should have felt bound to resign, but in doing so I maintain that he has shown himself utterly incapable of the insubordinate conduct that has been imputed to him by right hon. and hon. Gentlemen on this occasion. The hon. Member for Bethnal Green admitted—and I am glad to bear the admission—that in matters of policy the Chief Commissioner of Police should be entirely subordinate to the Secretary of State, and so, I submit, Mr. Monro showed himself to be when he found that in his opinion—whether rightly or wrongly I am not going to discuss—he could not act up to that high standard of official duty, and he felt it to be the right course to resign. With regard to the difference of opinion which has been expressed as to the details of the superannuation scheme, that scheme I take it is to come before the House on another occasion, and a full opportunity will be given for discussion. That will be the time to discuss the proposals of the Secretary of State. I am free to confess that as at present I see this proposal, I should be glad if the right hon. Gentleman could see his way to make some slight further concessions. I think there are some points—especially in regard to the two-thirds pension after 25 years' service—on which further concession might well be made. It does not seem to me that the matter is a very important one, so far as expense to the community is concerned; whilst, on the other hand, it is a matter on which the Force seem to have set their hearts. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) told us—and I am bound to admit that there was a great deal of force in what he said—that we have to consider the rate-payers on this question as much as, or more even, than the Police Force. He implied that there are more ratepayers than policemen, and that is very true. The point is one well worthy of being discussed in the House when the time comes; but it seems to me that if the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary will take the advice tendered to him to-night and will submit the financial question to a Select Committee, chosen impartially from all sides of the House, both the right hon. Gentleman and the Government on the one hand, and financial reformers like the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton on the other, will loyally accept the decision arrived at. I cordially concur in what fell from the hon. Baronet opposite in regard to the friendly feeling which exists, and which is shown on the occasion of every great demonstration, between the Police Force and the great masses of the population of London. I was present at the recent demonstration as an observer, and I have attended in the same way many great demonstrations, and I must say I have always seen the kindest and friendliest relations prevailing between the people and the police. There is a common catch saying in use at this time: "If you want to know the time, ask a policeman." That phrase exactly expresses the feeling which exists when our poorest citizens want to know the time or anything else, they go and ask a policeman. I would endorse in the strongest terms I can command the opinion expressed 'by my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Hackney, as to the pre-eminent qualifications of the gentleman whom the Home Secretary has chosen to fill the place of Mr. Monro. I had the pleasure and honour of serving for years in association with Sir Edward Bradford. He was at the head of the Department for the suppression of Thuggee and dacoity—a Department which takes the place of the secret police and the Force for putting down highway robbery and robbery with violence in England—and in that capacity, and indeed in every other capacity in which he has served, he has earned the most entire respect, confidence and admiration of every one with whom he has been associated.

(8.10.) MR. ATHERLEY-JONES (Durham, N.W.): The case which has been presented to the House is one as to which it may appear presumptuous in one who is not a Metropolitan Member to say a few words, but I do so because I have given a great deal of attention to this question. We have heard the case against the Home Secretary put by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton in a very forcible and moderate manner; but I am bound to say from all that I have read and heard on the subject, I have come to the conclusion that the Home Secretary was absolutely and completely justified in the course he took with reference to Mr. Monro. No doubt Mr. Monro was an able officer with a high sense of responsibility; but his position by Act of Parliament was one of absolute and complete subordination to the Home Secretary. And no one can doubt that Mr. Monro—to put it in the least offensive manner possible—was not very agreeable to the control of the Home Office. I do not say this from any personal knowledge of the relations between him and the Home Office, but from the circumstances reported in the newspapers which are common to all of us. The Home Secretary thought he was going as far as Parliamentary usage and a due regard to the public purse justified him in the proposals he intended to make with regard to the superannuation of the police, and having regard to the various Superannuation Acts, I think the Home

Sir Roper Lethbridge

Secretary has gone to the extreme of liberality. Some of us who are not Metropolitan Members will have something to say as to that when the time comes, and, perhaps, I may suggest, somewhat cynically, that it does not sound very well for Radical Members to come forward with such profuse expressions of benevolence to the police, and pointing to the public funds as the means of giving effect to that benevolence. We know that what the police require is, first, that the scale of pensions should be more liberal; secondly, that their wages should be increased; and, thirdly, that they should have better allowances for extra work, and so forth. It seems to me that the Committee can come to no other conclusion than that the Home Secretary only acted consistently with his duty to the House in refusing to be dictated to by a subordinate officer. If he had adopted any other attitude, and Parliament had assented, you would have had all Chiefs of Departments at the disposal and dictation of their permanent officials. As to Mr. Ruggles-Brise, it seems to me very curious that the Chief Commissioner should attempt to dictate to his Parliamentary Chief as to who should be appointed Assistant Commissioner. Besides, Mr. Monro's objection was not a valid one. He objected to the appointment of Mr. Ruggles-Brise because he had had no previous police experience, but the same argument might have been used in the case of Mr. Bruce, who has made a most efficient Assistant Commissioner. I think it would be wise to avoid making Party capital out of what are, after all, Constitutional questions; for it is a Constitutional question of some importance that the House should maintain the authority of the Home Secretary. I do not think that the Home Secretary has enforced, since the rupture with Mr. Monro, that discipline which ought to be maintained in the Police Force. It is not in accordance with the practice of Public Departments that the officials of a Department should be allowed to meet, in the circumstances attending the police meetings, for the purpose of bringing pressure to bear upon their chief. In the Times I have seen the remarkable statement that if it had not been for Mr. Monro the sergeants, inspectors, and superintendents would have continued as heretofore to keep aloof from the agitation of the ranks. I hold it to be the duty of the right hon. Gentleman to see not only that pressure is not brought to bear on him or on the public generally, but that it is not brought to bear on Members of Parliament in the discharge of their functions.

*(8.18.) MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I rise to support the contention that the control of the police should be handed over to the local County Councils, and of the Metropolitan Police to the London County Council, and I would support that by referring to my experience in the City of Manchester. The control of the police there is in the hands of the Local Council and their able Chief Constable, Mr. Malcolm Wood. There is not the slightest fear there of any procession or public demonstration taking an objectionable form. I am afraid we cannot say the same thing of London, having regard to the questions which have been raised in the matter of using Trafalgar Square for meetings, and the breaking up by the police of various demonstrations; and we all know that the period of office of a Chief Commissioner for the past few years has not been longer than two years. It is singular to note what a different state of things prevails in our large provincial towns. In Manchester, on the occasion of the meetings of the unemployed recently, many of the people came from a distance outside the town, and they desired to assemble in the principal square of the city. That, however, would have been inconvenient, seeing that the square was traversed by tram lines, so the police opened their own large yard to the people who held their meetings there, and there made their protests and demanded their rights. At these meetings reporters of the local papers were present, which gave publicity to their complaints. The result was that after a couple of meetings they satisfied their minds, they cleared their breasts from "perilous stuff," and became content to let matters take their ordinary course. I think it is advisable that the police should be under the direction of the London Municipal Bodies. We know that the London County Council has shown marked ability in the administration of affairs for the last two years, and I think it most advisable that the control of the Metropolitan Police should be confided to them.

(8.21.) MR. G. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I should like the Committee to bear in mind that very recently a Bill was carried through this House, mostly by the pressure of hon. Gentleman opposite, for the enfranchisement of the police. Yet, in the face of that, we are told they are not to meet to discuss their grievances. To my mind, it is an absolute farce to give men the right of voting and to deny them the right of free discussion. It seems to me they had a right to meet and discuss the provisions of a Bill that will affect their future prospects, and to make known through their officers their objections to it. In saying this I am not at all supporting the idea of the police officers of the Metropolis binding themselves together at public meetings under leaders who may lead them to destruction. That is, however, a very different thing from being permitted to discuss the provisions of the Bill. I think no provision that may be made for superannuation will make up for the smallness of the pay given to the Metropolitan Police. Hon. Members on both sides have been very profuse in their acknowledgments of the services rendered by the police officers of the Metropolis to the public. I would also bear testimony to the same effect if there was any need for my doing so. It seems to me, however, to be an absolute farce to talk about the way in which these men perform their duty, and, at the same time, to give them a miserable pittance which is scarcely up to the level of what a day labourer would have. I would make superannuation something contingent upon good behaviour, length of service, and things of that kind. I think a man should have sufficient pay, and that it should be his duty to save out of his earnings sufficient to keep him in old age. There might be exceptions to this; but, speaking as a general rule, I do not believe in superannuation allowances. I believe in paying a man a fair day's wage for a fair day's work, and I think that will prove, in the long run, to be better than the superannuation system. I do not wish to say anything with regard to the gentleman who I presume has been appointed to the post of Chief Commissioner, but I am afraid we are going to make the same mistake as we have been making over and over again by appointing a military man Governor of a civil force. That has been the cause of the collisions in this Metropolis between the police and the people, and the people and the Home Office, for many years past. We do not want our Police Force to be under military regulation. It is not by any means a military force, and it will be a bad day for England, and for this Metropolis particularly, when, if ever, it is made into anything like a military force. If the Home Office wants a military command in the Metropolis, it should hand over the command of the police to the Horse Guards or the War Office. I want to see collisions between the police and the people avoided; and I think they can only be avoided in two ways, first of all, by getting rid absolutely of the military element, and, secondly, by handing over the control of the police to the proper local authority, namely the County Council. (8.29.)

(9.0.) CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.), rose—

(9.0.) Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

* (9.3.) CAPTAIN VERNEY: I cannot join in the general chorus in praise of the police, and indeed I venture to think that the police have very decidedly deteriorated of late years. Since I was elected a member of the County Council, I have taken some trouble in going about to different parts of London, to specially note the attitude of the police, and I will venture to say that, during the last 10 years or more, since I have known the police, their conduct in remote parts of London has not been civil and courteous to the public at large. Many instances of this have come under my personal observation. I know nothing is to be gained by quoting individual cases, but I give the Committee my distinct impression which may be accepted for what it is worth. As to myself, wherever I am known, I am treated with the greatest respect and attention by the police; but the police should not discharge their duties as the servants of the few who are known in public life, but they should remember they are the servants of the public at large, and in that sense I do not think that the conduct of the police is satisfactory. I had the grief and sorrow of seeing from a very safe place the conduct of the police on the day of the Trafalgar Square riots, and it was sad to witness. I am not going to apportion the blame to the processionists or to the police, but I do not think such a thing had been seen in London before, or in any of our large towns, within living memory. I do not think there is a parallel case of the police, who are the servants of the public, attacking the people, not merely in pursuance of orders preventing the people from passing, but breaking away from their position to attack members of the procession, smashing band instruments, and destroying flags. These proceedings I saw with my own eyes, and I do not think the people of London, after such proceedings, can ever regard the police as they did before, a feeling was then excited, which is to be lamented as a misfortune. It is my opinion, then, that the police of London have of late years not improved, but deteriorated in general attitude and tone towards the general population of London, and I wish to add a word or two as to the control of the Metropolitan Police. I am quite sure that the noble Marquess (Lord Carnarthen), the Member for Brixton, has not a chance of being returned as Member for that constituency again unless he is in favour of police control being placed in the hands of the County Council. This is only my opinion, but it is founded upon my knowledge of what the feeling in that constituency is as its representative in the London County Council. I know that there is the strongest feeling there in this direction among Liberals and Conservatives alike. Something has been said about the police not being in a proper state of discipline, and I think the Committee will see that while there is a doubt in the minds of the police as to who their masters are, and are likely to be, this in itself tends much to shake the discipline of the force; but now that Members on the Front Opposition Bench have declared in favour of County Council control, no doubt this must have an effect on the minds of the police. I can speak from experience as to the change in two counties where I happen to be a Magistrate. In Anglesey there has been a very marked change in the attitude of the police since control has been transferred to the Joint Committee, since the County Council have had a voice in the government. I have no doubt the Government know perfectly well that they cannot, that they dare not, employ the police in Wales to enforce the collection of tithes. The County Councils would not allow it, and it cannot possibly be done. You may pass what Bills you like, you may make what arrangements you please, you may send troops, but you cannot employ the police to collect tithes, because the County Councils will not have it done. The attitude of the police in Anglesey is the attitude of servants of the public, and that is the difference between provincial police and the London Police. Anybody who has anything to do with the police in Anglesey will find them acting as the respected and trusted servants of the public; but that is not, I am sorry to say, the attitude of the police in London. There is a feeling among the population of London that the police are trying to be their masters, and undoubtedly there is a sort of affectation of superiority of position about the police that is to be deplored. I regret the change in the police uniform, which abolished the old form of the civilian hat they used to wear, which was a symbol of the civilian character of the Force, that though charged with special duties they are not our masters, but our servants and assistants. I sometimes sit on the Magisterial Bench in Buckingham. We have there a very Tory County Council and Joint Committee, and more than once in public from the Bench I have had to complain of the attitude of the police towards witnesses and prisoners in Court, an arrogant and overbearing demeanour, inconsistent with their official position, and which ought not to be tolerated. I have no doubt at all that the London County Council will before long have the control of the police. I do not think there can be any doubt of that after the expression of opinion from the Front Bench on this side, and when that change comes I anticipate there will be no difficulties with the police, but perfectly harmonious action. From no county in England and Wales have there been complaints of the efficacy of the police since control passed to the Joint Committees, and I do not think there is any reason to complain of the Watch Committee in any borough. I look forward, then, to the perfect efficiency of the police, harmony of action, and absence of friction under the control of the London County Council in preserving peace and order in the streets of the Metropolis.

*(9.12.) MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I wish I had had the opportunity of speaking more immediately after the statement of the Home Secretary. I listened very attentively to what the right hon. Gentleman said, and, if he will allow me to say so, I admired his fine forensic effort, while I congratulated myself to some extent that I was not one of a jury to be influenced by what he will excuse me for calling the special pleading with which he favoured us. This question we are now discussing, and which I, for one, regret, should occupy the attention of an Imperial Parliament holding the view which has generally been expressed on this side that it is a matter for the London Local Authority. This matter we are now discussing is not merely one of the quarrels and dissensions between the Home Secretary and his various Chief Commissioners. I am not greatly concerned, however many of the latter resign, nor should I be very much concerned if the right hon. Gentleman himself resigned. I frankly add that I should not entertain greater anxiety or cherish greater hope in regard to any right hon. Gentleman from this side of the House who might succeed the right hon. Gentleman in the office if all went well. These are matters of little importance beside the grave importance of the fact that discontent exists among the force responsible for the peace and safety of the Metropolis. Now, the Home Secretary—and I am bound to say he did it admirably well—tried to minimise this feeling among the police, and, to some extent, he succeeded in diverting the attention of some Members of the Committee—not of all, I am glad to say, who have taken part in this discussion. The right hon. Gentleman has deprecated and denied statements founded upon reports in the newspapers, and wishes us to believe, in fact, that the agitation we hear about is manufactured by newspapers. Now, we know that newspapers—or some of them—when short of “copy” especially, are apt to insert matter that does not stand the test of close examination; but I can hardly believe it possible, when we read reports in all sorts of newspapers of every political complexion, newspapers differing in tone, such as the Standard, Daily News, Telegraph, and Globe, and when we find everyone of these newspapers, most of which, I presume, are fairly independent, has a full and succinct account of proceedings at meetings which have taken place among members of the Police Force in reference to their grievances, and the dismissal of Mr. Monro, I cannot but think that the Home Secretary “doth protest too much” when he tries to make us believe that these troubles are manufactured by the newspaper. I find in the Globe, which is considered to be a Conservative newspaper, a full report of a meeting which took place last night. Now, no one can accuse the Globe of being an exceedingly revolutionary newspaper; it does not, so far as I am aware, suggest the abolition of the bourgeois in five and twenty minutes, or to nationalise our means of production; it is a newspaper, I suppose, whose reports may fairly be relied upon. I find in the Globe’s report of yesterday’s meeting that 160 constables drove to the meeting in vans, and that they were addressed by various speakers. I am well aware that some of these speakers are members of the “Social Democratic Federation,” a body with which I am in no way connected, but I suppose they have as good a right to address a police meeting as any other persons, though I find the meeting was not only addressed by members of the “Social Democratic Federation,” but by other gentlemen of position, and by members of the force; that they discussed questions at some length; and that after the meeting was over 40 or 50 policemen went away cheering for the “Policeman’s Union,” and expressing great dissatisfaction with the conduct of the Home Office officials. Let me show what it was this meeting of policemen demanded yesterday. A resolution was carried as follows:—

“That this meeting of constables of Metropolitan Police demand—(1) That an increase of pay of 3s. per week be given to each class. (2) That each man be entitled to advancement in class at two and five years’ service. (3) That one day’s leave per week be granted. (4) That police court time and extra duty be allowed in full. (5) That P.C.’s be entitled to 10 days’ leave annually. (6) That one-third of pay be the minimum of pension on completion of 15 years’ service, increasing proportionately to two-thirds of pay after 24 years’ service. (7) That each man be entitled to claim his superannuation on completion of 24 years’ service.”

I will not enter upon details which will be far more properly discussed upon the Police Superannuation Bill; but what I wish to point out, and what I wish to bring before the attention of the Committee, is the fact that the condition of the present relations between the Police Force and the Home Office is such as to create grave danger to the safety of the Metropolis. It is absolutely, I think, a matter that admits of no argument at all, that you have a large body of some 14,000 or 15,000 men upon whom the onerous duty is laid of protecting persons and property in the Metropolis day after day and night after night; it is absolutely impossible they can exercise that duty properly if they are in a state of what I must characterise as semi-revolt against the authorities. I wish the Home Secretary clearly to understand that dissatisfaction in this instance, so far as I am aware, has not been promoted by agitators. I know that the right hon. Gentleman entertains a distrust of agitators, and that, founded or unfounded, that feeling of distrust exists in the country; but, arguing from the existence of this distrust, the case is much stronger when I assert, and the right hon. Gentleman cannot contradict the assertion that there has been no intervention of agitators to account for the strained relations of the police and their superior office to the Home Office control. If, therefore, this dissatisfaction arises from among the Police Force itself, it seems clear to me that either the Home Office has not sufficient time or opportunity to exercise due supervision over such an important body as the Metropolitan Police Force such as should be exercised; or that the just claims of the force have been ignored. I am not going exactly to uphold Mr. Monro against the Home Secretary for the very cogent reason mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury that we have not the correspondence in our hands which would enable us to take a full view of the case. I am not one of those who think that in all cases the Chief Commissioner should be backed against the Home Secretary. Bad as I think the system is which places the supervision of the London Police Force in the hands of the Home Secretary, I think that a state of things which placed absolute power in the hands of a Chief Commissioner without due supervision of the Home Secretary, and therefore the influence which debate in Parliament exercises, would be absolutely untenable, and no sensible man can for a moment contemplate it with equanimity. On this occasion, and in reference to police control, I do not entirely take the side with Mr. Monro or against him, but I do lament that in the choice of Mr. Monro's successor a most unfortunate selection should have been made of a gentleman half of whose record is a military one. We have been told by hon. Gentlemen on the other side that he has been most diligent and successful in the detection of Thuggee and dacoity; but these are crimes which, if I am well informed, are not very prevalent in this Metropolis. Further, I understand this gentleman was for a long time Resident in Rajpootana. Now, the Rajpoots are, ethnologically, a highly interesting race of the highest caste in India, though I wish to do others no injustice. But what are the functions of a Resident in Rajpootana? In this State, I believe, there is an admirable art school. There may be found large quantities of elephants, and I believe some very skilful Nautch girls. Upon these and other matters a resident may form his judgment, and has to make representations to the Sultan of the country; and I believe this particular gentleman—whose name for the moment has escaped me, but which I daresay in future I may remember accurately—has had vast experience in matters that appertain to Court life in Rajpootana; but I utterly fail to see how such experience gives him qualifications for such different and delicate duties as are involved in the position of Chief Commissioner of Metropolitan Police. It has been urged by hon. Members on this side, and notably by one who holds the position of County Councillor, that the only way out of these difficulties—difficulties that appear to be arising perpetually, if we may judge by the short tenures of office by Chief Commissioners—can be obviated by transferring control to a popularly-elected body, the County Council; and various Members have referred to the good effect that has accrued in provincial towns where recourse has been had to such a system. But hon. Members have forgotten one especial fact in this connection, that when there was an election of County Councils, some 18 months ago, it was made a test question in many cases, invariably, I believe, in the case of Progressive members, that they should pledge themselves to the principle of control of the police by County Councils. ["No."] I am not sure whether the test was not applied by electors who voted for Conservative members—["No."]—but I think upon County Councils Conservative members are in as decided a minority as they are in a majority in this House. But let that pass. If the ratepayers of London are really averse to the control of the police being placed in the hands of the County Council, as an hon. Gentleman opposite says they are, how does it come about that in so many instances elections were determined upon this question? Surely, it will not be urged for a moment by any hon. Member that the electors and ratepayers of London are so foolish, so blind to their own interest, that they would absolutely vote for power being placed in the hands of a body they look on with feelings of distrust? It is because they see these strained relations, the existence of which the Home Secretary cannot deny, between the Home Office and Scotland Yard, that the vast majority of London ratepayers are so set upon having the control of the Police Force, which costs £1,700,000 annually. A word upon what has been said as to the altered relations between police and people in London. I know that to the great majority of Members of this House it is not of very much importance whether the Police Force arrogates to itself more power or remains in the position it has hitherto occupied. Most of us, fortunately—I am myself an exception—do not habitually come into collision with the police. I do not mean to say I do so habitually—but most of us do not often come into contact with the police, their functions, so far as we are concerned, being limited to opening cab doors and attentions of that kind. But with the vast bulk of the poorer population of London the case is different. Police supervision and police interference can make their lives intolerable to them. I appeal to any hon. Member who has knowledge of the labouring classes in London whether there is not grievous complaint of the interference in the daily life of the poorer population which is gradually being arrogated to itself by the Police Force. For these reasons I view with exceeding regret the appointment of another military gentleman to the office. From a Constitutional point of view I do sincerely regret the introduction of the military system into what has always been a civil force. I foresee that if military discipline and system is introduced into the Police Force, the scenes of riot and disorder, and the strained relations between the Home Office and Scotland Yard, which have existed for three or four years, will become intensified, and the time of Parliament, which should be devoted to subjects vastly more important, will be taken up more and more every Session with the discussion of questions which should be dealt with by the London County Council.

(9.32.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I shall not express any opinion as to the newly-appointed Chief Commissioner, as I should prefer first to see how he fills the office. And, with regard to the issue raised between the Home Secretary and Mr. Monro, as I have only read the letter of Mr. Monro and heard the speech of the Home Secretary, I feel I have not got sufficient data on which to pronounce an absolute opinion, but, with such data as I have, I am inclined to believe that the Home Secretary is right in regard to the matter of the resignation of Mr. Monro. A question seems to have arisen with regard to police superannuation. But the Home Secretary is the Representative of Parliamentary control with reference to the police, and I hold that it is most essential that the Home Secretary should have this control so long as the police depend upon Parliament, and not upon the County Council. The question which arose was as to the amount to be granted to the police. I never yet heard of value attaching to the opinion of those who are to receive pensions. Of course, the Commissioner and the police, being themselves interested in the question of superannuation, would naturally take a very favourable view of the matter in discussing it; but what happened? The Home Secretary prepared a Bill and showed it to Mr. Monro, who objected to it, and said that if the Bill was not altered he should resign, and because the right hon. Gentleman did not make the alterations which were demanded Mr. Monro did resign. Now, I do not recognise that sort of thing as the duty or the right of the Chief Superintendent or Commissioner. If the Bill is a bad Bill, it is for this House to criticise and discuss it, when the Bill is brought in. The Home Secretary in the discussion would have stated whether the police approved of the Bill or not, but for the Commissioner to menace, I may say, the Home Secretary with his resignation is contrary entirely to my idea of the subordination that the Commissioner ought to observe to the Representative of Parliamentary control. This Police Force is a positive army. What, I should like to know, would be the state of things in the Army itself were the House to set up the Commander-in-Chief against the Secretary of State for War? Of course, we should support the Secretary for War. I put aside politics altogether, and I say that so far as I know the details of the dispute, the Home Secretary is in the right, and his power should be upheld so long as Parliamentary control remains. Until the police are placed under the control of the County Council, I shall always act upon that principle. I think that Chief Commissioners are very much inclined to take too much upon themselves. Were they in the House it would be different, but now, in police matters, the House has to complain not to the Chief Commissioner, but to the Home Secretary, who has to bring in Bills affecting the police. Unless we act on this principle there will be an end to all Parliamentary control, and we shall have the police becoming a sort of Prætorian Guard, and the Commissioner a sort of Prætorian Prefect, completely dominating this House and the whole Legislature. I think it the duty of all who share these opinions to back up the Home Secretary in his action; otherwise there will be an end of all Parliamentary control. I now come to another point. I find that the Commissioner's salary is £1,500 a year, and I doubt whether it would not be wise, seeing the position that official holds, the duties he has to discharge, and the large force of men he has to command, to grant a larger salary. But I have heard that Mr. Monro received £1,000 a year from the Secret Service Fund. Does the right hon. Gentleman who shakes his head positively say that Mr. Monro received no money from that fund? As I understand, Mr. Anderson did receive a considerable sum from that source for looking after detective business in America in regard to Irishmen, but this has been discontinued since he became Assistant Commissioner, and the duties have since been undertaken and the money received by Mr. Monro. This is most objectionable, if correct, and we ought to know exactly what the salary of the Commissioner is.

*MR. MATTHEWS: The Commissioner receives nothing but what appears on the Estimates. He has an Indian pension.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will go a step further, and inform us who is now at the head of this detective business in America?

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! That hardly arises on the Vote.

MR. LABOUCHERE: There are Assistant Commissioners. I want to know whether any of the Assistant Commissioners receive anything from the Secret Service money?

*MR. MATTHEWS: No person down on the Estimates for a salary receives anything in addition to that salary.

MR. LABOUCHERE: That is an answer; but I should like to know the relations of the police of Scotland Yard with the police and others in America.

There was a discussion in this House some time ago about the position of Mr. Hoare, our Consul in New York. It was shown that Mr. Hoare had had communications from England in regard to police matters, and that he took up a position as a sort of head of the Detective Department in the United States. I believe I am right in saying that that business has been handed over to Mr. Fraser, Vice Consul, and I think we ought to be informed—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I do not see how that is relevant to this Vote. It might be raised on the Vote for the Home Secretary's salary.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Well, I will drop that point; but there is another in which I confess I am myself a little interested. There is a policeman of the name of Jarvis, who has brought an action against me for saying he was at a certain place at a certain time in America. Now, I want to know from the Home Secretary whether Jarvis is to pay for this or the police? I do not object to the police paying; but if I win my case, and Jarvis cannot pay, I want to know whether the Home Secretary, or someone in his Department, will pay the expenses? I do not know whether or not Jarvis has been put forward without any money against me; but I know that the action may cost me £1,000 or £2,000, and I want to know, if I win my case, to whom I am to look for my expenses. If Jarvis is being supplied with funds by the police I think the Home Secretary will admit that if I win I ought to have my expenses from those who are supplying him. As Jarvis's salary is included in this Estimate, this is the time to raise the question.

*MR. MATTHEWS: No; it is not included.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I think it is included in this Estimate.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. LABOUCHERE: As I have exhausted my criticisms, I may as well sit down.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order. There is no salary in the Vote beyond that of the Commissioner and Assistant Commissioners.

*(9.42.) MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I am sure all hon. Members will agree with me that these frequent acrimonious discussions with regard to the London Police are not only most distasteful to those who take part in them but most injurious to the well-being of the police and of the people of London. It is not that the people and the police cannot get on well together, but it is the abominable system which exists that causes the trouble. Now that we have a London County Council, we say that the police should be placed under its control, in the same way as the Municipal Bodies in other cities and towns have control over their police. The people of London have made up their minds that they will no longer allow their police to be controlled by the Home Secretary, be he Liberal or be he Conservative. With regard to Mr. Monro's resignation, the hon. Member for Northampton seems to be in possession of more information than we have got. We have only the statement of the Home Secretary.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I specifically said I knew nothing beyond the letter of Mr. Monro, and the statement of the Home Secretary.

*MR. CAUSTON: Then we are all in the same position. Whether the Home Secretary be right or wrong, I desire to say that the present system is bad, and we want to see it altered. That system brings hard and distasteful work to the police; it brings the Home Secretary into disrepute; and there is no doubt that the ill-feeling between the police and the people will also bring about what we think is an unnecessary demand for an increase of the London Police Force. The only remedy is to place the police under the control of the London County Council. I quite admit there may be a necessity for a Government Imperial police. If the Government want a force for the protection of the Public Offices by all means have one, but do not let us have a police dictatorship in London. Place the London police under the control of the London County Council, and you will establish good-will between the police and the people, and ease the labours of the Home Secretary. Of course, we cannot now discuss the details of the Superannuation Bill. The police render special services, and should be specially treated; they look after our property and our lives; they give themselves up to their work almost in the same way that the clergy devote themselves to looking after our souls. Superannuation, no doubt, attracts respectable men to the Force; but if in the Bill you are going to take away with one hand what you give with the other, you will do no good. What you want is a contented police, and if you have that you have a trustworthy and reliable force. I cannot understand why the Metropolitan Police should not be as well paid as the City Police. It is absurd to say that the Metropolitan Police could not be controlled by the London County Council, for the City Corporation manages its own force. In the City you have most valuable property requiring protection, and you never hear of the City Police being inefficient or discontented. I do hope that in the interests of the Home Office, for the sake of the peace of mind of the Home Secretary, in the interests of the welfare of the people of London as well as of the police generally, this short-sighted policy in regard to the management of the police will be abandoned.

(9.52.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): I should be glad to have an explanation of the item of £650 for the travelling expenses of Inspectors.

(9.53.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I desire to ask an explanation of the item of £48,000 for clothing and other expenses of constables employed in the protection of public buildings and on other special duties. I have reason to believe that the special duty of some of these gentlemen was to go to Colorado in the interests of the Times before the Special Commission, and while pretending to be on holiday engage themselves in finding out a large number of mares' nests. We know it has been denied, but we know also that the denials were false, for we had men there as well as Her Majesty's Government. Differing from some of my hon. Friends, I was delighted when I heard of Mr. Monro's resignation. The more these permanent officials are put down the better. Mr. Monro made himself specially offensive to Irish Members. His conduct in connection with the Select Committee in regard to the hon. Member for North Louth was abominable. Therefore, the moment I heard that Mr. Monro had resigned I was greatly delighted. It is always a good thing to get rid of the last man. As to the alleged payment of secret service money to the Chief Commissioner, I think we ought to know more on this matter. We know how it once transpired—although it had been denied—that a sum of £10,000 had been used in securing Parliamentary candidates. We are also aware that when there is a change of Government these things are sure to leak out, and we should like to know where it is the Chief Commissioner gets his perquisites from, if not from the Secret Service Fund. If he receives anything in addition to his salary it should appear on the Estimates. I agree that the salary attached to the office ought to be raised. I heard with some surprise the statement the other night that the Force was to be increased by 1,000 men. When the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby increased the Force at the time of one of the explosions which occurred, I believe, on the day of the Oxford and Cambridge Boat Race, the right hon. Gentleman said that if the people of London wished the police to be specially engaged for their protection when they were out enjoying themselves they would have to pay for it, and it would be necessary to add to the Force. It was proposed to strengthen the Force on a former occasion, solely on account of the presence of dynamitards in the Metropolis. But the right hon. Gentleman is proposing an increase at a time when practically there is no crisis and no kind of disturbance. This second addition will make an increase of 2,000 since five or six years ago, when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby was the Home Secretary. Of course, if the men are over-worked, and have been kept on duty too long hours, it is quite right that an increase should be made. Still, I think the Government make an increase in circumstances which require very much more explanation than is afforded by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. This advance in the number of the police is really effected in a backstairs sort of manner, so that the cost may not come on the Estimates. I do not know how these things are arranged in London, but I gather that there is no check whatever on the right hon. Gentleman, or on the number of men who are to compose the Force. I deprecate the observation of my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton with reference to setting up a Force in London, which is to be treated as a sort of Prætorian Guard. That expression was used by the Royal Irish Constabulary when they struck in 1882. Allow me to say that the two bodies are very different. The police of London, like the police of Dublin, are of a pacific temperament, and are not supplied with bayonets and rifles, and powder and ball. They live amongst a civil population, and do not segregate in barracks. They are not subject to that close military discipline which prevails in the Irish Constabulary, and I do not believe that there is the slightest desire on the part of the London police in any way to set themselves up as against the civil population. Having lived now for a long time in London, I may say that a more respectful body of men I do not believe ever had control of the streets of any Metropolis in the world. They are civil to a fault. It is not as if they knew you. Of course, coming about this House, one may expect extra attention. But wherever you go the police of the Metropolis are universally, extremely, and consistently polite and courteous in their duty. That shows the advantage of having a domestic Police Force, uncontrolled by stringent military discipline, which prevails in the Royal Irish Constabulary. I think it would be a very unfortunate thing if any excitement were allowed to grow up among the constabulary in London, or if they were induced to combine in a hostile sense against Her Majesty's Government, because if, instead of moderate agitation, they were to take hostile means for the redress of their grievances, I believe they would only set the general body of the population against them, and the general body of the population is now largely in sympathy with them, and most anxious for the redress of their grievances. I believe that if the Government can at all manage to see their way to meet the just and fair demands of the men, the people of London, and the Members of this House, so far as the Estimates can be laid before them, would be prepared to go a long way in soothing down and dissipating the grievances and irritation of these men. I deprecate the suggestion of any attempt whatever to set up a Prætorian Guard.

*(10.6.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT

(Mr. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam):

The hon. Member has asked a question with regard to an item of £625 which appears on these Estimates as travelling expenses of Her Majesty's Inspector of Constabulary. I can assure the hon. Member for Leicester that these expenses have nothing to do with journeys to America. They are the expenses of the officers whose duty it used to be, before the Local Government Act, to satisfy the Home Secretary of the efficiency, not of the Metropolitan Force, but of the provincial force; and whose duty it is since the Local Government Act, to afford information upon which can be given the certificate that is required before contributions can be made to the Local Police Authorities from the Imperial taxation, which has been transferred to local purposes. The performance of that duty involves journeys to every county and every police borough in England and Wales. The hon. Member for East Finsbury (Mr. Rowlands) inquired why the Report of the Department Committee upon superannuation had not been produced. I do not know whether he was in the House when the Home Secretary spoke. If he was he must have noticed that the Home Secretary distinctly said that the Departmental Committee separated without making any Report, on the ground that Mr. Monro, most unhappily for the interests of the police and their administration generally, thought it his duty to separate himself from the deliberations of that Committee. As regards the Annual Report of the Chief Commissioner, which some hon. Members say ought to be issued at an earlier period of the year, in order that the House may have it in its hands when the Police Vote comes before it, I can assure him that I heartily sympathise with him in that desire. But the Commissioner of Police is most heavily burdened with the most anxious duties, and it is found in practice—I could quote precedents for many years back—that the Annual

Mr. T. M. Healy

Report never can be brought out much before the month of August or September. It is true, I believe, that on one occasion it was got out, but the Police Vote was taken at a very late date. Since the disappearance of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, the Debate has somewhat quitted the lines on which he sought to launch it. I had no doubt as to the result, and I felt sure that the very general concurrence which has been expressed in all parts of the House as to the conduct of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary with regard to the unhappy differences which have arisen, would be endorsed and approved by the great majority of this House. The Debate has since proceeded on the familiar lines of a discussion of the Utopian idea of municipal control of the Metropolitan Police. I have always noticed up to the present evening that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby has been most careful to guard himself against anything like an approval of the municipal control of the London Police as against Imperial control. But on this occasion he has selected, if I may say so, the body of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary to make a bridge whereby he may cross from one country to the other, deserting all the opinions gained in the hard experience of office, that he may travel in a more convenient and pleasant land, in which he can gain electoral support. For my part, I maintain that this House, 80 of whose Members are elected by constituencies in the Metropolitan Police area, while the other 590, by the very condition of their holding seats in this House, are residents in that area, is the most effective Watch Committee we could have, accustomed as it is to investigate questions of far larger importance and financial difficulty than are those connected with the Metropolitan Police Force. Not only that, but I maintain that there is quicker responsibility and sensitiveness to public opinion under the present conditions of control of the police than there would be were they controlled by the County Council, whose debates do not attract the attention nor involve the tremendous political consequences which attach to debates in this House on acts of the Executive. We have heard to-day of the discontent which is supposed to reign in the Metropolitan Police Force. I have watched the government of that Force for four years, and having had relations with the Superior Staff, which I should always have been glad to have, I am bound to say that I am very sceptical about the reports of general and widespread dissatisfaction in the London police. There is not the smallest doubt that there has been a great deal of cooked up appearance of it in the newspapers; the number of the meetings has been exaggerated, and I am not quite sure that there have not been reports of meetings which have never taken place. Sir, I think better of the Metropolitan police than to suppose they would engage in anything like the kind of agitation in combination with outsiders in which they have been represented in some prints as being engaged. I feel certain that, when reasonable discussion is allowed of their claim on the one hand, and of the efforts which are being made to satisfy them on the other, in the end we shall arrive at a just and satisfactory settlement of the claims of the police, with due regard to the interests of the ratepayers of London. I wish, Sir, that hon. Members had been inclined to let this subject alone. They come here, and with a light heart ask us to grant certain demands for additional pay and allowances for the police. I must say I feel inclined to ask them whether they have gone into the question at all of the additional burdens on the ratepayers? I believe were we to seriously entertain the demands of hon. Members the cost would involve a burden upon the ratepayers, much greater than the bulk of them are prepared to bear. I have said what I have with a full sense of the value of the services of the police. Let it not be supposed that we do not recognise the good temper with which the police discharge their duties in all sorts of difficult circumstances in all hours, and in circumstances of hardship and exposure. At the same time, Sir, every proposal of this kind must be examined not under the circumstances of political and electioneering pressure, but in the cool atmosphere of a strict examination of the financial consequences of the proposals that may be made. I hope, Sir, after this discussion the Committee may possibly be disposed to allow us to take this Vote, which, I can answer, will not be taken as giving the Government any encouragement or commission to deal otherwise than fairly with a Force which has immense claims upon the gratitude of the people, and as regards which I do not believe the statements that are made by certain gentlemen who sit in certain quarters of this House and represent them as being out of harmony with the people amongst whom they live.

*(10.20.) MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): Perhaps I may, as a Metropolitan Member, be allowed to say a few words in reply to what has fallen from the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Home Department. He says we have been engaged in a philosophical discussion, but whether that be so or not, one result of the Debate has been that it has brought the question of the control of the Metropolitan Police, by the London County Council more than ever within the range of practical politics. One of the arguments by which the case brought forward by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby has been met, is that the House has been engaged in considering an ideal and Utopian system of a municipal control over the London Police. That I suppose means that the municipal control of the police, which answers so well in the great provincial towns, is ideal; and, at any rate, if it be ideal there the idea is one which might well be extended to the Metropolis. We object to these local Metropolitan questions occupying the time and attention of the House to the exclusion of the great Imperial questions with which it has to deal. We do not believe they can be properly discussed and decided in this House, and we think that they ought to be handed over to the representatives of the ratepayers in the County Council by whom they will receive proper consideration. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Home Department has said that 80 Members of this House who represent Metropolitan constituencies are resident in the Metropolis, have so strong an interest in its affairs, and may be relied upon by the ratepayers for the efficiency with which they will guard the interests of the constituencies in this matter; but I would point out that by far the greater portion of the Metropolitan Members occupy seats on the other side of the House, and that with but one exception none of those 60 or 70 Conservative gentlemen have spoken on this question this evening, although it is one affecting the discipline and the whole position of the Metropolitan Police. I cannot blame hon. Members opposite for not having taken part in the Debate this evening as the time has only, with great difficulty, been wrested from other matters of importance, and no one desires that the discussion should be continued at any great length. Still it is unfortunate that we should be confined to one solitary evening in the entire Session for the discussion of the whole question of the Metropolitan police, and this fact is in itself proof sufficient that these questions do not receive that consideration from the representatives of the London constituencies which they ought to receive. These are matters which do not affect the House of Commons as much as they affect the ratepayers; and the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary is greatly hampered and controlled by Acts of Parliament in dealing with them. At the same time, the ratepayers, who have to pay by far the larger portion of the cost of the police, have no direct voice in the decision of these questions. I will not, at this hour, go into the general question. I will only say that I think the real gravamen of the charge we make against the Home Secretary is not so much that he exercised the final control—for we are all agreed that he ought to exercise full control over the Chief Commissioner so long as he is responsible for the Metropolitan Police in this House—as that these difficulties which have arisen ought never to have been allowed to get to such a head. We say that the right hon. Gentleman has shown now, as in former times, when we have had to discuss questions connected with his office in this House, that he is out of touch with the police and those having authority in that Force; and that he is unable sufficiently to control it, as is proved by the discontent which prevails among the men. The Under Secretary for the Home Department denies that there is discontent in the force. Nobody believes or wishes that that discontent should come to a serious crisis; but that there is a large amount of discontent I think few, in this House will deny. That discontent has, we say, arisen from the strained relations between the Home Office and the Police; and we cannot but attribute the fact to the action of the Home Secretary himself. We, on this side, are all agreed that the right hon. Gentleman might have handled the force with greater discretion and ability, and our experience of the way in which these questions have been handled in the past has shown us that he is altogether out of touch with the Force generally. This has brought us more and more to the belief that the only way in which the most important and vital questions relating to the Metropolitan Police can be properly discussed and decided is by placing that Force under the control of the Representative Council for London.

(10.27.) MR. PICTON: The Committee was strongly disposed to pass this vote at once when the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department rose to make his speech; but the hon. Gentleman has contrived to say several things which necessitate an answer, and so, therefore, to some extent, has prolonged this Debate. I do not think that the hon. Gentleman was justified in the attack he made upon the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, in his absence, and I must object to the sneering remark that since the right hon. Gentleman had left the House the discussion had taken a more proper and natural tone. The right hon. Gentleman was only doing his duty in bringing forward his case against the action of the Home Department. From his experience of the Department, and the high position he holds on the Front Opposition Bench, he was bound to bring before the Committee the profound uneasiness which exists in the public mind, and which has been occasioned by the friction which has subsisted between the Home Office and Scotland Yard, and, in fact, between the Home Office and the Police Force generally. I am, however, bound to say that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary made a very able and temperate and also a very successful defence; but this does not, in the least degree, condemn the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby for having brought forward the case he has advanced. If we have a case to bring forward but are never to raise it in this House unless we are infallibly certain that there is nothing to be said on the other side, there will practically be an end to all Debate. It is for us to state our case and hear what the other side has to say. If what is said on the other side is sound and satisfactory, we acknowledge it, but we are not to be blamed for stating our case as we receive it from the regular sources of information. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary went, I think, a little out of his way in casting scorn upon the idea of our committing the Metropolitan Police to the care of the County Council. He made use of this singular observation—that this House is the best “Watch Committee.” What does he mean by calling this House a Watch Committee? I suppose he knows what is usually meant by the Watch Committee of a Town Council? The Watch Committee is not the whole Council. It is a small body selected from among the members of the Council because of their special knowledge of the duties of the Municipal Police. They are personally acquainted with the Force and they know the needs of the different districts in their towns and boroughs, and generally are well qualified to carry out the functions devolving upon them. The idea of comparing this House, composed of Representatives of constituencies from John o’Groats to Land’s End, as well as from across the Irish Sea, with an ordinary Watch Committee of a Town Council is the very height of absurdity. Beyond this, the right hon. Gentleman passed a slight upon what he termed “the small political consequence of the London County Council.” What we say is, that it is precisely because of its non-political character that the London County Council is the body best fitted for the duty of undertaking the control and management of the Metropolitan Police. But then the right hon. Gentleman said this House was more sensitive to public opinion. I suppose he was thinking of the vote of last night. The London County Council is in direct and intimate touch with all parts of the Metropolis. Remarks have been made about the kindness and attention of the police, but there is something to be said on the other side. The men are good, but the system is thoroughly bad. In a force of 15,000 men, all cannot be perfect, and the system is likely at times to bring out the worst side of the character of the most arbitrary and passionate among them. The system leads them to believe that they are in many respects antagonistic to the democratic movements of the time. They are taught it is their business, as far as possible, to put down all open-air meetings. They think they are the opponents of extreme Radical opinions or Socialism, as the case may be, and their action at times, when there are great assemblies of the people, is likely to irritate rather than conciliate. The recent meeting in Hyde Park affords one illustration out of many of the irritating manner in which the police are often made to act. I say “made to act,” because I am quite sure that, under an ordinary Municipal Government, their own nature would lead them to do nothing of the kind. Those who attended the Hyde Park meeting could see that the police were made to interrupt it and to minimise the public demonstration of opinion as far as possible. It is continually my misfortune to have to walk home through the streets very late at night, and I cannot help noticing the action of the police. I have repeatedly seen police constables needlessly interfere with the harmless jollity of people who, perhaps, had had a little too much to drink, but who were good humoured enough if they were only let alone. I remember two police constables at the corner of Tottenham Court Road, seeing three young men coming along Oxford Street singing, and seizing them by the shoulders, and pushing them across the street until they nearly fell on their faces. Cases are continually reported in the newspapers of men being run in at police stations without any special reason whatever. Several cases have occurred in which Police Magistrates have said they could not decide on which side the blame lay, but they strongly suspected the action of the police. I do not say that these cases cast doubt on the general character of the police, but they illustrate my contention that the tendency of the system is rather to aggravate the worst features of the worst disposed men among them. The police ought to be a terror to evildoers, but not to ordinary citizens in the exercise of their ordinary rights. The police ought to be recognised everywhere as the friends of the people in all their legitimate enterprises. The present state of things has given rise to considerable friction and irritation between the police and the people of London, and I do not believe this will ever be cured until the police are put under the management of the London County Council.

*(10.36.) MR. GAINSFORD BRUCE (Finsbury, Holborn): I should not have risen to address the House but for the challenge of the hon. Member opposite. We are told that we have not attempted to answer the case that has been made against the Government. We on this side of the House are not in the habit of making unnecessary speeches, and we thought it was useless to answer remarks which, so far as they required an answer, have already been answered by some of the hon. Members sitting opposite. I agree with what has been already said, that the frequent and acrimonious discussion of matters of this kind does not tend to the public advantage, and it seems to me that no facts have been brought forward to justify the charges which have been made.

*MR. C. GRAHAM: Does the hon. and learned Member deny that there is dissatisfaction existing among the police?

*MR. G. BRUCE: Yes, I do deny it. I venture to think I know as much about the police than Gentlemen opposite. I have been in constant communication with them of late, and I deny absolutely that there is any dissatisfaction amounting to disloyalty among them. It is true that attempts have been made to stir up dissatisfaction among the police, but those attempts have failed. It is said on the other side of the House that the people of London want the control of the police made over to the London County Council. The people of London want nothing of the kind. The people of London think the London County

Mr. Picton

Council, as at present constituted, a most extravagant and inefficient body, utterly unable to confine its attention to its own business, and vainly meddling with the business of everybody else.

(10.40.) MR. NORRIS (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse): I came to the House prepared to blame the Home Secretary, but, after listening to the Debate, I think my right hon. Friend deserves to be praised and supported. I am not satisfied that there is sufficient discipline among the higher ranks at Scotland Yard. In these matters there can be no such thing as dual control; and if there has been any want of discipline, from Mr. Monro downwards, it is right that the Home Secretary should have put down his foot firmly. We are anxious that the superannuation allowances of the police should be ample, and even generous; but I think that hon. Gentlemen opposite would have been the first to complain of the Home Secretary if he had attempted to induce the House to accede to the suggestions of Mr. Monro. This is an occasion when, with every sympathy for the police, we must put confidence in the Home Secretary, and that confidence I hope hon. Members will show by their votes.

(10.44.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I think I am entitled to an answer to the two or three words I used earlier in the Debate.

(10.45.) MR. MATTHEWS: The hon. and learned Member wished to know whether Jarvis was paid out of the sum allotted for special duties. He has not been paid one penny out of that fund, nor has the sum of £1,000, or any sum whatever, been paid to Mr. Monro.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman has answered me in one way and not in another. I asked how it was that this man Jarvis was enabled to pay this visit to Colorado, and how it was that a certain journal in this country had a man placed at its disposition, when it was pretended that he was on his holiday. When this man got to New York he was detached from that place by the Consul there and sent to Colorado. It is all very well to say that this man gets nothing under this Vote, but we are entitled to complain of the system whereby officers can be employed in this manner. What was the man doing in America? Can it be pretended that an ordinary policeman could take a holiday in New York—a man who has only a salary of some 25s. a week? If this Vote is the only Vote in the Estimates for this purpose, it is singular that the expenses of police officers in occult and extraordinary duties can be screened, and that the House can have no check upon them. It is an undoubted fact that this man went to America in the service of the Times, and yet it seems there is no means of checking the amount of money paid. If it was necessary to send this man away would his expenses be paid out of the Secret Service Fund and not out of this Vote? This is an attempt to blind Parliament. We have two grounds of complaint in the fact that Jarvis was detached in the service of the Times, and that Mr. Monro compelled this unfortunate man by a threat of dismissal to bring the libel action against the hon. Member for Northampton. Now that Mr. Monro has gone, I suppose that Jarvis will drop this action, because I do not imagine that this gentleman from the Crimea will be very much interested in the dignity of Mr. Monro, or in the maintenance of the truth of his letter to the Times. Jarvis will now have some peace. Hitherto his life has been made miserable. He had to back up Mr. Monro and the Home Secretary, and was compelled to make a statement to the effect that he was never in America at all, or at all events, only in New York for a short time—these words having been put into the mouth of the Home Secretary by Mr. Monro. I wonder whether the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary has the same idea of the truth of Mr. Monro that he had, or whether he will receive that statement with some discount now that Mr. Monro has been compelled to resign. The Home Secretary made his statement to the House, I presume, on the authority of Mr. Monro; but did he attempt to probe the statement to the bottom? I would suggest that he should get this new General whom he is placing in charge of the Police Force to ask this question of Jarvis whether, as a matter of fact, he did make this journey to Del Norte? Mr. Monro now is in rather low water, but he has a following amongst a certain section of the police and the public, and I would point out to the Home Secretary that it would further discredit him to get his successor in office to question Jarvis and find out whether, as a matter of fact, he went further West than Mr. Monro informed the Home Secretary. In this way the right hon. Gentleman can go a long way in the direction of discrediting the general way in which Mr. Monro discharged his ordinary duties: Will the Home Secretary say distinctly whether Jarvis went to America on Scotland Yard business or for a holiday?

The CHAIRMAN rose to put the question.

(10.55.) MR. T. M. HEALY: If I receive no reply to my question, I shall move, Sir, that you report Progress.

(10.55.) MR. MATTHEWS: I have over and over again stated to the House that Jarvis did not go to Del Norte, Colorado. What is the use of asking me what fund he was paid from?

MR. T. M. HEALY: Did he go to New York?

MR. MATTHEWS: He was not paid out of this fund, and he did not go to Colorado. I have given the hon. Member the best information I can. I do not know why Jarvis went to New York. I should think he went on public business. The suggestion that he went on his holidays is a pure joke. It is as incorrect a statement as the rest of his version of this affair.

(10.57.) MR. T. M. HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman has affected a very fine anger, but I can assure him that, so far as I am concerned, I am completely indifferent to it. This is a matter which has been raised several times before the House by the hon. Member for Northampton and the Irish Members. The right hon. Gentleman suggests that I was joking when I asked if Jarvis had gone to New York on a holiday. I was doing nothing of the kind. The statement was put forward either by Jarvis or his official superiors. The right hon. Gentleman gets up to reply to me in a splendid frenzy; but let me tell him that if he wants to get his Vote it is not by frenzy that he will get it. The right hon. Gentleman says he does not know what Jarvis went to New York for; but the right hon. Gentleman ought to know. He was three times questioned about it by Metropolitan and other Members, and he ought to have taken the trouble to inform himself. He knew the Police Vote was coming on, and ought to have known that this question would arise. It will be raised again and again until the right hon. Gentleman finds out where Jarvis went to. The matter in relation to Jarvis's visit to Colorado was not made clear until after the Debate upon the Special Commission Report. The right hon. Gentleman must not suppose that the matter is going to be hushed up. If we cannot raise it on this Vote, we shall raise it on other Votes. There is one great distinguishing feature which we possess, and that is that when we start a question we thrash it out. I ask a specific question. Will the right hon. Gentleman put to Mr. Monro's successor the question addressed to himself as to the visit of Jarvis to Colorado?

MR. LABOUCHERE: I really think I must deprecate this discussion. Jarvis has brought an action, and the matter is before a Court of Law. Of course, I cannot express an opinion on the subject; but I believe I am in no way compromising Jarvis when I say I understand that, as a matter of fact, Jarvis was at the time in question on leave in America. At any rate, if a man brings an action he should have an opportunity of thrashing the question out in Court; it is hardly fair to Jarvis to prejudice the case by discussing it here. But there is a little matter of a personal nature in regard to which, perhaps, the Home Secretary will give me some information. It is, whether Jarvis is bringing this action with his own money, or using the public's money—my money as a taxpayer? I do not want to press hardly on this man. I dare say he is not well off, and I have not the slightest objection to the Government giving him money. But I protest against Jarvis being put forward in this case. I assume that I shall get a verdict, and that that verdict will carry costs. ["Oh, oh!"] Yes; it is an action for libel, and a verdict would carry costs. Well, I do not want the Government to give Jarvis money with which to bring an action against me, and then when I get my costs to be told that Jarvis has no money. It is only fair that if the Government provide Jarvis with money to bring the action, they should pay me my costs.

MR. MATTHEWS: The answer I gave to a question on this subject before was that Jarvis would bring the action at his own risk and cost. Perhaps the hon. Member for Longford will accept the reason given by the hon. Member for Northampton why I should not subject Jarvis to cross-examination. I have given the hon. Member all the information I can.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The fact that an action has been brought against the hon. Member for Northampton is no reason why information should be withheld from us. The Irish Members are entitled to have the information I ask for, irrespective of any action against a newspaper proprietor. In my opinion, this man was sent to America to do the Times business; and in order to mark my sense of the manner in which the man was sent out I beg to move the reduction of the Vote by £100.

Motion made, and Question, "That a sum, not exceeding £37,586, be granted for the said Service,"—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)—put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next.

Committee to sit again upon Monday next.

EDUCATION CODE (1890) [GRANT].

Resolution [June 13th] reported,

"That it is expedient to authorise an additional Special Grant, out of monies to be provided by Parliament, to certain Elementary Schools, in pursuance of any Act of the present Session for making operative certain Articles of the Education Code, 1890."

(11.15.) MR. PICTON: I do not see the Vice President of the Committee of the Council in his place, but I wish to urge upon the Government the point I raised in Committee, namely, the permanent stigma that is being cast on teachers who have not passed through a training college. These teachers only count for 50 scholars, while those who have passed through a training college count for 60 scholars. I have shown how very strong is the feeling amongst teachers of this class. I have shown the unreasonableness of setting up an arbitrary test of this kind in place of a practical test, and I think the point might be further considered. The only answer made by hon. Members opposite has been that if there is a deficiency of training college accommodation for Nonconformists, it is only for Nonconformists to put their hands in their pockets and build additional training colleges. That sounds very plausible; but hon. Members forget that Nonconformists have to put their hands in their pockets for a vast variety of objects which are already provided for members of the Established Church without any cost to themselves. Nonconformists have to build all their own places of worship and keep them up without any endowment provided for them by the State; and besides, the training colleges under the Church of England receive —

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is now discussing the Code. This is only a formal Resolution. The Education Code is down on the Paper later.

MR. PICTON: I understand this is a Resolution to make special provision for items of the Code. I shall object to this Report being received by the House, unless I have some assurance that this matter will be further considered. I do not ask for a promise that I shall get all I require; but I do want a promise that the matter will be re-considered. The teachers feel themselves aggrieved by this odious distinction.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is quite out of order. He will be able to discuss this question when the Code Bill is before the House. This is purely a financial matter.

MR. PICTON: Then my only resource is to move the adjournment of the Debate. In the hope that I may get some explanation or assurance as to the application of this money, I beg to move the adjournment of the Debate.

*MR. SPEAKER: It is unreasonable to move the adjournment of the Debate for the purpose of discussing a point that can only be discussed on the Code Bill, and, therefore, I hope the hon. Gentleman will not persevere with his Motion.

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, E.): I think we are entitled to know from the Vice President of the Committee of the Council what are the particular items for which this grant is asked.

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): This is purely formal. It is really to enable the House, later on in Committee, to provide the means for proposals in the Code Bill.

MR. T. M. HEALY: May I submit a question of order to you, Mr. Speaker? Let us take the case of the Budget Bill. That Bill goes through several stages. On the Budget Bill the different arrangements are discussed, with Mr. Courtney in the Chair. I presume this Resolution provides the ways and means by which the Bill can be worked. That being so, I would respectfully submit that on this Resolution it is in order to discuss the Code itself.

(11.22.) SIR W. HART DYKE: The necessity for the Resolution arises in this way. There is a proposal in the Code that certain grants shall be given for poor schools in rural districts, and this is the money clause.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I think my hon. Friend (Mr. Picton) is labouring under a misapprehension. This does not touch the training colleges at all.

MR. T. M. HEALY: For the sake of safeguarding the rights of Members, I beg to ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether it would not be in order to discuss the clause of the Bill to which this Resolution relates?

*MR. SPEAKER: No doubt it would be; but my observation was that this is not the Resolution on which the whole Bill is founded, but only a Resolution with regard to this particular clause.

Resolution agreed to.

BARRACKS (CONSOLIDATED) FUND.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the charge on, and issue out of, the Consolidated Fund of any deficiency which there may be in the moneys provided by Parliament for the payment of the principal and interest of any sums borrowed by the Treasury, under the provisions of any Act of the present Session for building and enlarging barracks and camps in the United Kingdom and in certain colonies.

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next.

INLAND REVENUE REGULATION (RE-COMMITTED) BILL.—(No. 211.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 to 10 agreed to.

Clause 11.

(11.27.) MR. PICKERSGILL: I have to move an Amendment on this clause. The 1st sub-section imposes a penalty on anyone who obstructs a Revenue Officer in the execution of his duty. To that I have no objection. The 2nd sub-section, however, provides that if on the hearing it is proved that a defendant has unlawfully committed an assault, he may be convicted of the assault, though the charge contained in the information may have broken down. I object very strongly to that provision, because it appears to me to violate an elementary principle of justice, inasmuch as it enacts that a man who is charged with one offence may be found guilty of another. I object mainly in the interest of poor men who may happen to be defendants. The case of the rich man, who comes into Court attended and protected by a cloud of counsel, is different. It appears to me that under this section a poor man, knowing, of course, nothing of the law, might be convicted of an offence to which his attention had never been called during the hearing, and which he might have means of disproving. In justice to the Government I ought, perhaps, to say that the Bill was submitted to a Committee, on which there were three very eminent lawyers from this side of the House. They apparently have allowed this curious innovation upon criminal practice to pass unchallenged. The hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) is one of those to whom I allude, and I am rather surprised that he allowed it to pass without challenge. It appears to me it is still more likely to produce injustice in Ireland than in England. Now, in the first place, I do not see why in a matter of criminal procedure an officer of a Government Department should be treated with special indulgence as compared with a private person, who, failing to secure one remedy, has to commence proceedings de novo. I do not see why there should be an exception for an official who has at command a lavish supply of the best professional advice. If an assault is committed, a conviction can be obtained under the 1st section of the clause, for it would by its nature be an obstruction if the officer was in execution of his duty. But if the officer was not in the execution of his duty, why should he be specially protected? I think it may lead to insolence and Jack-in-officeism not to be encouraged. There are precedents, it is said; and I admit that there may be in regard to indictable offences. For instance, in the case of a man indicted for embezzlement, if it turn out that the act does not in law amount to embezzlement but is really larceny, then the defendant can be convicted of larceny. But I want to point out this, that, in the case of an indictable offence, it is some act in connection with and part of the offence in its legal aspect; but under this section it may apply to some different act altogether which might be brought against the defendant, and he might be convicted of it. The words of the section run—

“If upon the hearing of the information it is proved that such person unlawfully committed an assault.”

Surely the hon. and learned Gentleman will agree that the words are very loose and slovenly. When? Upon whom? Under what circumstances? In what relation to the offence originally charged? Really, under these words, it appears to me, the defendant might be convicted if he committed an assault upon his wife long before. The hon. and learned Gentleman shakes his head, and I put an extreme case, but only to show how loose and slovenly is the language of the section. So far as words go, it would appear that if it could be shown a man had committed an assault long before then, under the words of the section, he might be convicted of that assault. Then there is a difficulty to which I invite the attention of the Solicitor General. Summary jurisdiction in respect to common assault depends on the complaint made by, or on behalf, of the person aggrieved, and dismissal or conviction is a bar to all other proceedings for a similar cause. Now, I want to put a question to the hon. and learned Gentleman. Will a conviction for a common assault under this section be a similar bar, or will it not? Which ever answer the hon. and learned Gentleman gives will, I think, be unsatisfactory. It is a logical dilemma. If the Solicitor General replies "yes," then the person aggrieved is deprived of the option secured to him by the general law of a criminal or civil remedy; if "no," then the defendant is liable to be twice prosecuted for the same cause, contrary to the protection extended to persons under the general law, in cases of common assault. This is a fair illustration of the inconvenience of these casual incursions upon well-established principles of criminal justice. I understand that, before the Committee, it was urged that this subsection should be introduced in the interest of the defendant himself, and that is a plausible argument I desire for a moment to deal with. It was said acquittal does not absolutely discharge the defendant; he may still be proceeded against for assault, and that, under the present law, he is put to the inconvenience of having to appear and bring up his witnesses on a subsequent day. Well, let us see whether that argument advanced in the supposed interest of the defendant will hold water. I venture to think it will not, and for this reason: At the close of the hearing on the charge of obstruction, defendant is there in Court, and he can be charged instantly with the commission of assault; and if he does not object, the Court then and there can proceed to hear and determine. That, the hon. and learned Gentleman will not dispute, is Common Law. No doubt there are conditions under which the defendant might object, but ex hypothesi the defendant will be anxious to have the case settled then and there. I am rather jealous of these innovations. I think there is a tendency at the present day in the direction of laxity in legal procedure, a reaction, no doubt, against the pedantic formalism of other days; but I think a little too much laxity has shown a tendency to invade our Department of Criminal Law, and against the danger of this I make my protest. I have had some conversation with the Solicitor General on this subject, and he, in the most courteous manner, promised to explain his own view, and has even gone so far as to say that, if I am not satisfied with his explanation, he will be prepared not to press this alteration in our Criminal Law.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 13, to leave out all the words from the word "hearing" to the word "accordingly" inclusive in line 20.—(Mr. Pickersgill.)

(11.40.) THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir E. CLARKE, Plymouth): It is of so much importance that this most useful Bill, which has been so carefully considered, should be allowed promptly to pass into law, that I did say, and I am quite prepared to stand by it, that if the hon. Member feels it necessary to make a resolute opposition to this clause, I would rather yield on the point than lose the opportunity of passing the Bill: I said I hoped, and I still have that hope, to be able to satisfy the hon. Member that the alteration is a useful one, and in the interest of those persons whom the hon. Member has taken under his protection—that is to say, persons charged with offences of this kind who, for the most part, are poor persons. Such persons could now be charged with the offence of molesting, obstructing, or hindering an officer in the execution of his duty; and if it turned out that the officer was not strictly in the execution of his duty at the time, and that it really was a common assault, the Magistrate would be obliged to dismiss the charge originally brought, and then a new summons would be taken out and the defendant would get no costs. The defendant would have to answer that summons, the same facts would be repeated in evidence, and he could be convicted on the second summons. The only effect of this clause is, that if the facts proved before the Magistrate show that a common assault was committed, but not upon a man in the execution of his duty, the matter could be dealt with at once on the facts, and without the necessity of a second summons and a second hearing, but the result would be the same as if there had been both. The hon. Gentleman has suggested that it might be on different facts, but that cannot be. If the hon. Member will look at the words of the section he will find that if on the hearing of the complaint against any person it is proved such person knowingly committed an assault, he is not entitled to be, and will not be, acquitted by reason of the failure to prove the offence in the first instance. The clause indicates that the Magistrate must take into consideration the facts given in evidence on the first information, and he is limited to this consideration. It is said that punishment may be inflicted for assault upon some one else, but if the hon. Member will examine the words, he will see that is not possible. It is a charge of obstructing an officer in the execution of his duty, but if it be proved that the officer was not in the execution of his duty, then the defendant may not be wholly acquitted for his action, but is liable to be convicted for common assault. The alteration is a reasonable and practical one, and I do not believe it can injure anybody. I think it will be an advantage so to amend the law, but, as I said before so I say now, if the hon. Member desires to press the matter, I think the remainder of the Bill is of so much importance that, rather than imperil its passage, I will yield the point and allow the Amendment to be carried.

(11.45.) MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): If the hon. and learned Gentleman is willing to abandon the words, I need not take up time with argument in support of the Amendment. ["Agreed."] Do I understand the subsection will be abandoned?

SIR E. CLARKE signified assent.

(11.45.) MR. T. M. HEALY: The Solicitor General takes a very moderate attitude. Although I was a Member of the Committee which passed the Bill, and recognise that it is extremely desirous that the officers of the Department should be armed with strong powers in the execution of their duty in the prevention of smuggling, I am glad the hon. and learned Gentleman can see his way to accept the Amendment. I do not want to press my views, but I do think there is a great hardship in the manner in which such strong powers are given the Authorities against the ordinary citizen, while if the latter brings an action against an official, the official is hedged about with extraordinary protection. Observe that in case of conviction of offence against the officer, the Magistrate has no option but to inflict a fine of £100, not a fine up to that sum, it must be £100. While this protection is given to the officer of the law, if an officer of the law knocks down anybody in precisely the same manner, look at the way in which the officer is protected. Under Clause 28 the complainant must bring an action within three months, and then he must give notice of action, which, of course, is a technical thing, and then on the offence contained in the notice the defendant may plead not guilty by Statute and may make tender of amends. Now, all subjects of Her Majesty should be equal, and no man should have privilege beyond that of an ordinary citizen if he knocks me down, and I submit these distinctions are not justifiable. According to the Common Law Procedure Act the plea of not guilty by Statute was abolished. It was revived by Judge's Rule in Ireland, but it is a monstrous thing, while an official is hedged about with so much protection, that an aggrieved person, in an unofficial position, should find so much difficulty in obtaining redress. In Committee it was regarded as a very strong measure indeed, but the Government in Committee were assisted by some very able gentlemen, who represented the views of the Department, and the Committee yielded; but I must say I think there is rather a tendency to over-departmentalise under the influence of gentlemen suffering from what the Americans call "swelled head."

Question put, and negatived.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 12 to 27 agreed to.

Clause 28.

(11.52.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I venture to make an appeal to the Solicitor General whether, in these modern days, it is not desirable to drop out such a provision as this. The House and the Committee have shown themselves willing to arm the Executive Authority with ample powers for carrying out their important duties, and this is a most useful consolidating Bill; but I appeal to the Government that when on the one hand they make it impossible for the Magistrate to mitigate the penalty on the subject, the subject should not, on the other hand, be so tightly fettered in bringing an action. I look with suspicion on any attempt against the Common Law. No doubt, executive officers have had this protection for many years, but have they not had it long enough, and has not the time arrived when such protection is no longer necessary? It would be well, when the Department is getting such valuable concessions as this Bill affords, that the Department should show that they do not wish to insist that their officers should have any more protection than other persons can claim when acting with illegality. I will not make any Motion until I hear what the hon. and learned Gentleman may have to say, but I am sure if a spirit of concession is shown there will be no difficulty about the Bill passing.

(11.54.) SIR E. CLARKE: I am sorry I cannot consent to the omission of the clause, and I hope the hon. and learned Member will not press that upon the Committee. He is aware this is a Consolidation Bill, collecting into one Bill provisions scattered over several Statutes in a manner that made the administration of the law somewhat cumbrous and difficult. The penalties and the provisions in the Bill do not involve any alteration in the law for the protection of officers in carrying out their duties. I hope the hon. Member will not press for the exclusion of the clause now. I cannot consent to that in this Consolidation Bill. If an amendment of the law should hereafter be thought desirable, the matter could be very readily dealt with. I would ask the hon. Gentleman to let the Bill go through now.

(11.55.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I am sorry I do not see my way to accept that suggestion. I suppose, as the Government is in possession of a large majority, we must bow to their decision; but we could amend the clause considerably if the Committee would give attention to it. In Sub-section A I will move the omission of the word "three," in order to insert "twelve." I am afraid not many Members opposite have the Bill in their hands. Sub-section A declares that no action shall lie unless commenced within three months after the cause of action, and in addition to that there must be a month's notice of action, which, practically, reduces anyone who brings an action against an officer of the Inland Revenue to a period of two months. That is a very short time, and I think it would be only reasonable and judicious to extend the time to 12 months. The Solicitor General says we are only consolidating the law from several Acts on the Statute Book, but I remember when I was on the Committee which dealt with the Criminal Law we found in that Committee the usual difficulty that the Government have, in consolidation, always the temptation to improve the law at the same time, and all the Departments rush in and want the Act made more severe. It is rarely you find a Government with sufficient good sense to resolutely confine the Act to consolidation. If they would do that, and not attempt to improve the law, they might do much in eliminating Acts from the Statute Book and making the law more clear. But they try to improve upon the existing Acts and make the law more severe, and this Bill is an instance. This, I think, affords a fair opportunity to provide that the Inland Revenue should not have the special protection afforded by this limitation of time.

Amendment proposed, in page 10, line 32, to leave out the word "three," and insert the word "twelve."—(Colonel Nolan.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'three' stand part of the Clause."

(11.58.) DR. KENNY (Cork, S.): I beg to second this Amendment. It is obvious that a man may receive very serious injuries in a contest with an officer of the law, and may not for many months discover the extent of them. Yet, practically, the officer escapes liability if the action is not brought within three months. I think the Solicitor General might make some concession on this point, and take advantage of a Consolidation Bill to make an oppressive law less oppressive. As the Amendment is in that direction, I support it; and I hope the hon. and learned Gentleman, if he cannot accept 12 months, will agree to extend the time to six months.

(12.59.) SIR E. CLARKE: I hope the hon. and gallant Gentleman will recognise that we are acting upon the suggestion he himself made, and in a Consolidation Bill wish to consolidate and not alter the law. This clause is not an alteration of the law, it is a repetition of what is on the Statute Book. It is extremely important that in respect to actions brought in respect to alleged assaults there should be a proper limit, and I hope in a simple Consolidation Bill the hon. Member will allow the clause to remain as it stands.

It being midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 23rd June, 1890.

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF CLARENCE AND AVONDALE.

THE LORD CHAMBERLAIN reported, That the Lords with White Staves had (according to order) laid before Her Majesty their Lordships' Resolution of Tuesday last, relating to the place and precedence of His Royal Highness the Duke of Clarence and Avondale in this House; and that Her Majesty was pleased to say She would give directions for a chair or seat to be prepared for His said Royal Highness on the left hand of the Cloth of Estate.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert Victor Christian Edward of Wales, having been created Earl of Athlone and Duke of Clarence and Avondale, was introduced between His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh, the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, the Garter King of Arms, the Earl Marshal, and the Lord Great Chamberlain attending, and was placed in a chair on the left hand of the Throne.

THE ATTENDANCE OF PEERS.

*LORD RIBBLESDALE, in rising to call attention to the attendance of Peers in the House of Lords, said: My Lords, I have noticed lately in all the speeches I have read the extreme popularity of what I believe is called the historical argument. I feel that in this proposal which I am about to bring before your Lordships' House I am in some danger of fulfilling in my own person an historical illustration. In the year 1789 an indirectly celebrated character, a certain Dr. Joseph Guillotin, devised the use of that instrument of death which was at once called by his name, and in 1792 Dr. Guillotin himself was within an ace of putting into motion in his own person the machinery he had devised. Now, my Lords, I am afraid that I might myself be the first person to come under the operation of the proposal which I am going to develop to your Lordships, but there is this difference between Dr. Guillotin and myself, that whereas Dr. Guillotin was, more or less, the victim of the vexatious circumstances which surrounded him, I, under this proposal of mine, keep my fate actually in my own hands. I think it would be very desirable at once to divest the Notice which I have put upon the Paper of vagueness, and to explain the naked principle of the idea which underlies that Notice. Mr. John Bright advised somebody who asked him to suggest a good rule for making a forcible speech, to confine himself to one idea, and I propose to confine myself, as far as possible, to one idea this evening. To put it into the very plainest English, I am going to ask your Lordships to consider whether it might not, for many reasons, some of which I shall endeavour to give, be advisable to consider the expediency of making a Vote in a Division in this House during any Session depend upon a certain number of attendances during the Session immediately preceding it. To put it still more clearly, I will take the case of Lord A (whom we will consider a purely imaginary personage) and a few hypothetical dates. Lord A, we will say, has not attended a certain number of times represented by X in 1891. He would appear in a list in 1892, which could be prepared by some impartial authority from an available source, for I believe our attendances are already recorded on the Journals of your Lordships' House, as having lost his right to vote during 1892; but Lord A during 1892 could redeem his right by his attendances during that Session to vote again in the Session of 1893. That, my Lords, is the principle of the proposal. Of course, the smoothness of working of a principle of that kind depends upon a great many details, and the consideration of details, I think, depends upon a stage of deliberation, which in this case

I am conscious may never be reached, but which I should like very much to see reached. If Lord A happened to be an ex-Minister of Foreign Affairs, or an ex or present Master of Buckhounds, the fulfilment of those duties might be considered grounds of exemption; and I think if Lord A was Chairman of Quarter Sessions or Board of Guardians, and did a great deal of useful work for his county, that might be again a reason for exemption, or if he were travelling in the colonies, or was away from ill-health, those also would be reasons for exempting him; but exemptions of that kind do not at all, I think, affect the general principle which I put before your Lordships this evening. I may, perhaps, say here that I would not, of course, expect from any of your Lordships an expression of anything like approval of the proposal this evening. People like sometimes to have time to make up their minds upon any subject, while other people dissent quickly—generally speaking they approve more slowly. Therefore, all I propose to do this evening is to make good my case as far as I am able; and if I receive anything like a measure of encouragement, say within 10 days or a fortnight's time, I would bring up a Motion and carry it to a Division for the appointment of a Committee to consider how far the proposal is reasonable and useful, and to report to the House upon it. I may remind your Lordships that this course was followed in 1868, when the question whether proxies should be continued or discontinued was referred to a Select Committee of this House, the deliberations of that Committee resulting in a Standing Order doing away with proxies which has never been repealed, and is still in force. I am very clear myself that, assuming any need of reform in your Lordships' House, that reform should begin within the House itself. I do not think any reform which necessitates an Act of Parliament is a reform which can be wisely considered. I think if we could devise any reform which would make the House more useful, and which could be carried out in the form of a Standing Order, such reform should be carefully and wisely considered. Upon that point I should like to quote a very eminent authority, Sir Edward Coke, who says:—

Lord Ribblesdale

"Whatever matter arises concerning either House of Parliament, ought to be discussed and adjudged in the House to which it relates, and not elsewhere."

Well, my Lords, I think there may be two cardinal objections to this proposal, which I shall try to anticipate. Those objections will probably come from two sets of people, representing different opinions. Objections may come from a section of your Lordships who may say—"We grant there may be some value in your proposal, but we dispute altogether the possibility for this being done by a Standing Order or Resolution." That is the first objection which I anticipate. The second may come from those of your Lordships who will say—"We quite admit that you can do this by a Standing Order, but we think what you are proposing is only a quack remedy." If I can answer the first of those objections which I am anticipating, I think I shall establish the "possibleness" of my proposal. If, on the other hand, I can answer the second, I think I shall have established its usefulness and reasonableness. If I can answer both, whatever may be the measure of your Lordships' approval, I shall have justified myself, perhaps, in the view of the House for bringing this proposal before it. For I can assure your Lordships that I feel very strongly that to bring forward a measure of this sort in your House in at all a frivolous spirit would be a most extraordinary proceeding. Now, my Lords, I approach the first part of this subject, which I will call the Constitutional difficulty, with considerable diffidence. The ability to deal with a question of that kind depends so much upon absolute clearness, and that again depends so much upon habit, that people who have not that clearness and habit must feel considerable diffidence. On a celebrated occasion, Lord Lyndhurst in this House recited, I believe from memory, every black-letter authority, on a very important proposal which was brought before the House. It was an extraordinary effort of memory, rendered necessary, I believe, by the fact that his eyes would not permit him to read his notes. It appears, however, that on that occasion Lord Lyndhurst got his way not by the weight of his black-letter authorities, but by the weight of his own personal authority and the vivid impression which he created in the House. I can hope for no succour either from personal authority or from vivid impression; but perhaps I may advance this plea that I at once reassure your Lordships I shall quote no black-letter authorities upon the subject. Now, my Lords, I will proceed to handle the Constitutional difficulty which might be raised in this matter, that is that my proposal cannot be carried out by a Standing Order. Assuming an unanimous approval—which cannot obviously be assumed in regard to a measure of this sort—I believe that such a proposal as this could be carried out without any Standing Order. I believe it could be carried out by what is called a Constitutional understanding. Of course, your Lordships are aware that as Peers we all have the undoubted and absolute right to sit upon your Lordships' Court of Appeal; but by a Constitutional understanding it is an understood thing that no lay Lord does sit upon that Court of Appeal, and that the lay Lords have entirely given over the exercise of their judicial functions to the Law Lords. Well, I think, on that analogy, the same thing could be done here. I believe that this proposal could be carried out by a Constitutional understanding. But, my Lords, I think it would be far better done by a Standing Order, as was done in the case of proxies by the Standing Order to which I have just alluded. I have explained what was done then; and as that Standing Order can be vacated by giving two days' notice, although you might pass a Standing Order on the lines I have suggested you would not be committing yourselves to any absolutely irremediable error. There would be no great machinery necessary to set it in motion, and upon notice you could vacate that Standing Order. Of course, a Standing Order, as long as it is in force, is absolutely binding upon the Members of either House of Parliament, whichever House passes it, and either House of Parliament has absolute control over its Members with a view to making them obey that Standing Order. It has been suggested to me that such a Standing Order might bring us into an embarrassing law-suit, and that some stiff-necked Peer might dispute the authority of the Order and bring a law-suit against the officers of the House. It is quite true, of course, that a Peer might force himself past the Clerk, and having got rid of the Clerk, score out his own name with a chalk pencil; but I think that would be such a solitary instance, and the Peer who would adopt that courageous mode of making the correction he desired would be such an isolated individual, that that is not a contingency which we need keep very much before us. But I think Mr. Justice Stephen, in summing up in the case of "Bradlaugh v. Gosset," decided that where there is no legal remedy there is no legal wrong, and although a Peer might feel himself very much aggrieved by such Standing Order he could not get any remedy for it as he could against an infraction of the law. My Lords, I hope that will serve to show that as far as the Constitutional difficulty goes it can be met by a Standing Order. Now I come to the second objection, which I anticipate—that it may be urged against me that what I have to propose is only a quack remedy. I dissent from that altogether. I think that the affirmation of any such proposal and putting it into force would be a distinct advance in the Constitutional morality of your Lordships' House. In that we are accountable to no constituents we incur, I think, very much graver responsibilities, and that we should on that account devise every possible safeguard against in any way overdoing or abuse the exercise of the powers entrusted to us. But, my Lords, it may be said that this plea is altogether too theoretic, and that I ought to find some plea which is not so abstract or theoretic. I believe that the House would become more useful if in this way it became more seemly, and that increased usefulness would be the result of increased seemliness. A very keen critic, Mr. Bagehot, whose work on the subject Professor Dicey still considers incomparable, speaks on this point so very much better than I can speak myself, that perhaps your Lordships will allow me to read his own words. Mr. Bagehot, in his work on the English Constitution in the chapter on the House of Lords, says—

"As far as politics go there is profound truth in Lord Chesterfield's axiom, that the world must judge of you by what you seem, not by what you are. The world" (says Mr. Bagehot) "knows what you seems, it does not know what you are. An assembly, a revising assembly especially, which does not assemble, which looks as if it does not care how it revises, is defective in a main political ingredient. It may be of use, but it will hardly convince mankind that it is so."

And in another place Mr. Bagehot says—

"Some day or other the slack attendance in the House of Lords will destroy the House of Lords."

My Lords, instances could be multiplied of the usefulness and the self-help which may be begotten by appearances, and I think if the House should affirm a principle of this kind your Lordships would find more business to do, and I believe we should be altogether in a better position as a part of the body politic to bring about—I believe it would require an Act of Parliament—a state of things which would lead to Bills being carried on from one Session to another, and to make arrangements for a better and fairer distribution of business. I hope, my Lords, you may see the temporal discretion of getting as much as we possibly can into touch with the times we live in, and of adapting our own ideas to the altered condition of political society. We live in days of legislation—as we recently heard in your Lordships' House—in days which many people consider days of over-legislation. That means that occasions may arise much more frequently or rapidly than they have hitherto done where the two Houses of Parliament will differ—not come into actual collision, because I think the fears of actual collision between the two Houses are much exaggerated, and that those occasions are much more rare than people who go about agitating would have their audiences believe; but differences of opinion must arise, and I think it would be well if we could do away with the old reproach that the decisions of the House of Commons are reversed or are liable to be reversed and rejected by a majority of Peers, who at no other time give any sign of political life or political responsibility. We shall thus get rid of an old reproach, and by getting rid of it give an answer to the only arguable objection to the House of Lords. My Lords, what we should remember now, is that we are the revising assembly of a democracy, we are the revising assembly of a House of Commons which is every day becoming more important, because it is becoming more representative. I think, my Lords, in justice to your opinions, if they are open to the objection that those opinions are carried by a majority which at no other time shows any sign of political responsibility or political life, that objection should be removed. That I hold is an objection which, although it may not be fatal, goes a long way to obscure and outweigh the justice and value of the opinions which your Lordships arrive at. Well, my Lords, so much for the question of quack remedy. There is one more advantage which I claim for my proposal, which is that it provides a convenient and automatic channel for disposing of that more or less historical personage the "black sheep." It also provides a similar convenient and automatic channel for some Peers who do not care about attending to politics. They would be freed from, in some respects, a false position. After all, it is not an absolute certainty that because a Peer has succeeded to a seat in the House of Lords, he has succeeded to an inclination for politics, and it may reasonably be supposed that he finds other directions for the exercise of his talents or inclinations which are more congenial to him. Those Peers will disappear without any beat of drum, and, as far as the black sheep are concerned, without any invidious finger of scorn being pointed at them. That is all I have to say upon that point. My Lords, I am well aware that this House rests upon ancient deference, custom, and tradition. As a lover of the House, I should be the very last person to wish to say anything which would in any way impair that ancient tradition or that ancient deference, but I have yet to learn that either an institution or an individual impairs the respect which is due to him by converting his rights into responsibilities or by giving, as it were, hostages to his privileges. I thank you, my Lords, for having listened so kindly to what I had to say. I hope your Lordships will give the proposal I have tried to outline to you, your full consideration, and I hope you will be advised in this matter, not by me, but by a very wise man who said that "In the long run the retention of a froward custom was more likely to lead to difficulties than positive innovations."

*THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): My Lords, in the absence of my noble Friend, who has been unexpectedly called away, I may, perhaps, be allowed to intrude myself upon the House upon this occasion. I have no wish, as I am sure your Lordships will understand, to treat that which has been brought forward so feelingly and seriously in any other way than seriously, but, at the same time, I do not think it satisfactory that we should be called upon to discuss that which is not before us in any material shape or in a shape in which we can form a deliberate opinion as to its working. The proposal thrown out is simply that there should be in this House a species of self-selection—a plan by which people who selected themselves in one Session should be the acting people in the next. Though it is, doubtless, most desirable to my mind that we should have meritorious persons taking their part in the proceedings of the House of Lords, it seems hardly the best way for securing this object that Peers should be allowed to select themselves. Mere attendance in this House does not give one any special idea of the qualifications of those who may so attend. Nor is it possible, I think, to carry into effect the proposal of my noble Friend, which, as I understand it, is that if a Peer had not attended a certain number of times, say in the last Session of 1889, he would have been disqualified, and is to be deprived of the right to vote in the present Session of 1890; but though he is not to be allowed to vote, the House, apparently, is still to have the advantage of his eloquence. The great objection to the proposal is that it involves an interference with the summons which the Queen sends to those who sit in this House. A Peer has received the Queen's summons to come here and perform that duty which it has been so emphatically announced to-day is incumbent upon him, of advising upon the dangers and conditions of the State. I should like to know whether, when he is cut off from his Vote, he is to be cut off from speech, and whether we are to lose the benefit of that wisdom which he may possess though he may not have been in attendance during the preceding Session. His right of speech, I understand from the noble Lord, would remain to him, but he would be really considered as in fact qualifying himself in the course of the Session going on for voting in the Session to come afterwards. Therefore, I suppose he would be coming here and you would not put a prohibition upon the use of his tongue, though you might the use of his Vote. But it certainly would, as far as I understand it, be an interference with the Queen's summons to the Peers, calling upon them to advise in this House upon the affairs of the State. My noble Friend seems to be under a misapprehension as to the attendances in this House. No doubt, except on one or two occasions this Session, there has not been a large attendance; but, as a matter of fact, everybody who is a Peer, with the exception of about 150, including several Members who are filling high offices abroad, have attended—that is to say, there has been an attendance at different periods during the Session of more than 400 Members of your Lordships' House. What, then, would be the case if this Resolution of my noble Friend were carried? Why should we wish that all Peers should be in attendance here when there is no business? I see from the Journals there was, for instance, one occasion when the attendance fell very low, but if you look at what the business was that was put down for that night you will see at once that it would be absurd to ask the attendance of a great number of your Lordships for the purpose of disposing of business when no business was on the Paper to be done. With regard to the right of sitting in your Lordships' Court of Appeal, there is no doubt in your Lordships' hands, if you wish to exercise it, the power of sitting upon the legal questions which come before the House, and if you were present and attended to all the evidence and arguments brought forward you would have a right to vote. But as a matter of practice that right has been given up long ago. A change has been made in recent years by which it is required that there shall be a quorum of Law Lords. By the Act which was passed in that matter the House resumed its power which at one time was threatened to be taken away. My noble Friend seems to think that this proposal would be a remedy for something which I cannot make out to exist. What is it that is to justify the disqualification here? Is it the slack attendance that my noble Friend complains of? There has been always present a number of Members amply sufficient to do the business before the House this Session, and if my noble Friend had attended upon the Committees he would have seen that there has been not only a large attendance upon those Committees, but that there was a degree of care and anxious watching over the different measures brought forward which would show that this House was exercising that power of revising legislation which he seems to think so especially belongs to it. The noble Lord rather takes away from us any desire to execute him with his own guillotine, to follow his own analogy, but I cannot help observing that, from a Return which I have had put into my hands, my noble Friend has only attended eight times out of the 57 occasions on which the House has sat this Session, and I do not think it is a very advantageous thing that this House should be governed by theory instead of by practice. The noble Lord has not afforded us the advantage of the practice of his theory, either in the House or on the Committees of the House, for I have received the terrible information that in his great desire that this House should exercise its revising powers upon the matters which come before it he has not himself exercised his revising powers once during the last four years. My Lords, I value theories very much, but, at the same time, I do not think that those of us who have been in constant attendance in the House should be taught by those who have not attended, or that we should be corrected by those who would themselves seem to deserve the correction which they would apply to us. I agree with the noble Lord in saying that any reform of the House should come from within. I do not think it would be very advisable that we should be brought into strong collision with those who would wish to reform us from without. But I think I may say this, that the House has been endeavouring to, even if it has not succeeded, bring about a state of things by which the legislation passing through the House should be carefully examined. I know that some of your Lordships differ as to the value of those Committees which sit weekly for several hours on each occasion for the purpose of carefully examining the legislation which comes before them, but I feel certain that if those Committees did not exist the House would in full assembly make it its duty to go carefully through those measures which might be brought before the House. There are always in the House, we may feel sure, those who would take care that that was done. I may mention one noble Lord who sits opposite, Lord Herschell, whom I do not see there at the present moment, who would take care that that duty was performed. I am sure there is no one in this House who is not convinced that any legislation which might be brought before the House would receive attention and care from the noble Lord, and that, if necessary, your Lordships would have an opportunity of carefully revising it. My Lords, I have had a very short experience of this House, and I should not have thought of addressing you upon this occasion had it not been for the sudden absence of my noble Friend; but I would venture to express the hope that your Lordships will not go into the theoretical experiments which are, I believe, quite contrary to the terms upon which your Lordships sit in this House. I do not think it is advisable in any way to deter Peers from coming to this House. Supposing you were to inform indirectly in that way all those who had not attended last Session, by way of inviting them to attend more regularly, that they should not have speech or vote—or if speech no vote—during next Session, of course they would not come. No man would come to the House if he were bound by such a Standing Order as that. In my opinion such a Standing Order would be wholly illegal. It would be contrary to the terms on which your Lordships are summoned to this House. You are bound to give your advice and votes while you are here, and if you desire to do anything of this kind it must be done by legislation and not by a Standing Order. It would be a most unreasonable thing that any Member of this House, who has been absent a good deal during one Session, should have to explain to your Lordships the reason why he was absent, the mission upon which he was engaged, and whether or not the reasons which he might be able to give were sufficient to bring him within the exemptions mentioned by the noble Lord. That is not the way in which I think your Lordships can arrive at a wise conclusion upon this subject. There are those who think that great reforms are needed in this House. I confess I am not one of them; but much may be done, and one way in which the value of your Lordships' House may be maintained will be by a steady perseverance in the work in which we are now engaged—that is, in looking most carefully into those legislative measures which are committed to your care.

*EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I am sometimes accused of not being so extreme a reformer of the House of Lords as I ought to be, but I think the noble Lord the Lord President of the Council has been a little too hard in dealing with my noble Friend. I think that everyone who heard him must have been struck not only with the substance of his speech but with the extreme moderation of his tone in bringing the matter before your Lordships' attention. I think it is part of the merit of the noble Lord that he did not directly propose the change to which the noble Viscount objects, but he merely stated that his wish was to ascertain how far it would be in accordance with the feelings of the House, not to adopt this particular measure, but to go so far as to appoint a Committee by which the matter might be considered in all its bearings. Now, I agree with a great deal that the noble Viscount has said. I agree that there is practically a better attendance in this House than there is popularly supposed to be; and I entirely agree with what, perhaps, is not so well known to the public as it ought to be, the immense advantage which has already accrued to the legislation passed from this House by the work done by the very numerous body of Peers in the Standing Committees lately appointed. But the noble Viscount seems to think there is no grievance at all. I think a grievance is felt. Whether you can remedy that grievance in this way or in any other way I do not at present undertake to state; but I do most distinctly state that it is thought a very objectionable thing by the public with regard to the proceedings of this House, that whereas our normal numbers are few and generally composed of pretty nearly the same class of Peers, perhaps, once or twice during the Session, when there is a measure of very great importance to be considered, Peers who have not shown the slightest aptitude, or the slightest liking for any political subject come down to the House, and, by merely giving their votes, convey very often a very erroneous view of the opinions of the House of Lords. I entirely agree with both the noble speakers that any reform had better come from within, but I disagree with the noble Viscount that for such a reform as this a Bill would be required. I think there are great objections to a Bill, not fatal objections at all, but I think it would be unwise of the House of Lords to volunteer to lay themselves, as it were, on the dissecting table of the House of Commons, excepting on the ground that a very large and important measure justified it. And besides that, such a Bill, if it were possible, should come backed up by the full authority of its being a Government measure, brought in by a Government who naturally command a majority in the other House. But I do not think this matter, which is one entirely concerning our own procedure, is one which requires a Bill. If, indeed, it affected any right of the Crown, or of the House of Commons, that would be a very different thing, and there, I think, the necessity for a Bill would arise, but with regard to a mere question of procedure, I am quite sure you have the power of dealing with it yourselves if you think it is advisable so to do. Certainly, after the very decided opinion that the noble Viscount has given on the part of Her Majesty's Government, I can hardly, unless some unexpected support come to my noble Friend from other quarters, suppose that he will wish to insist upon the matter being referred to a Committee, but I should be glad if some of the non-official Members of the House would, on a subject of this sort, for it is obviously not at all of a Party character, express their opinions as to what they think, for the sake of the House, would be desirable to do.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: My Lords, I agree with my noble Friend who has just spoken with regard to the tone and spirit in which this proposal has been introduced by the noble Lord near me. I certainly should not be inclined myself in a summary way to reject the principle of the proposal; but I am bound to say that I do feel a difficulty in looking upon this as a question merely of procedure of the House. The proposition is in substance, under certain circumstances, to exclude Members of the House who have a right to be present in it from the power of voting in its proceedings, not for any fault they may have committed which might justify suspension or anything more, but simply for non-attendance in the previous year. I will not say, if precedents could be found by any Committee which might be appointed, that the Committee might not come to a conclusion that this might be treated as a matter of procedure, but at present I own I feel a great deal of difficulty about it. If we look to the other House no one would suppose it would be constitutional for the House of Commons, by a general Resolution or Standing Order, to exclude from voting some of its Members, unless upon grounds of necessity for the maintenance of its order or the regularity of its proceedings. While, therefore, I do not at all say that if a Motion were made for the appointment of a Committee upon this subject I should oppose it, I am bound to say that my present impression is, in such a case as this it would be going beyond the powers which the House has to regulate its own business to carry out such a proposal.

CONSOLIDATION OF STATUTES.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

*EARL STANHOPE, in rising to ask the Lord Chancellor whether any scheme could be recommended to Parliament by which the consolidation of Statutes could be more easily effected, either by the Statute Law Committee or by some other body, said: My Lords, before asking the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack the question which stands in my name, I hope I may be permitted to say a word or two in explanation of the object of the question. I have, for a considerable period, noticed that Consolidation Bills are, from time to time, brought before both Houses of Parliament, and it is obviously quite impossible for the general body of Members of either House to consider a matter of so technical a nature as the consolidation of one Statute with another. There exists, as your Lordships are well aware, a Statute Law Revision Committee, which revises all the Statutes from time to time, and a great number of the old Statutes have already been so revised; but, as regards the consolidation of Statutes, it is such a purely technical matter to consolidate Statutes as requiring special legal knowledge that I should be very glad to see some body, either the Statute Law Revision Committee or some other body, which could be made answerable for the work of consolidating the Statutes appointed to perform that work before the Bills come before the consideration of either House. My Lords, it is within my recollection that in 1875 there was a very long Bill which was considered in another place—that was the Public Health Act of 1875. In that Statute there were 343 clauses. I was in the House when that Bill was going through, and I am sure it was quite impossible for any Member to form an opinion upon numerous clauses without having all the previous Acts before him. Then there has been another Bill of the kind passing through your Lordships' House, the Lunacy Acts Consolidation Bill. That Bill also has about 350 clauses. My object in asking this question is to elicit from my noble and learned Friend some expression of opinion as to whether it would be possible or not to have some body to consolidate these very long Statutes. The Parliamentary machine is already somewhat out of gear; and when your Lordships observe the number of questions which are asked not merely upon notice in another place, but the hundreds of other questions which are asked without any notice at all, to us outsiders not understanding the technical part of Bill-drafting it seems a matter of ordinary common-sense that these matters should be delegated to some body other than the Houses of Parliament. I do not mean that Consolidation Bills should be withdrawn from passing through all their stages; all I mean is that it is impossible for either House of Parliament to consider them in Committee, and it is for that reason that I venture to ask the noble and learned Lord the question which stands in my name.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I am sorry to say that I am unable to suggest any improvement of the existing system under which the consolidation and revision of the Statute Law proceeds, except to recommend Parliament (in another place) to allow the Bill presented for that purpose to pass as rapidly as possible. It is not necessary for me to repeat, what I have frequently asserted, my acknowledgment of the accuracy combined with speed which has characterised the work of the Statute Law Committee since I have had occasion to deal with it. I have been glad to learn that the Select Committee of the House of Commons which has recently examined the Statute Law Revision Bill confirms my opinion. But I am sorry to say a very serious check has for the present apparently paralysed the work, just when it was making most satisfactory progress. The Statute Law Bill was blocked at the end of last Session; and, notwithstanding every effort which has been made, the prospects of completing the new cheap edition of the Revised Statutes on which we are engaged seems further from realisation than it was 12 months ago. I trust, however, that this unfortunate delay is only a temporary obstacle to a most useful work.

QUESTIONS.

SALT TAX IN ORISSA.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Government of India would grant a Commission to inquire into the whole question of the Salt Tax in Orissa, and the effects resulting from the administration of the tax being placed under the Madras Authorities; and whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a Report from the Bengal officials concerning the present manner of levying the tax and its result on the population?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): No, Sir. In the opinion of the Secretary of State it is not necessary at present to appoint a Commission. A special Report has been called for respecting salt affairs in the district of Orissa.

THE REGISTRAR GENERAL'S RETURNS.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, Collego): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the fact that, according to the last Report of the Registrar General, in addition to 25,132 cases in which the cause of death was "ill defined or not specified" in medical certificates of death, 15,747 deaths occurred in England and Wales, in 1888, in which the cause of death was not certified either by a medical man or coroner; and whether, taking that fact into consideration, Government will consent to the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the sufficiency of the existing law as to the disposal of the dead, for securing an accurate record of the causes of death in all cases, and specially for detecting them where death may have been due to poison, violence, or criminal neglect?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): There were 25,132 deaths in 1888 in which the cause of death was "ill-defined or not specified," and 15,747 deaths in which the cause was not certified by either a medical man or coroner; but it is not the fact that the 25,132 deaths were all of them cases in which there was a medical certificate, or that they were in addition to the deaths in which there was no certificate forthcoming. The great bulk of the 15,747 uncertified deaths are, I am informed by the Registrar General, included in the 25,132 deaths in which the cause was either not specified or not sufficiently defined for due classification. As regards the 15,747 deaths without medical or coroner's certificate, it must not be assumed that these were all cases in which there was no medical attendance. Many of them were, doubtless, cases which had been attended by unregistered medical practitioners, who cannot give legally recognisable certificates. The proportion both of deaths in which the cause is ill-defined or not specified and of uncertified deaths has been gradually diminishing. Thus, in the years 1881-1887 the proportion of the ill-defined deaths averaged 5·7 per cent. of all deaths registered, but in 1888 it was only 4·9 per cent. As regards uncertified deaths, the proportion in 1879 was 4·7 per cent., and this fell gradually, until, in 1888, it was 3·1 per cent. As I stated in reply to a previous question of the hon. Members, the Registrar General has good reason to know that a very large proportion of the cases of uncertified deaths are reported by Registrars to Coroners prior to their registration, although those officers, in the exercise of their discretion, decide that it is unnecessary to hold inquests. It is too late to entertain the question of the appointment of a Select Committee this Session, but I will promise the hon. Member that the question of the expediency of such a Committee shall be carefully considered during the recess.

TREATIES OF COMMERCE.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if a representative of the trading interests of Canada, Australasia, South Africa, and India, will be appointed to the Committee now in process of formation, to consider the Treaties of Commerce which are about to expire?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): No, Sir. It is proposed to confine this Committee to representatives of the commercial interests in the United Kingdom.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: Then in what way is the colonial interest to be considered?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The commercial policy of our self-governing colonies, with one great exception, is altogether different from our own.

BETTING PROSECUTIONS.

MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to the action of the Recorder of Liverpool in some prosecutions of betting clubs which have recently been before him, in which the defendants succeeded in getting off; whether his attention has been drawn to the case of the "Waterloo Club," and to the evidence that it was a betting club, and to the summing up of the Recorder in this case, in which he is reported to have said that—

"The Legislature had never taken a decisive course in regard to betting. Betting under the Act of Parliament had a special meaning, namely, that one person paid or received what was wagered by others. It would not be against the Act if two members of the club made a bet, and the one paid the other."

The defendants were found not guilty on the charges of "keeping," "using," "permitting," and "assisting;" whether his attention has been drawn to the case of the "Tarleton Club," in which the defendants had been fined by one of the City Justices for keeping the club open for betting purposes, which conviction was quashed by the Recorder of Liverpool upon an exception taken by the counsel for the defendants to the convictions, on the ground that they proceeded against the defendants as owners or occupiers of the premises, whereas, though they were shareholders, the premises were rated as occupied by the Tarleton Club Company, Limited; and whether he is prepared to recommend legislation to remedy these defects in the law, as evidenced by the above cases?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I am informed by the learned Recorder that the report of what he said in the case of the Waterloo Club is not accurate. What he did say was that the Legislature had never prohibited betting, or made it unlawful, but had only made bets irrecoverable by law. He also said that the statute 16 and 17 Vict., cap. 119, under which the defendants were indicted, had been held to apply to places where money was received in advance on one side, and not to betting generally. Unless this club could be proved to be such a place the defendants were entitled to their acquittal. With regard to the Tarleton Club, the defendants had been convicted as "owners" and "occupiers." There was no evidence that this was the case, as the counsel for the Justices admitted. The above cases do not, therefore, disclose any serious defect in the law; and I can hold out no hope of legislation on this subject at any early date.

SWAZILAND.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can give to the House any information in respect to the negotiations now proceeding for the settlement of Swaziland?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): I regret that the negotiations have not reached a stage at which it would be possible to give the House any information except that Her Majesty's Government are at present waiting for a reply from the Government of the South African Republic to the latest communications of Sir H. Loch.

MR. S. LEIGHTON: Can the right hon. Gentleman inform the House what the purport of the instructions sent to the High Commissioner is?

BARON H. DE WORMS: It is impossible for me to give the House that information.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): Can the right hon. Gentleman say when the Government will be in a position to furnish the desired information?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The length of time that must elapse will depend on the time it would take to get the answers from the South African Republic.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN COMPANY.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can inform the House what is the estimated extent in square miles of the territory placed by Royal Charter under the control of the South African Company, and the estimated population of the native tribes inhabiting it; whether Mr. Cecil Rhodes, the Chairman of the Company, is under an obligation to report to the High Commissioner of South Africa, or is independent of him; and whether he can say what is the number of soldiers or police in the employ of the company, and what is the name of the officer in command of them, and from whom he receives his commission?

BARON H. DE WORMS: No territory is placed under the control of the British South African Company by the Royal Charter. The effect of that Charter is to enable the company to exercise as a corporation any concessions and any powers of control granted by local rulers. Mr. Rhodes is not chairman of the company. As one of the officers of the company (managing director in South Africa), he is bound under Section 18 of the Charter to communicate freely with the High Commissioner, and to pay due regard to any requirements, suggestions, or requests which the High Commissioner may make to him. The number of police in the company's employment is believed to be 500. There is also a body of 150 miners and settlers, called pioneers. The officer temporarily in command of the police is Colonel Pennefather. He, of course, receives from the company any commission which he may hold for the purpose of his police command.

MR. S. LEIGHTON: Is he obliged to report to the High Commissioner?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Any action the Company may take they are bound to report to the High Commissioner.

CYPRUS.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether any step has been taken to meet the wishes expressed to Her Majesty's Government by the deputation from Cyprus last year, either in the way of reforms in the civil administration or of relief from taxation; and, if so, whether he will state what changes have been introduced?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The views of Her Majesty's Government on the representations of the deputation from

Mr. Stanley Leighton

Cyprus will be found in the Parliamentary Paper C, 6,003, recently distributed, especially in the Secretary of State's Despatch of the 22nd of March, 1890, at p. 23. Various reductions of expenditure have been made, and some other reforms will be initiated, as described in the papers referred to; but it would be impossible to state the particulars within the limits of an answer.

MR. S. LEIGHTON: I beg to give notice that I will call attention to the question on the Estimates.

LUNACY.

MR. W. CORBET (Wicklow, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the Report of the Commissioners in Lunacy for the year 1889 will be laid upon the Table?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Commissioners that this Report is now with the printers, and they hope to be able to lay it on the Table of the House at the end of the week.

MR. W. CORBET: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland when the Report of the Inspectors of Lunatics for the year 1889 will be laid upon the Table?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums hope to be in a position to lay the Report in question upon the Table of the House during next month.

NEW DOCK AT GIBRALTAR.

SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he will undertake, with reference to the proposed construction of a graving dock at Gibraltar, to follow the precedent set in the case of the Somerset Dock at Malta, and submit to Parliament all designs and papers referring thereto before entering into any contract or arrangement for its construction?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The design and details of the Somerset Dock at Malta were not submitted to Parliament, but certain correspondence and plans showing the position of the new dock were presented to Parliament after the work had been taken in hand. The responsibility for the selection of a suitable site and plan of the proposed dock at Gibraltar must rest with the Government, and the Board of Admiralty are fully prepared to accept that responsibility.

CARDIFF RIFLE VOLUNTEERS.

MR. A. THOMAS (Glamorgan, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to a paragraph in the Western Mail, of the 19th instant, in which it is reported that great dissatisfaction exists among the Rifle Volunteers of Cardiff, in consequence of the amalgamation of the two detachments; whether, in consequence, only very few members attend parade; whether it was a well known fact that the amalgamation was very distasteful and would be resented; whether previous to the amalgamation both detachments were numerically strong and efficient; and whether he will cause an inquiry to be made, in order to make arrangements that will be satisfactory to members of both detachments?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The amalgamation referred to was a regimental arrangement, which would have been carried out much earlier if it had not been for debts on the part of one of the detachments. It is reputed that since the amalgamation the attendance has improved, and that the strength is greater than before it took effect.

UPPER DIVISION CLERKS.

MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the Treasury Minute relating to the Upper Division Clerks will be laid upon the Table?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I regret that I must refer my hon. Friend to several previous answers I have given, explaining the reasons for the length of time which it takes to deal with this important question.

ENGLISH HOPS.

MR. H. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the United States Government intend to increase the duties upon English hops by 25 per cent.?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (SIR J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): According to a late edition of the Tariff Bill published in America, it appears that the duty on British hops is to be raised from 8s. to 15s. (4d. to 7½d.) per lb., or nearly doubled.

HOME OFFICE CONTRACTS.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether complaint has been made that the plastering, or a portion of it, at the new Metropolitan Police Office has been sub-let by the contractor to a piece-master named Charles Peak; whether complaint has been made that the sub-contractor is an unfair employer; whether his attention has been called to a report of a case tried at Bow Street on 10th June, when the said Charles Peak was summoned by four plasterers for money due to them, and condemned to pay the claim and all costs; and whether complaint has been made that the plastering is being done in an imperfect manner, and with adulterated or inferior material, so that the Clerk of the Works has been compelled to condemn some of the work?

MR. MATTHEWS: Charles Peak was employed by the contractor to superintend the work of the plasterers at the new Police Offices. He was not a sub-contractor. He was paid a weekly wage, and he did not pay the men or supply the material. He engaged the men, and had the power of dismissing them. No complaint has been made to the Receiver of Police that Peak is an unfair employer. I have not seen a report of the case in question, but I am informed that it had nothing to do with Peak's employment at the Police Offices. Complaint has been made that some of the architraves and mouldings had not been done in accordance with the specifications. They have been condemned by the architect, and will be made good by the contractor. The further services of Charles Peak have been dispensed with.

THE GOVERNOR OF NEW SOUTH WALES.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies when does Lord

Carrington's term of office, as Governor of New South Wales, expire; has any successor been appointed to succeed him; and whether the Secretary of State for the Colonies has unofficially submitted the name of Lord Carrington's successor to the Prime Minister, Sir Henry Parkes; or is it his intention to do so?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Lord Carrington has expressed a wish to resign in November. No successor has yet been appointed. The Secretary of State's Despatch of the 8th July, 1889, presented to Parliament in the Paper C,5828, shows the views of Her Majesty's Government as to consulting the Colonial Governments before appointing Governors, and I have nothing to add.

ZANZIBAR.

DR. CAMERON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to the statement contained in an interpellation to the French Government, of which, according to a Reuter's Despatch dated Paris, 19th June, M. Deloncle has given notice to the effect that in 1862 Lord Cowley, on behalf of Great Britain, and M. Thouvenel, on behalf of France, signed a declaration by which the two countries mutually agreed not to interfere with the independence of Zanzibar, and that Germany gave her adhesion to this declaration in 1862; and whether any such agreement as that alleged was entered into between France and this country; and, if so, was the consent of France to the abrogation of the agreement obtained before entering into the arrangement regarding Zanzibar, announced in Lord Salisbury's Despatch to Sir E. Malet of the 14th inst.?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The agreement in question was entered into, but Her Majesty's Government are not of opinion that it is interfered with by the assumption of a Protectorate of the dominions of the Sultan with his full consent.

*DR. CAMERON: Is it true, as stated in an Exchange telegram published this afternoon, that satisfactory communication has passed between the French and English Governments on the subject of the Protectorate of Zanzibar?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: No, Sir; that is not true. I can only say that information of the intention of England to assume this Protectorate has been conveyed to the French Government, but it had not reached the hands of the Minister when he made his speech on the matter to the French Assembly. Information has been conveyed, but no reply has yet been received.

MILITIA NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War why non-commissioned officers of Militia Corps (on Army engagement), performing the duties of pay sergeants of companies during training, are not remunerated in the same manner as those performing similar duties in the Regular Forces?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The allowance given to the Regular Forces was granted when the captain's contingent allowance was modified. No change has been made for the present in the contingent allowance of the Militia captains; but should any be adopted, the subject raised by the hon. Member will not be lost sight of.

THE INLAND REVENUE DEPARTMENT.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether in the case of entailed estates it is the practice of the Inland Revenue Department on the succession of each heir to charge any Probate, Succession, or other Death Duty in respect of heirlooms such as jewels, gold and silver plate, books, &c., often of great value; if so, upon what scale; and, if not, can he explain on what grounds?

MR. GOSCHEN: Heirlooms, such as jewels, plate, pictures, and books, are charged with Probate Duty as part of the personal estate of the deceased person who, by his will, directs them to be held as heirlooms; but they are not charged with any Legacy or Succession Duty so long as they are enjoyed in kind only by any person or persons not having any power of selling or disposing thereof, so as to convert the same into money or other property yielding an income; but when the heirlooms are actually sold or disposed of, or come to any person having power to sell or dispose thereof, or having an absolute interest therein, then Legacy or Succession Duty is exacted as upon any other legacy or succession.

DR. KENNY (Cork, S.): Is it true that in regard to the Hamilton heirlooms no duty has been charged upon them, and will Succession Duty be not charged as the result of the sale of the so-called heirlooms?

MR. GOSCHEN asked for notice of the question.

METROPOLITAN POST OFFICE COUNTERMEN.

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I had intended to ask the Postmaster General whether he has received a Petition from the countermen of the metropolitan postal districts, which was transmitted to him through the Postmaster of the West Central district on the 13th of last month, asking him to favour a Committee of their class with an interview; and whether, seeing that he recently granted a similar application to the telegraphists and sorters, he will accede to the request of the countermen? I will postpone the question until to-morrow.

IRELAND—CHARGES AGAINST THE POLICE.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has seen the Report of the proceedings at the Rathmore (County Kerry) Petty Sessions on the 14th instant, from which it appears that a number of men were charged with having assaulted the police, and that two of the police assaulted (Constables O'Connor and Lett), who were at the time carrying rifles, admitted that they had been drinking previous to the occurrence; whether the two policemen, Burns and Cullinane, concerned in the disturbance at Timoleague, County Cork, on the 3rd of September last, in which Daniel Donohoe lost his life by a revolver shot fired by Constable Cullinane, also admitted that they had been drinking previous to the occurrence; whether his attention has been called to the increasing frequency of cases of this kind, pointing to the spread of drinking habits among the Irish police; and, whether the rule which formerly existed, prohibiting constables from drinking or visiting public houses while on duty, is still in force; and, if not, when and why it was abrogated?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The case referred to in the first paragraph is sub judice, having been adjourned to the 30th instant. With regard to the general allegation as to increase of drunkenness amongst the Royal Irish Constabulary, the Inspector General informs me that, having given special attention to this point, he is able to state that offences of this kind have, during recent years, very much declined. It is at present, and always has been, a strict rule of the Service that men should not enter a public house when on duty, unless the duty itself requires their presence.

THE CLANRICARDE TENANTRY.

MR. ROCHE (Galway, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Mr. Timothy Clarke is at present undergoing a sentence of three months' imprisonment in consequence of his signing the Relieving Officer's book, in his capacity as Guardian in the Portumna Union, for outdoor relief given to Lord Clanricarde's evicted tenants, and for which he was surcharged by the Local Government Auditor, summoned before Petty Sessions Court, and ordered to be imprisoned for the above term; whether it is a fact that on a former occasion Mr. John Eyre, J.P., late Chairman of the same Board, signed the Relieving Officer's book for a sum four times the amount given by Mr. Clarke; whether Mr. Eyre, although surcharged by the Auditor in the amount signed for by him, and decreed at Petty Sessions for same, no attempt was made to levy the amount, and no punishment was inflicted upon him for his default; and if he will explain why such different treatment was accorded to these two Guardians?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that Mr. Clarke was proceeded against in the circumstances stated in the first paragraph, and that the Magistrate issued a warrant of distress for the amount, £47 10s., with the alternative penalty of three months' imprisonment. Upwards of two and a half years previously Mr. John Eyre was proceeded against for a surcharge of £40 10s., a decree obtained, and a warrant issued to levy the amount, which, however, proved unproductive. The failure in Mr. Eyre's case and some other cases about the same time arose from the fact that the proceedings were taken under the 28th section of the 10th Vict., chap. 31, which gives no power to the Magistrates to order imprisonment in the event of failure to distrain. To obviate the possibility of a recurrence of a miscarriage of this nature, the auditor has brought all cases since then under Sections 95 and 103 of the 1st & 2nd Vic., chap. 56, which gives the power of imprisonment in the event of the amount of the surcharge not being recovered.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Has the attention of the Lord Chancellor been called to the case of Mr. Eyre, who is a Magistrate and a man of substance?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That question does not arise out of the question on the Paper. I was simply asked why two different modes of procedure were taken in two separate and distinct cases. I have pointed out that the proceedings in the first case were abortive.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is it the fact that a Conservative Magistrate escaped scot-free, while a Nationalist got three months?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The procedure in Mr. Eyre's case was at the time the usual procedure.

BELFAST POST OFFICE.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to defer until to-morrow a question of which I have given notice, to ask the Postmaster General whether seven members of the first class of clerks in the Telegraph Department of the Belfast Post Office hold the additional appointment of provincial clerks in charge; whether five of these had this appointment bestowed upon them in recognition of long service, and in consequence of their having been, at the time at which it was conferred, superseded in promotion to the first class; if so, upon what grounds were they permitted to retain this appointment, subsequently, on receiving promotion to the first class; whether the discharge of the duties incident to that of provincial clerks in charge obliges the holders of the position to be absent for long periods from Belfast; and, if so, have their duties during their absence to be discharged by members of the second class without any extra remuneration, and does their absence also cause present members of the first class, who are not provincial clerks in charge, to be more frequently employed upon night duty; and, if this be so, whether he will constitute the present holders of the position of provincial clerks in charge supernumeraries upon the staff of the Belfast office, and promote an equivalent number of the second class to be members of the first class, so that members of this class shall not be called upon to undertake responsible first class duties without the emoluments appertaining to the position?

THE LONDON COMPANIES IRISH ESTATES.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what are the amounts still held by the Purchase Commissioners for "the Fifth" Guarantees retained by them in the case of the sales of the London Companies' estates in Derry; and can any hope be held out that the Government will introduce Amendments in the Purchase Bill to prevent these amounts being paid over to the companies until the question of the liability of these bodies to the trusts for religion and education in Ireland, imposed by their charters, has been settled?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners report that the guarantee deposits held by them to the credit of the London Companies in respect of sales on their estates are as follows:—Drapers' Company, £19,156; Salters' Company, £46,418; Skinners' Company, £26,884; Fishmongers' Company, (including £237 lodged by the purchasers), £24,174. I hardly think an Amendment in the Purchase of Land Bill of the nature suggested by the hon. and learned Member is necessary, inasmuch as under the Ashbourne Act the question of paying over these guarantee deposits will not arise for some 20 years after the date of purchase.

POLICE "SHADOWING."

MR. P. O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to a report in the Freeman's Journal of the 11th instant, in which it is alleged that the Rev. Fathers O'Doherty, Callan, and Shiel, of Carrickmacross and Donaghmoyn, in the County of Monaghan, were shadowed by four police constables on several Sundays and holydays, recently, while attending the chapels of Corcreagh, Corduff, and Donaghmoyn, for the purpose of celebrating Mass and discharging the other functions of their sacred office; that Fathers Callan and O'Dwyer were on several occasions shadowed by police to the houses of persons whom they were called to attend to in serious illness; whether this report is correct; and, if so, has he any objection to state the grounds and the authority upon which this police shadowing is carried on; and will he order it to be discontinued?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that it is the case that the rev. gentlemen referred to have been watched by the police in so far as it was necessary to prevent them from holding meetings of the National League, which has been suppressed in that district as an unlawful association, in consequence of the boycotting and intimidation practised by it there. Two of these rev. gentlemen openly in chapel advised their congregations to defy the law in this respect, one of them asking for subscriptions for the purpose, and directing his hearers, if the policemen asked them any questions, to tell them a bundle of lies; that to do so was no sin—not even a venial one. On one occasion when the police were following Mr. O'Doherty he entered a house where a sick person was. The police at once passed on for about a distance of a quarter of a mile, where they remained. The police observation of these rev. gentlemen will, of course, cease immediately upon their ceasing from their attempts to defy the law.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: Will the right hon. Gentleman name any day in last month when these gentlemen attended an illegal meeting. Is it not the fact that they were watched in consequence of the boycotting of a railway company, and seeing that they have triumphed, as the people always will, is there any reason for watching them now?

[No answer was given.]

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state the number of persons "shadowed" in Ireland, and the number "watched" by the police, and the number of policemen engaged in these operations? I have also to ask the right hon. Gentleman if it would be possible to grant a Return, giving the names and addresses of the persons "shadowed" or "watched" by the police in Ireland, and the causes therefore, for each year since 1884; and, if not, can he give the numbers respectively in each year?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that it would be impossible to state accurately the number of persons watched by the police from time to time, and the number of the latter who discharge this along with their other duties, as the necessity varies from day to day. It would be impracticable, but even if practicable inexpedient in the public interest, to give a nominal Return of the nature indicated in the second question. But I am informed that, speaking generally, the present number of suspects in Ireland is believed to be very inconsiderable, as compared with the earlier years under the administration of the right hon. Gentleman opposite.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman state who or what the suspects were. But the point of my question was, How many persons are now shadowed in Ireland?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think I have answered the question of the hon. Member.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I suppose I could not have made my point clear. I want a distinct answer as to the number of persons now shadowed in Ireland.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have told the hon. and learned Gentleman that it is impossible for me to give the information asked for.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Does the inability of the right hon. Gentleman to provide the information arise out of his reluctance to give it, or from the number being so large that it is beyond computation?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, it is not beyond the powers of computation. It arises largely from the fact that the necessities vary from day to day.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Can the right hon. Gentleman give the House the number shadowed on any particular day?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will consider that question, but I am afraid that no accurate inference could be drawn from it.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then to-morrow I will ask the right hon. Gentleman to give the number for a week.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary whether it is true that Mr. James O'Brien, of Killeagh, was arrested at Youghal Fair, last Monday, by a common policeman in plain clothes, who was occupied in closely "shadowing" Mr. O'Brien; and if he can explain why Mr. Redmond, R.M., was specially telegraphed for to investigate the charge of this gentleman accused of obstructing his "shadow"? I would further ask whether it is a fact that Mr. O'Brien was kept in a black hole, in a filthy unsanitary condition, for several hours, during which the Prison Authorities treated him with the utmost cruelty?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; I should think the matter alleged in the further question is not a fact. The Constabulary Authorities report that O'Brien was arrested by a constable in uniform on a charge of wilfully obstructing a constable on detective duty in plain clothes. The charge being brought under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act the attendance of a Resident Magistrate was necessary.

DR. TANNER: Was the constable who arrested Mr. O'Brien "shadowing" him in an offensive way, and is it the fact that the only charge laid against Mr. O'Brien was that he followed the constable in question?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I know nothing about the second part of the question. With regard to the first part the policeman who followed Mr. O'Brien was in uniform.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): Is it the fact that when Mr. O'Brien was brought before a Magistrate he asked to see a solicitor and a friend, and that both requests were denied, as also was an offer which he made to find bail in £1,000 to answer any charge that might be made against him? Further, is it the fact that Mr. O'Brien was insulted by the policeman and beaten, that when taken to prison he was stripped naked, and that his clothes, which were taken from him under the plea that it was necessary to search him, were not returned to him for 24 hours?

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): Why was Mr. O'Brien arrested at all instead of being summoned in the ordinary way?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must ask for notice of these questions.

DR. TANNER: I will put a question on the Paper to-morrow about the scandalous and blackguardly behaviour—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member must observe Parliamentary propriety in his questions.

DR. KENNY: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that last year, when the two hon. Members for Clare (Mr. Cox and Mr. Jordan) attended at Ennis in response to a summons sent to them by the Registrar of the Clare Infirmary, of which institution they are Governors, to take part in the election of a physician to the infirmary, they were shadowed by the police during their entire stay in Ennis, and that during the entire time the election above mentioned was proceeding a police guard was stationed in the immediate vicinity of the infirmary, and whether he can state by whose direction the police acted in the manner above described?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that the hon. Members in question were watched by a policeman, who had a reason to suppose that they were going to hold an illegal meeting. No police guard was stationed at or near the infirmary.

MR. SEXTON: Was there any "shadowing" by the police at the last fair at Dungarvan, County Waterford, as there had been at every previous fair in the same place for some time past, and have any instructions to restrain or restrict the practice of "shadowing" been lately issued on the part of the Government to any officials in Ireland?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The authorities report that the police had instructions to watch for any boycotting, but no boycotting was attempted. No instructions have lately been issued to restrain or restrict the practice called "shadowing."

LICENCES.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been called to the unanimous judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland, of the 17th instant, upholding a decision of the Justices at Lurgan Quarter Sessions on 28th May, refusing to grant a transfer to Patrick Blayney of a licence for the house, 49, Church Street, Lurgan, held by his brother, the late James Blayney, on the ground of the "unfitness of the applicant" and "the unsuitability of the premises"; has he observed that it was proved in the case as follows: that the house in question was licensed for 70 years, and no objections had been made against the persons who held the licence during that time; that Patrick Blayney died in March, leaving the house to James Blayney, who got a protection order enabling him to carry on the business until the Quarter Sessions; that on the case coming before the Quarter Sessions, six Magistrates voted against the transfer, and five in favour of it; that the County Court Judge (Judge Kisbey) made it a rule not to vote on these cases, but intimated that if he did vote he would have voted in favour of the transfer; that the police made no objection to the transfer, but it was opposed on behalf of the Lurgan United Temperance Association; that there was no other opposition of any kind; that the house was large and commodious; that the applicant resided a mile and a half from the house, but his son resided on the premises, and was 30 years of age; that Chief Justice O'Brien said the police appeared to have rather supported the application; that the only suggestion as to the "unfitness of the applicant" was that he was a Catholic, while the majority of the Justices were Protestants; and that, nevertheless, the Queen's Bench felt constrained to refuse even a conditional order to quash the Justices' decision on the ground that the matter was purely within their discretion; was Probate Duty charged on the licence-asset in this case during the 70 years the licence lasted; and will orders be given after this decision, and that of "Sharp v. Wakefield," that Probate Duty shall no longer be levied on licensed property; or will a test case be taken to decide whether a licence is a mere precarious asset or a practically permanent property?

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): Before the right hon. Gentleman answers that question may I ask whether it is not a fact that the "large and commodious" premises in question were only 13 feet in front, and 26 feet in depth, that they were old and dilapidated, had a thatched roof and an unclosed garden, that was open day and night?

MR. GOSCHEN: I cannot answer that question. With regard to the question on the Paper I have to say that, if the facts are as described by the hon. Member, it would appear that the Queen's Bench Division refused the application for a conditional order to quash the Justices' decision on the ground that the matter was within their discretion, and that they had found the applicant unfit and the premises unsuitable. No probate was charged on the will of the late Mr. James Blayney (not Mr. Patrick Blayney), who died in March of this year, as the gross assets were sworn under £100, and the licence was not accounted for an asset, being probably considered of no value, as the concern is a very small one. The same circumstances have probably applied to the licence in question during the last 70 years. This decision, and that of "Sharp v. Wakefield," do not convince me that Probate Duty should not be levied on licences. When the goodwill of licences ceases to be bought and sold for valuable considerations, then the time will come to consider whether Probate Duty shall cease to be levied on licensed property.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is it a fact that after a licence had been attached to the premises for 70 years it rests with the Magistrates to take it away. Will the Government allow a test case to be taken to see whether it is legal to continue to charge Probate Duty under the circumstances detailed in the question?

MR. GOSCHEN: Probate Duty is not in the first instance assessed by the Government. It is brought in in the schedule of assets by the executors of a deceased person. If there is no value put on the licence asset, there ought to be.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he will lay upon the Table, as Parliamentary Papers, the following documents in connection with the licensing case of "Sharp v. Wakefield;" the statement of the case, and the judgments delivered in the Court of Appeal?

*MR. RITCHIE: I have made inquiries as to the case of "Blunt v. Byrne," which was cited by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton as a precedent for the hon. Member's proposal. I find that there was no authorised record of that case until the Report revised by the Judge was printed as a Parliamentary Paper, it not being the practice to include Jury cases in the Irish Law Reports. There is, therefore, a clear distinction between that case and the case of "Sharp v. Wakefield." But, apart altogether from any question of precedent, I remain of opinion that in the latter case there is no good reason to supplement the authorised Law Reports in the manner proposed.

IRISH LIGHT RAILWAYS.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the West Donegal Railway Company, which is promoting the proposed Light Railway to Killybegs, in the County of Donegal, is notoriously insolvent, judgments having been marked against it for the price of rolling stock, and proceedings for a Receiver being pending; whether the company is largely in arrear for both principal and interest to the Treasury on foot of previous advances; whether the granting of State aid to a company so circumstanced is a violation of the principle laid down by Parliament in Section 4, Sub-section 3, of "The Light Railways Act, 1889"; and whether the Killybegs line is that promoted by Mr. Barton, and reported on by Mr. Price?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I am not aware that the hon. Member is justified in stating that the West Donegal Railway Company is "notoriously insolvent." The company has not yet begun to repay the principal of its debt to the Board of Works; but it is paying over £1,300 a year on account of the £1,600 due for interest, and the Revenue prospects are encouraging. Section 4, Sub-section 3 of the Light Railway Act, 1889, forbids the advance of a loan to a company in arrear with principal and interest, or to a company having a working agreement with a company in arrear. It is not, however, proposed to make any loan to this company. As regards the last paragraph, it would be equally true to say that Major General Hutchinson of the Board of Trade reported on the Killybegs line.

MR. CLANCY: The right hon. Gentleman says it is not intended to make a loan to the railway. Is it intended to make a grant to it?

MR. JACKSON: I am not in a position to say. That was not the question put to me. The question was, whether the Light Railways Act of 1889 forbids the granting of State aid. It does not forbid State aid, but it does forbid a loan.

MR. CLANCY: What guarantee has the Government for the making of the line, seeing that the company by whom it is promoted have been unable to pay their way. Do the Government propose to make a grant to a Railway Company in regard to whom it is not sure that they will be able to pay the working expenses of the line?

MR. JACKSON: The accounts would have to be audited by a person appointed by the Treasury.

MR. CLANCY: Is a grant to be given in this case because the line is promoted by Mr. Barton?

MR. JACKSON: I am not in a position to say that a grant is going to be made, and certainly not because the line is promoted by Mr. Barton.

MR. CLANCY: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether there is any intention or proposal to appoint Mr. Barton, C.E., one of the promoters of the Killybegs Light Railway line, to any position in connection with the construction of light railways in Ireland, in which he would be placed in authority over the projects of rival promoters; and whether, if the Treasury sanction a grant in favour of the Killybegs line, they will put up the further engineering of it in competition?

MR. JACKSON: I am not aware of any such intention.

FAIR RENTS.

MR. LALOR (Queen's Co., Leix): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state the number of cases of appeals from the fair rents fixed by the Sub-Commission for Queen's County that were disposed of by the Chief Commission at its recent sitting; and in how many cases were the rents fixed by the Sub - Commissions reduced, confirmed, and increased respectively ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners report that 60 Queen's County appeals were listed for hearing at the recent sitting of the Court. Of these, 15 were cross appeals, leaving 45 cases for hearing at the sitting, which were disposed of as follows:—19 withdrawn, seven settled, seven confirmed, six rents raised by the Courts, one rent raised on enlarged area, one rent raised on consent, one adjourned in consequence of death of the party, two adjourned by request of the parties, and one stands over for judgment.

MR. BARRY, P.L.G.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether a warrant has been issued for the arrest of Mr. Barry, P.L.G., at the instance of a policeman named Drought, against whom Mr. Barry had previously instituted legal proceedings ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that the defendant, having failed to appear to a summons on a charge of assaulting the sergeant, a warrant was issued for his arrest.

TREATMENT OF POLITICAL PRISONERS.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the manner in which the police escort behaved to two political prisoners, Messrs. Thomas and William Kent, who were brought from the County Court Gaol to a Court held in Fermoy on Monday the 16th of June, under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act ; and why and for what reason were the prisoners handcuffed ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that the prisoners mentioned were handcuffed at the request of the prison officer who had them in charge with the object of producing them in Court under a writ of habeas corpus. The handcuffs were only used when passing through crowds with a small police escort. On the return journey handcuffs were not used, the escort having been increased.

THE BISHOP OF DERRY.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been called to the letter of the Most Rev. Dr. O'Doherty, Bishop of Derry, in the Freeman's Journal of the 20th instant, in reference to his statement that

"The Prisons Board were most anxious that the Bishop should nominate a clergyman (to be chaplain of Derry Gaol), and they requested him to do so, but up to the present he had taken no action ;"

whereas his Lordship asserts that, although elected Bishop on 2nd October and consecrated on 2nd March, he never since, directly or indirectly, received any communication from the Prisons Board ; can any explanation of the discrepancy be given ; what were "the evil effects of the action of the Roman Catholic Bishop" of which he complained ; and did Sir Lintorn Simmons, while in Rome, or any other English official, make any representations to the Ecclesiastical Authorities of the Catholic Church upon the action of the Lord Bishop of Derry or his clergy ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not seen the letter referred to. Apparently, the Bishop trusted to the Freeman's Journal report. I mentioned the vicar capitular. There is, therefore, no discrepancy. It was presumed that the new Bishop would be acquainted with business affecting the diocese brought before the locum tenens who presided over the See. I am glad to think that the failure to appoint a chaplain may be due to this opinion being erroneous. The matter has been now formally brought to the attention of the present Bishop. The last question should be addressed to the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs.

MR. T. M. HEALY: What does the right hon. Gentleman refer to when he speaks of evil effects ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I stated before that the evil effects of the failure of the Roman Catholic Authorities were that a great number of prisoners of that religion are deprived of the religious services of their Church.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman apologise to the Bishop for this statement ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is not necessary to apologise to him; if he will read the account of what passed in the fuller report in the Times, he will see that the only attack, if it can be said that I made any attack, was that either he did not consider himself bound to know what took place while his predecessor was in office, or, having made himself acquainted with what had taken place, he did not take the necessary steps to appoint a chaplain.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman says he does not read the Freeman's Journal; does he expect the Roman Catholic Bishops to read the Times?

RIFLE RANGES IN IRELAND.

MR. J. REDMOND (Wexford, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is the intention of Government to rent or purchase, at Castlecomer, a new rifle range for the use of troops stationed at Kilkenny; whether, about five years ago, on the advice of experienced officers, the lease of the rifle range at Duncannon was renewed at a yearly rental of £130, and that this lease has still many years to run; whether any difficulty has been found in accommodating troops in the excellent barracks at Duncannon Fort, and in tents in the Fort; and whether he can explain on what grounds it has been determined to give up this old station, and to sacrifice many hundreds of pounds which must be paid to the owners of the Duncannon range during the unexpired years of the lease?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: In an answer given to the hon. Member for North Kilkenny on the 26th November, 1888, it was shown that a range in the neighbourhood of Kilkenny was much required, but that serious local difficulties had occurred in acquiring the necessary ground at Castlecomer. Those difficulties are now, I hope, about to be overcome, and a range will be formed for the troops in Kilkenny. The range at Duncannon Fort is held for 21 years from 1885, at a rental of £125 a year, and it will still be used for the troops at Waterford and Wexford. There is no difficulty in accommodating troops at Duncannon Fort; but a large expense in transport will be saved if a range be established near Kilkenny.

SCHOOLS AT TIPPERARY.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has seen the statement in the Times of the 20th instant, to the effect that a number of children attending the Convent and National Schools, Tipperary, left, because the children of some policemen were received as pupils; that they marched through the streets in a body, and were eventually dispersed by the police; and what was the reason for their dispersal?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that it is the case that on the 18th, 19th, and 20th instant children stayed away from the Convent and National Schools, Tipperary, on account of the children of the police and other boycotted people attending those schools. On the 18th the procession was not disorderly, and was not interfered with. On the 19th it was disorderly, and two flags were taken from it, whereupon it dispersed. On the 20th some grown lads joined the procession, stones were thrown from it at a tenant who was believed to have paid his rent. A little girl was seriously injured by being struck upon the head with one of the stones. Two policemen arriving upon the scene, the procession dispersed.

PRISON WARDERS.

MR. O'KEEFFE (Limerick, City): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, as the Prisons Board have reported that one warder has complained of being subjected to annoyance in public while wearing the prison official uniform, if such warder has attributed such annoyance arose from belief that warders were engaged in odious duties as regards Irish political prisoners?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The warder referred to did not make any such allegation as that suggested in the question. His objection was one on general grounds. He mentioned one instance in which a drunken man had insulted him.

TULLAMORE GAOL.

MR. O'KEEFFE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will direct the discontinuance of the rule that after every interview of a solicitor with a client in an Irish gaol, as admitted in the case of the interview of Mr. J. J. O'Meara and Mr. M'Enery in Tullamore Prison last week, "that such prisoner is searched;" whether on the occasion of the visit of Mr. M'Gough, solicitor to Mr. Finucane, M.P., last year in the same prison, the interview took place in a private room, and not in a corridor in sight of warders, as in Mr. M'Enery's case; and if he will explain the reason of the change?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The General Prisons Board report that the question of searching of prisoners for prohibited articles lies in the discretion of the Governor, who is responsible for preventing the introduction of such articles into the prison. On the occasion referred to in the second paragraph the prisoner was in hospital, and the interview was in one of the vacant wards, but, as usual, under the observation of an officer, through an opening in the door.

THE OLPHERT ESTATE.

MR. DALTON (Donegal, W.) postponed until Tuesday a question to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been drawn to the proceedings at Falcarragh Petty Sessions, on Tuesday the 17th, in which a man named Peter M'Ginley was charged by a bailiff on the Olphert Estate named Conaghan with assault, and in which, on a cross summons, Conaghan was charged by M'Ginley with assault and with having presented a revolver at him and threatened to shoot him, and to the decision of the Court, consisting of two Resident Magistrates, that, though Conaghan's conduct was reprehensible in this case and generally in going about the country with a revolver and threatening to shoot people M'Ginley should be imprisoned for a fortnight and then be held to bail to keep the peace for 12 months, while Conaghan should be held to bail merely; whether he will direct the attention of the Lord Lieutenant to this decision with a view to the remission of at least the latter part of the sentence inflicted on M'Ginley, who would appear to have acted only in self-defence against a murderous attack on his life; whether the bailiff Conaghan was given a licence to carry firearms; and, if so, by whom, and whether his licence will now be withdrawn; and whether, in view of the fact that this is the third instance within a recent period of human life being threatened in the Falcarragh district by persons licensed to carry firearms, a revision of the list of persons so licensed will be ordered with a view to the removal from it of the names of all persons who have abused the privilege conferred upon them, or who have not furnished satisfactory guarantees that they will use the privilege with discretion?

FERMOY PETTY SESSIONS.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland by whose orders were two Magistrates present at the Fermoy Petty Sessions to hear a summons for assault brought by Mr. Barber, a newspaper correspondent of Fermoy, against a policeman named Kelly, on Monday the 16th instant; whether it is usual for two Resident Magistrates to attend ordinary Sessions; and, whether Mr. Hodder, R.M., is a Magistrate for the County Clare?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Two Resident Magistrates attended at Fermoy on the occasion in question to adjudicate in cases under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act. It is not usual for two Resident Magistrates to attend ordinary Petty Sessions, except where they may happen to be available or their services required; the reply to the inquiry in the last paragraph is in the affirmative.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

MR. H. T. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the large and increasing expenditure of time consumed by the putting and answering of questions, many of them involving matters of no public importance, the Government will consider the possibility of dealing with this serious hindrance to public business by restricting the number of questions to be put by any one Member; by not allowing a question to be put by proxy or to be put a second time, should the Member putting it on the Paper not be in his place when called upon; by limiting the number of questions to be put to a fixed number, Members to ballot for places, except in the case of a question asked by special leave of Mr. Speaker; or by fixing a certain time, say half an hour, as the time permitted for questions?

*Mr. W. H. SMITH: I am quite sensible of the great waste of time that takes place in consequence of the great increase in the number of questions; but I am afraid the only way of altering the present system would be by new Rules of Procedure, and the time will not admit of such a course.

Mr. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): On this subject may I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he has considered the suggestion made to him the other day that the Irish Constabulary Vote should be taken on an early day?

*Mr. W. H. SMITH: I do not know whether that question arises out of this, but I will endeavour to make arrangements for taking the Irish Constabulary Vote as soon as possible consistently with the other business.

THE LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN.

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in accordance with his promise made on 12th November, 1888, he has examined carefully into the status of the Law Officers of the Crown, in order to see whether it would be advisable that they should continue to be allowed to take private practice; what conclusion the Government have come to on the subject; and what steps they propose to take in order to prevent the public duties of the Law Officers from being interfered with by their private practice?

*Mr. W. H. SMITH: The question has been receiving the careful consideration of Her Majesty's Government; but, as I have stated before, it is one more for the decision of a future Government, as no change is practicable while the present Law Officers are in office. I may say, however, that no inconvenience or injury to the public interests will be caused by the present practice.

THE SWEATING SYSTEM.

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury
Mr. H. T. Knatchbull-Hugessen

whether the Government have abandoned the idea of legislating this Session in accordance with the suggestions contained in the Report of the Lords Committee on the Sweating System.

*Mr. W. H. SMITH: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary informs me that he is preparing a Bill on this most important subject, and that there are some amendments to the existing law which, if the general consent of Members interested was forthcoming, might even, in what remains of the Session, be passed into law. The Government could not attempt to deal this Session with any controversial parts of the subject.

THE LOCAL TAXATION BILL.

Mr. CAINE (Barrow-in-Furness): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if it is the intention of the Government to proceed with the extinction of licences clauses of the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties Bill?

*Mr. W. H. SMITH: The Government have had under their consideration the Amendments on the Paper to this Bill, and the nature of the opposition directed against it, and they have arrived at the conclusion that it is practically impossible in the present state of public business to pass the Bill in its entirety without calling on the House to submit to sacrifices the Government do not feel themselves justified in imposing. The licensing proposals in the Bill consists of three parts—(1) The allocation of a certain portion of the new taxation on intoxicating liquor for the purpose of extinguishing licences; (2) the power proposed to be conferred on County Councils to purchase and extinguish licences; (3) the suspension of the issue of new licences. The first of these proposals has received the assent of the House, both on the Second Reading of the Bill and after much discussion in Committee, so far as England is concerned. The Government, therefore, propose to proceed with the clauses dealing with the same point so far as Scotland and Ireland are concerned, thus setting aside the sum originally allocated for this special purpose. So far as the second part is concerned—the conferring of power on the County Councils to purchase licences—the Government do not propose to proceed with these clauses, at which the great bulk of the Amendments are directed, but they will ask the House to insert words the effect of which will be to allow the fund for the extinction of licences to accumulate until Parliament deals with the whole licensing question. This is very similar to the Amendment proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Bradford. The third part of the licensing portion of the Bill is one which it is believed commends itself to all Parties in the House, I mean the suspension of the issue of new licences, and the Government propose to proceed with it. It will thus be seen that the practical result of the change proposed by the Government will be that the money will remain earmarked for the purpose of the extinction of licences under any general reform of the Licensing Laws to which Parliament may assent; but that until this takes place the money, instead of being available for the purpose of extinction of licences by the County Councils, will be allowed to accumulate. Accordingly, Sub-section 2 of the clause now under consideration, as amended, will read that—

“The sum of £50,000 shall be applied to the purpose of such extinction of licences in Scotland as may be hereafter provided by any Act amending the Licensing Acts, and until such Act is passed shall be invested and accumulated as provided by this Act.”

According to this, Clauses 5, 6, and 7 will disappear from the Bill.

MR. CAINE: Arising out of the question, I wish to ask whether it is the intention of the Government during the present Parliament to introduce any measure amending the Licensing Laws so that this Amendment may be applied?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think the hon. Gentleman must be satisfied to postpone any question of that kind until we have arrived at a further stage in the history of the present Parliament.

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): May I be allowed to give notice that there are a number of us who will oppose as steadfastly as we possibly can any proposal to vote any money to the purchase or extinction of licences.

THE METROPOLITAN POLICE.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I should like to ask a question of the right hon. Gentleman of which I have given him private notice—whether, in view of the anxiety at present prevailing with regard to the Metropolitan Police Force, he will make arrangements for the speedy settlement of the question by proceeding with the Police Superannuation Bill, and fixing the Second Reading for—I would suggest—tomorrow?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I trust the announcement I have made will shorten discussion on the Licensing Bill. I think it ought to do so, and therefore I hope that it will be in the power of the Government to propose the Second Reading of the Police Bill next week at the latest. Certainly it will follow on this Bill as soon as it is possible to make arrangements.

CIVIL SERVANTS.

MR. SAMUELSON (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he will state how many Civil servants over the age of 70 years are drawing salaries of £500 and upwards, and what total number of years' service under the Crown each of these has given, including broken and continuous service; whether in the interests of economy and the efficiency of the service, and considering the probable paucity of such veterans, he will consider the advisability of retiring them upon pensions as liberal as can be granted under Section 9 of “The Superannuation Act, 1859,” such pensions to be based upon the total number of years they have served under the Crown, irrespectively of the total period of service having been broken?

MR. JACKSON: There are no central records immediately available which would enable me to answer the first part of the hon. Member's question. There is power to require the retirement on the ordinary pension rates of any officer who is unequal to the performance of the duties of his position, and the Royal Commission on Civil Establishments has reported in favour of the retirement of Civil servants at 65 on ordinary pension. Section 9 of the Superannuation Act only permits special pensions to be given in recompense for special service, and it is not, therefore, applicable to the cases mentioned by the hon. Member.

DERRY GAOL.

MR. HARRISON (Tipperary, Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Report made on the sanitary condition of Derry Gaol by the expert who was commissioned to investigate it; also, to ask whether an official from the English Prison Department visited Derry Gaol in the autumn of 1889 with a view to professionally examining into its sanitary condition; if so, whether he is prepared to lay this official's Report upon the Table of the House?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will lay the Report.

THE LIMERIGG POST OFFICE.

MR. J. BOLTON (Stirling): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he is aware that the Sub-post Office at Limerigg, Slamannan, Stirlingshire, has been closed for about a month, to the great inconvenience of the residents in that district; and if he can state that the office will be re-opened, and when?

MR. JACKSON: I have been asked by my right hon. Friend to answer this question. The Post Office at Limerigg will be re-opened as soon as a suitable person for the situation of Sub-Postmaster can be selected and instructed in the duties of the office. The inconvenience which has been caused by the temporary closing of the office is regretted, but was unavoidable, and every effort will be made to re-open it at an early date.

H.M.S. TRIUMPH.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether his attention has been directed to the obstruction caused by the position of the present guardship Triumph stationed in Cork Harbour; whether he is aware that, in swinging at change of tides, the ship obstructs the entire channel; and why she is not moored in that part of the harbour known as the Man-of-War Roads, instead of the narrowest portion of the river near the town of Cove?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The Triumph is so moored as to leave a sufficient passage for navigation on either side, whichever way she swings, and no complaints have been made either to the Admiralty or the Naval Authorities at Queenstown on the subject. There are serious objections to mooring the ship in the Man-of-War Roads, and as the present arrangement has been agreed to by the Cork Harbour Commissioners, I see no reason at present for any change.

GREAT TURK AND CAICOS ISLANDS.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether any inquiry will be made into the condition of the people resident in the Great Turk and Caicos Islands; and whether, considering the recent Colonial Report upon the chronic destitution there prevailing, some practical steps will be taken to relieve and remedy the poor people's pressing wants?

BARON H. DE WORMS: No such inquiry is proposed, as the Secretary of State learns from periodical Reports that the inhabitants, though not well off, are as prosperous as those of many other parts of the West Indies, and that they are cheerful and orderly. The destitution mentioned in the Report for 1888, to which I presume the hon. Member refers, was exceptional, and was caused by the hurricane; but a sum of between £800 and £1,000 appears to have been spent by the local Relief Committee upon the sufferers by that calamity. The prosperity of the poorer class depends chiefly on the salt industry, which fluctuates from year to year, but it is hoped that the fibre industry will shortly be introduced. The Commissioners of Turks Islands have spared no pains to ameliorate the condition of the people; a savings bank has been established, and has been eagerly taken advantage of; and mail communication with the islands has been improved.

HELIGOLAND.

LORD H. BRUCE (Wilts, Chippenham): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, before Heligoland is handed over to a Foreign Power, the wishes of the inhabitants will be consulted as to their remaining under the Union Jack?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I am afraid I must ask my noble Friend to be satisfied with the numerous answers which have been already given on the subject. We believe the Agreement to be one which will certainly not be to the disadvantage of the Heligolanders.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): Will the right hon. Gentleman state to the House whether the question of the cession of Heligoland did not come from Germany?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am sure that the hon. Member will see that that is a question which ought not to be put in this House.

MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any steps have been taken to ascertain the views of the inhabitants of Heligoland on the subject of the proposed cession of the island to Germany; and whether it is intended that, in the event of the cession taking place, the inhabitants shall be liable to military service?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: No steps have been taken to ascertain the views of the inhabitants of Heligoland. It is intended that all existing inhabitants shall be exempted from compulsory military service.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask whether a recent demonstration in Heligoland has not proved conclusively that the inhabitants wish to remain connected with this country; and whether the attention of the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs has been drawn to the statement in the Pall Mall Gazette that the people are extremely hostile to the proposed cession of the island?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I have no official information of these statements.

NEWFOUNDLAND.

MR. W. REDMOND: I will ask whether any information has reached the Foreign Office with regard to the alleged conflict between French and Newfoundland fishermen, and what steps the Government propose to take to bring the dispute to a settlement?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am not in a position to answer that question. Perhaps the hon. Member will put it down for to-morrow.

MR. W. REDMOND: I will.

ALLEGED SHADOWING OF ENGLISH LADIES IN IRELAND.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland by what authority and upon what evidence or suspicion of crime or criminal intent were three English ladies shadowed by the police in Tipperary on or about the 8th or 9th of July of last year?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that no English ladies were shadowed at Tipperary last July, as alleged in the question.

MR. CONYBEARE: I stated last week the names of the three ladies who were shadowed. Does the right hon. Gentleman presume to set the statement of the Royal Irish Constabulary against the word of these ladies?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; but I think it is very likely the ladies were mistaken.

THE METROPOLITAN POLICE.

MR. H. L. W. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I wish to ask the Home Secretary whether it is true that the new Chief Commissioner of Police has forbidden the Metropolitan Police to hold meetings of any kind for the discussion of their grievances?

MR. MATTHEWS: The only prohibition of which I have heard is the prohibition of a meeting at Bow Street in special circumstances. The Commissioner of Police has prohibited that meeting, but he has informed the men that their wishes and desires can be communicated in the regular way to the Government.

THE LICENSING CLAUSES OF THE LOCAL TAXATION BILL.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): Having listened with satisfaction to the announcement of the right hon. Gentleman as to the efforts which he has made to shorten the Debates upon the Licensing Bill; and bearing in mind that we are placed in some difficulty by the fact that we are to consider at once some of the Amendments which he has announced, I would ask him, as this particular proposal does not touch the substance of the proposals of the Government, whether he will consider the propriety of giving up the earmarking of this money? That proposal has no practical effect, and I believe that the withdrawal of it would not weaken the position of the Government, and would greatly simplify the passage of a large portion of the Ministerial scheme.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I appreciate the spirit which has prompted the question of the right hon. Gentleman, but the Government cannot disregard the fact that this principle has received the approval of the House by a considerable majority. The Government do attach importance to this question. The money is to accumulate, to be at the disposal and under the direction of Parliament on future occasions. I will read the words again for the information of the right hon. Gentleman—

"The sum of £50,000 shall be applied for the purpose of such extinction of licences in Scotland as may be hereafter provided by any Act amending the Licensing Acts, and until such Act is passed shall be invested and accumulated as provided by this Act."

The money, therefore, will remain at the disposal of Parliament.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): That leaves the Irish Question exactly where it was. Are we to understand that the section applying to Ireland is to remain as it stands?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I certainly propose that the words shall stand.

SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the object of the great majority of the Scotch Members is to obtain this sum of £50,000 for the advancement of free education, and does the right hon. Gentleman propose, by pressing this ear-marking clause, to announce the determination of the Government to disappoint the nearly unanimous wish of Scotchmen?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I need hardly point out to the right hon. Gentleman that it is almost impossible to meet the wishes of everybody in this House. We are obliged to adhere to the plan we have indicated.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is not the right hon. Gentleman ashamed to announce nakedly—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. T. M. HEALY: I withdraw that expression. I recognise that I went too far; but I wish to ask, how is it that the Government are not afraid to assert nakedly that in the case of Ireland this money is to be used for the extinction of licences? Why are not the words in the Scotch and Irish clauses to be the same?
Mr. W. E. Gladstone

*MR. W. H. SMITH: There is no difference between the proposed application of the money in the case of Scotland and the application of it in the case of Ireland. The hon. and learned Member must have misunderstood my statement.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): Is there any precedent for passing an Act of Parliament for the purpose of creating a fund to be hereafter used in this or a future Parliament?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It has been done.

MR. C. J. DARLING (Deptford): I would ask whether, if this ear-marking clause is passed, it will in any way prevent Parliament from dealing with the money in another Session, or even in this, precisely as it pleases?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I know of nothing that can prevent Parliament from dealing with the money as it may think fit.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): Does the Chief Secretary intend to persevere with the provisions relating to new licences, seeing that, as drawn, they are wholly inapplicable to the condition of Ireland?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is my intention to persevere with the proposals. If it should be shown to be necessary, the words will be altered to meet the case of Ireland.

MR. D. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): Does the right hon. Gentleman intend to tell the House that if the clause applying the money to the purpose of extinguishing licences is passed, it will be possible for Parliament to deal with the money anew without first repealing the clause?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Certainly not.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I would suggest that, after the announcement of the First Lord of the Treasury, it would be advisable to postpone the further consideration of the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Bill and to proceed this evening with other Orders.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I may remind the hon. Member that the Committee have now under consideration the 1st sub-section of the clause, and that it does not involve any reference to the question of the extinction of licences. Therefore, it would be quite out of the question to adjourn it further.

SIR W. HARCOURT: But we shall come almost immediately to the 2nd sub-section, upon which the whole question will arise. I endorse the appeal of my hon. Friend that we should be given time in which to consider the character of the Government's proposals. The matter is very important, for if what the right hon. Gentleman opposite calls the ear-marking provision is inscribed in the Statute Book, supposing that in a future Session or future Parliament the House of Commons does not approve of applying the money to the purpose of the extinction of licences, it could not be applied to any other purpose without the consent of the House of Lords. We are to be committed in this Session to appropriating this money and accumulating it in future years to the purchase of licences, and that policy cannot be altered in the future without the consent of the House of Lords. If that is so, the right hon. Gentleman has done nothing to shorten the proceedings on this Bill.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think it is perhaps undesirable that I should enter into an argument on this question.

MR. T. M. HEALY: It is very desirable.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not sure whether it is perfectly in order to do so. I will only point out to the right hon. Gentleman that the proposal the Government has made was embodied in the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Bradford, and for which he voted last week.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Not to be devoted to licensing.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The effect of the proposal of the Government is substantially the same, only it is of a much more extended character, as the Amendment proposed by the right hon. Member for Central Bradford last week. The proper course, undoubtedly, is to discuss the question when we arrive at the sub-section in Committee, and I think I shall then be able to satisfy the right hon. Gentleman. But I must remind him that any Licensing Bill that may pass this House must also be considered by the House of Lords. Therefore, any change in the present system, which we all desire to see changed, must have the approval and concurrence, as I believe it will have, of the other House.

*MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman that the sub-section under discussion may be disposed of; but I earnestly appeal to the leader of the House to postpone for one day the 2nd sub-section, so as to allow Scotch Members opportunity to consider the hearing of the Government proposals.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I cannot give any promise to postpone Sub-section 2. When it is reached, the Government will hear the arguments and consider what course they will take.

MR. T. M. HEALY: What objection have the Government to withdrawing the clause? Is the First Lord of the Treasury aware that the Irish law on this subject is quite distinct from that of England?

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Is not the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Attorney General for Ireland has placed on the Paper an Amendment which simply applies the English clause to Ireland, to which it is totally inapplicable.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot venture to offer any opinion as to the value of the objection raised by my hon. Friend opposite to the Amendments of the Government as affecting Ireland; but I believe that, whatever value the objections have, they will apply equally to the Bill of the hon. Member for North Longford. I think the hon. Member will probably see that it will be convenient to deal with Ireland, England, and Scotland in one Bill if it be possible, and I will consider the best method of attaining that object.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to give notice that, as the Irish Members feel that Ireland is vitally interested in the English clause, it will be their duty to put down all their Amendments on the English clause.

THE ORDERS OF THE DAY.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I have to ask whether the attention of the leader of the House has been drawn to the condition of the Notice Paper for this day, there appearing upon it 75 Orders, 30 of which are Government Orders; and whether, in view of the late period of the Session, the right hon. Gentleman will consider the desirability of making a final and definite statement on the subject of the measures to be proceeded with by the Government this Session?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I cannot answer a question of that kind without notice. The course taken by the Government to-night is evidence of their desire to afford every opportunity to the House of making progress with business.

MR. DILLON: I shall repeat the question to-morrow, because, whatever course may be adopted with reference to the Local Taxation Bill, I think there is no hope of our transacting all this business appearing on the Order Paper.

THE INCIDENCE OF IMPERIAL TAXATION.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I wish to remind the Chancellor of the Exchequer that a long time has elapsed since the Government undertook to nominate immediately a Select Committee to inquire into the financial relations of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and I will now ask him to say definitely on what day the terms of the Reference will appear on the Paper?

MR. GOSCHEN: I think I can undertake to bring the matter forward to-morrow. So that there may be agreement on the terms of Reference, I will consult hon. Members who are interested in the subject.

THE PROCLAMATION OF A MEETING AT NORTHAMPTON.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Home Secretary whether he is aware that a meeting intended to be held in opposition to the Local Taxation Bill in the Market Place, Northampton, on Sunday, was prohibited by the Borough Magistrates on Saturday; whether the Magistrates have any right to prohibit a meeting of law-abiding citizens; and whether there is any special penalty attaching to any one attending such a meeting after this prohibition?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am afraid the question involves some difficult points of law, and I must have notice before giving a full answer. I assume that the Magistrates had reasonable ground for anticipating that there would be a breach of the peace or some disorder.

MR. BRADLAUGH: With reference to the answer just given, I will ask whether the Queen's Bench Division has not positively decided that Magistrates have no authority whatever to prohibit a meeting which seems likely to endanger the public peace; and whether this is not laid down in every recent text-book?

SIR W. LAWSON: I have to ask whether the disorder anticipated at Northampton was anticipated to come from the promoters of the meeting or from the supporters of the Government?

THE INDIAN COUNCILS BILL.

MR. BRADLAUGH: To what day will the Indian Councils Bill be postponed?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Next Monday.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to,—Municipal Elections (Scotland) Bill; Kew and Petersham Vicarage Bill, without amendments.

That they have passed a Bill intituled "An Act to amend the Law in regard to the Education of Blind and Deaf-mute Children in Scotland." Education of Blind and Deaf-Mute Children (Scotland) Bill [Lords].

MOTIONS.

POLICE (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of The Lord Advocate, Bill to make provision respecting the pensions, allowances, and gratuities of Police Constables in Scotland, and their widows and children, and to make other provisions respecting the Police of Scotland, ordered to be brought in by The Lord Advocate and Mr. Solicitor General for Scotland.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 353.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE— ABRIDGED PROCEDURE ON PARTLY CONSIDERED BILLS.

* (5.11.) MR. W. H. SMITH: In moving the appointment of the Select Committee on Procedure, I shall not detain the House for more than a few minutes, as the object in view was explained a few days ago. In submitting this Motion we have taken advantage of the experience and thought of right hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House, because it is one of those questions on which I should strongly deprecate any vital difference of opinion. During the last 50 years frequent attempts have been made to deal with this question in this and in the other House of Parliament. It has been felt that some method of procedure which would save the time of the House and enable it to be more usefully directed to the consideration of measures of great detail would be exceedingly valuable. The system suggested exists in many other Parliaments in Europe and in the Congress of the United States, and it is one which I think the Parliaments who have adopted it would be extremely loth to part with. I do not propose to enter into any long statement with regard to the Standing Order which I had intended to submit to the House. It seems to me that it would be more respectful to the Committee that they should be left perfectly free and they should be asked to consider the form of procedure. It will be the duty of the Government to submit to the Committee the Standing Order which they had drawn up, and which it had been intended to submit to the House. I will only remark that the view of the Government, as expressed in the Standing Order, was confined entirely to Bills originating in the House of Commons. It did not propose to deal with Bills which originated in the other House or which have come down to us from that House, but it was intended to provide for the House of Commons improved methods of dealing with their own Bills and Bills which require careful and exhaustive consideration. I trust I shall be excused if I refrain from doing anything more than expressing an earnest desire that the consideration of this important subject will result in an arrangement that will increase the usefulness and maintain the high character of this House. I move the Resolution.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire whether by means of an abridged form of Procedure, or otherwise, the consideration of Bills, which have been partly considered in this House could be facilitated in the next ensuing Session of the same Parliament."—
(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE: I can only say that I hope the few words I intend to speak on the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman will have the effect of promoting a speedy and summary decision. The right hon. Gentleman has exhibited a conciliatory spirit in adopting the idea that the important suggestion he desired to make to the House should go before a Select Committee—a course agreeable to precedents in similar cases and agreeable also to the reason of the case. The right hon. Gentleman has said one or two words on the subject of the Standing Order of which he had previously given notice, and into that I think it is better I should not attempt to follow him; it is better to leave the matter entirely free and open for the unprejudiced consideration of the Committee. It is obvious that under the terms of reference the Committee will be in a condition either to adopt the right hon. Gentleman's Standing Order or to recommend any other, or to suggest proceeding by Bill, or to make any report they think proper. I recognise that, in proposing a Committee of this kind, it is the duty of the Government to assume a leadership and responsibility, and to submit something to the House for its consideration. That being so, I have no doubt that my hon. Friend behind me, who gave notice of a Motion, will have something to say. But I earnestly hope that, pressed as we are with business, and having another matter immediately before us for consideration when this is disposed of, we may get to that subject as soon as possible. Therefore, I hope the House will allow the question raised by the right hon. Gentleman to be put from the Chair as speedily as possible.

(5.17.) Mr. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): Surely, Mr. Speaker, we do not require a Select Committee to tell us whether by means of an abridged form of procedure we can facilitate the business of the House. We could answer that question at once, and in the affirmative. The question is, is it desirable to adopt such a means of facilitating the business. It seems to me that the terms of reference to the Select Committee, as they are now worded, will confine the inquiry to the most formal and bald point; and, in fact, the Report of the Committee can be at once foreseen.

*(5.19.) Mr. BRADLAUGH: The Resolution is intended to effect what ought to be effected by direct enactment. There is a precedent going very near to this to be found in the 1 Geo. IV., cap. 101, sec. 4, with reference to Indian Divorce Bills, and I believe the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman, which is not yet in print, proposes to do exactly what was declared could not be done in that case, i.e., to continue Bills from one Session to another. He is proposing to do by evasion that which certainly, according to precedent, should be done by direct enactment. As this precedent does not appear in the Paper of precedents circulated this morning, I felt it my duty to call attention to it.

(5.20.) MR. WHITBREAD (Bedford): I do not want to prolong the discussion, especially after the appeal so very generously made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian, but I must say I think it is open to remark that the proposals of the Government have been made hastily and without that careful consideration which this House has always been accustomed to give when its Rules of Procedure are proposed to be altered. The timely intervention of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian saved the Government from committing a tremendous blunder, and from taking a step as revolutionary as it is possible to imagine with regard to public business. I am glad to see that now the right hon. Gentleman harks back to sound precedent in dealing with this question. I think his Motion should have been more carefully worded. He tells us now it is not proposed that this new Rule or Standing Order shall apply to Bills coming from the House of Lords. But the Notice he gave the other night said nothing about that. It is most important that the proposed Standing Order should not apply to Bills coming from the Lords, but the Order which the First Lord of the Treasury was intending to thrust upon the House said nothing about excluding such Bills. That Notice certainly excluded Money Bills and Bills coming back from the Lords with Amendments, and I should think the exclusion of those Bills meant the inclusion of all others. I, for one, should not tacitly assent to the appointment of the Committee but for the assurance of the First Lord that the Rule will not apply to Bills coming from the Lords. It would be a very grave matter to allow it to so apply. Let us take a hypothetical case. In one Session this House might be engaged on a very contentious Bill, and send it up to the Lords, who, under the Standing Order, send it over to the next Session. But, before the Session arrived, public opinion becomes so manifest against the Bill that the Government cannot rely even upon its own majority to carry the Bill. Yet, if the Lords chose, they could pass it without Amendment, and the House could not prevent them doing so. That would be a very grave thing. I protest against the modern practice of constantly rushing to a change in the Rules of Procedure to meet the temporary exigencies of the Government. The House has had nearly enough of such changes in late years, changes which have not been fortunate in their result. I doubt whether they are calculated to expedite public business. I am glad the First Lord has been prevented setting another precedent. A Parliament armed with the Closure, which was granted for the purpose of bringing protracted Debates to an end, but which has been used for the purpose of forcing through the House Bills vitally affecting the liberties of the subject—a Parliament which has been the first of all Parliaments to declare itself incompetent to deal with questions affecting the character and honour of its Members, has done enough in the way of setting bad precedents. I believe that the Parliamentary difficulty is merely a symptom on the surface. You must look much deeper for the real evil. There is some danger in these days of depending too much on violent solutions of temporary difficulties. The House must not lose its faith in the power of argument as an effective weapon; it must not depend too much on mere mechanical forces and rules. I would much rather try to work on under the old rules than fly to others the evils of which we know not of.

(5.30.) MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): I do not wish to carry this conversation further, and my only object in rising is to enter a caveat in regard to the observations of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone), who appeared to be under the impression that there would be before the Committee only two alternatives, namely, to recommend that the procedure for carrying this change into effect shall be either by Standing Order or by Bill. There was a third course.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Or not to proceed at all.

MR. J. LOWTHER: That just covers the point I desire to make. I do not want the House to be under the impression that there is a universal concurrence in favour of doing anything at all. There are many Members who object altogether to the principle of the proposed system of piecemeal legislation. The Committee will have the power, and I hope will exercise it, of reporting against any change of rules.

(5.32.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I think the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian was much too indulgent to Her Majesty's Government. The House, no doubt, is always willing, upon good cause shown, to re-consider the question of its procedure, but the fact ought not to be overlooked that this proposed change in procedure, and this demand for a Committee, is due to the reckless endeavour of Her Majesty's Government to drive three coaches abreast through Temple Bar. But for the condition in which the business of the Session now is, owing to the mismanagement of the Government, no such proposed change as this would have been dreamt of. The suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, for the appointment of a Committee, was only a counter-proposal to that of the Government, and as such was deserving of respectful consideration. But the condition is quite different when the Government bring forward this proposal, and ask us to accept the Committee without discussion and without protest. How is this Committee to be constituted? Are the Government going to put on only their sworn supporters and leave out Members who hold independent views on this subject, like the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Thanet (Mr. J. Lowther)? I sat on a Committee on public business in 1886. It was a very strong Committee. It was presided over by the present chief of the Liberal Unionist Party (Lord Hartington), and among its members was the present President of the Board of Trade (Sir M. Hicks Beach). We considered the question of procedure for over a month, and the Conservative Government, in the following Session, came down to the House with Resolutions, in which they ignored every recommendation we made. You are now going to constitute a fresh

Committee. You do not ask that the Committee of Selection, which is a most impartial body, whose authority we are all ready to recognise, should appoint the members of the Committee. I object entirely to the terms in which this Resolution has been placed on the Paper. We listened with great respect to the very weighty words of the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread). It is easy to say that if you have written a letter over night, you can tear it up in the morning, but there is an important point to consider with regard to the House of Lords. Conservative Members know very well that no Tory Bill sent up to the House of Lords will ever be rejected or suspended by that body. But, supposing a Liberal Government gets in, and passes a Home Rule Bill, is it to be tolerated that the House of Lords should, by Resolution, hang that Bill up for Session after Session? As an Irishman I look back with reverence to the period at which this House was able to consider questions of procedure without reference to this eternal Irish question. You are now beginning to consider every question of procedure with reference to the way in which the Irish difficulty is likely to affect you. It is a most unfortunate state of things, but we are bound, as Irishmen, to look at the way in which procedure proposals are put forward. I am not prepared to accept the suggestion that this is a matter that can be dealt with at all by a Committee. I have come to the conclusion that if this House is to be protected from the House of Lords, the procedure must be by Bill. We do not need a Committee. This is not a domestic proposal, but a proposal affecting Bills in the other House. Then, Sir, there is a snake in the grass. The Committee are to consider the case of Bills that have been partly dealt with in this House. Why should they not also consider Bills which have been wholly dealt with by this House, and rejected by the House of Lords? Why should not such Bills be revived by a single Resolution, and sent back to the House of Lords once more? If the House were candid in this business they would deal with the question as a whole. It is a most unfortunate thing that the proposal should be made to change the entire forms of Parliamentary procedure because of an abandoned and shipwrecked Licensing Bill. You have dropped your Licensing Clauses, but the virus of them is to remain. I would have voted for a Committee as a condition precedent; as a palliative; but I am not prepared to accede to the appointment of a Committee to initiate a proposal to which I object in toto. To proceed by way of a Bill is our only safeguard, and I think the Conservative Party ought to hesitate before allowing a proposal to be passed which has simply been provoked by the mismanagement and the misconduct of the Government themselves.

(5.46.) Mr. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I do not quite agree with the letter, although I sympathise with the spirit, of the remarks of the hon. and learned Member for Longford (Mr. T. Healy). The First Lord of the Treasury admits that the principle of the Motion is, that when the House of Commons has once expressed its opinion on a definite legislative proposal, and that proposal has not been carried into law, it is a sheer waste of time to go over the proposal again in the succeeding Session. But the Motion does not entirely carry out the principle, and our objection is that the Motion does not go far enough. The First Lord of the Treasury says he does not wish to tie the hands of the Committee, but he does tie the hands of the Committee. The blot upon the Motion is the introduction of the word "partly," and I suggest that that word should be omitted, so that the Motion would read, "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire whether the means of an abridged form of procedure, or otherwise, the consideration of Bills which have been considered in this House, could be facilitated in the next ensuing Session of the same Parliament." The object of my suggestion is perfectly obvious. I wish that when we have completely passed a legislative proposal, and when that legislative proposal has failed, solely because the House of Lords has not accepted it, we should not be compelled to go through the labour of sending it up again to the House of Lords. I have a perfectly good precedent for what I propose. Substantially, this proposal has been made by the House of Lords itself. On page 4 of the Paper on Parliamentary Proceedings, which has been put into our hands to-day, it is stated that a Select Committee of the House of Lords, which sat in 1861, resolved:—

"That it is expedient in certain cases to adopt an abridged form of proceeding with reference to Bills which shall be again brought before this House after having been passed by it in the immediately preceding Session of the same Parliament."

That is substantially what I am urging on the Government. Then, the same Committee resolved:—

"That, on a Resolution being moved that it is expedient again to pass and to send to the other House for its concurrence, any such Bill, the question shall be put whether the House will agree to the same, and, on such Resolution being agreed to, the Bill to which it relates shall be forthwith sent to the other House for its concurrence, without any further question being put or any debate allowed."

These Resolutions absolutely carry out the purpose I have in view. There is only one condition in the House of Lords' programme to which I take exception, and that is that the arrangement should only apply to Bills which have not been passed in the House of Lords because there was not time. I propose it should apply to all Bills which have failed to pass either House, whatever the reason. If this Motion is to be carried into effect by a Standing Order of the House, I appeal to my Colleagues on these Benches to insist upon the adoption of my proposal. The Tory Party have a reserve in the House of Lords, but we have not. A Conservative Bill, when once through this House, is perfectly certain of passing through the House of Lords; but, as things stand at present, the House of Lords can compel this House, when Liberals are in a majority, either to dissolve or to waste time in going through its legislative proposals once again. The leader of the Opposition has most magnanimously appealed to his followers not to interpose any factious opposition to the Government's proposal. I shall respect that appeal, but I most respectfully place on record my protest against the limited reference which is being made to this Committee. I am not prepared to move an Amendment at this stage, because I understand that the Report of the Committee must, to be effective, be embodied in a Standing Order or Bill. When the Standing Order or Bill is before us, we shall, if necessary, exercise our right to propose to widen its scope.

* (554.) CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): I wish to emphasise what has fallen from hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway as to the extremely bald nature of the words of this Resolution. Hon. Members have pointed out that the words of the Resolution admit of only one reply, namely, "Yes." Hon. Gentlemen have lost sight of the fact that previous Select Committees replied to these words in the negative. One Committee sat in 1848. In 1861 a strong Committee was appointed to consider the proposal, and reported that the objections were grave and numerous, and that the adoption of the proposal would give increased facilities for retarding legislation. That, I think, is an answer in the negative to the question which the Resolution, on the face of it, seems to carry. Perhaps one of the most important questions which is touched by this Resolution is that of the prerogative of the Crown. If the House of Commons is able to carry a Bill on to the next Session, and the prorogation of Parliament does not put an end of the Bill, that is a restriction or limiting of the prerogative of the Crown. If, on the other hand, the sanction of the Crown must first be obtained, there is an enlargement of the prerogative of the Crown, because it will enable the Crown to interfere with legislation before it has passed both Houses of Parliament. It seems to me that that by itself is fatal to this proposal. Perhaps I may call attention to a speech made upon this subject by Sir George Lewis in 1861. He said—

"I trust the House will not think my noble Friend (Lord Palmerston) has made his Motion for the Select Committee upon this question upon a light ground or for any object of the Government."

We have this Motion made to-day for a special and specific object of the Government.

"The House will probably bear in mind that last Session there were several Motions presented to it on the subject of its Forms of Proceeding, and certainly we do not submit it with any selfish view of our own."

We have this proposal made without notice and without any demand for it, made solely to serve the selfish ends of the Government. In the same Debate, Mr. Newdegate said—

"He was greatly indebted to the noble Lord the head of the Government for repeating the pledge he gave last Session, that he would recommend the appointment of a Committee to consider the best method of expediting the progress of business."

The difference between the Resolution then proposed and that proposed to-day was that there was a deliberate wish expressed that the business should be expedited, whereas to-day no such wish had been expressed. Then Sir John Pakington, speaking in the same Debate, said—

"The great cause of the legislative fractures of last Session is to be attributed to the Government rather than to the House. They were very largely due to the programme of the Ministry, for when they called upon us to consider a French Treaty most complicated, a Reform Bill, and a Bankruptcy Bill, with 500 clauses, all in one Session, their experience must have taught them that such a thing was simply impossible."

These words are applicable to to-day. The Government have attempted to drive three first-class Bills through the House, and that is why we find ourselves in the present position, and not from any inadequacy in the Procedure of the House. This question came before a Select Committee in 1838, and the Committee reported—

"Your Committee venture to express the opinion that the satisfactory conduct and successful progress of the business of the House must mainly depend on Her Majesty's Government, holding, as they do, the chief control over its management. They believe that by a careful preparation of measures, their early introduction, a judicious distribution of business, and the order and method in which business is conducted, the Government might contribute, in an essential degree, to the easy and convenient conduct of business."

The present Government have got into a muddle. They have tried to force through the House this Session more than is possible; they have shown a want of tact and judgment in the conduct of the business they have brought before the House, and then, as a last resort, instead of endeavouring to conduct the business in an orderly way, they have come to the House and asked for an alteration of the Rules of Procedure. If a Committee is appointed upon the Rules of Procedure in strict accordance with the terms of the Resolution, I do not think the House will be any further advanced. This bald Resolution will not meet the requirements of the case. The right hon. Gentleman has given us no reason why the Committee should be appointed; but though he was careful to avoid it, we all know the reason. If the Committee is appointed and confined within the narrow limits of the Resolution, I do not think its Report can suggest anything that will advance the progress of public business.

(6.1.) MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): We have not had stated the reason why this Committee is to be appointed, but, as I understand, the reason alleged some time ago for a proposal to alter procedure was to afford the House some relief from the condition in which public business is in the present Session. But can this Committee afford us relief in the present Session? By the nature of things it cannot. The Report of the Committee and any suggestions made in that Report for the conduct of business cannot affect the present Session; therefore, all the reason for its appointment vanishes, and there is no urgency for it. This being admitted—and I do not see how it can be gainsaid—the Government having put forward no plea of urgency, is it not in the highest degree desirable that any Committee appointed to consider procedure should be a Committee to deal with other equally or more important questions which might be brought before it? No one can have failed to have been impressed by what fell from the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread), a Member of unparalleled knowledge and experience of procedure. That hon. Member pointed out the extreme undesirability and inconvenience of continually having recurrence to alterations of procedure in this House, and we have had a long experience now, even many of us whose service here has been very much shorter than that of the hon. Member, of the result of the Government having recourse to an alteration of Rules to meet a specific purpose. Let us judge by the result of experience. What has been the result of all the alterations since 1877? The result is that in this Session public business is in an unparalleled condition, worse than ever it was in any Session before the passing of the four successive alterations in procedure. After all these alterations the Government have landed us in this condition, and now, instead of looking at the question from a broad and statesmanlike point of view; instead of dealing with the whole subject with a view to the future; instead of instituting inquiry by a Committee which would take into consideration not only the general question of procedure, the length of the Session, and so forth, but which also should be empowered to consider how it has arisen that, in spite of repeated alterations, we have business in this state of confusion and arrear, we have this bald and timid proposal. Now, I propose to move an Amendment; and my idea is that if it should be found necessary to proceed once more to the alteration of our Rules, then the Committee should be empowered to take into consideration other things; for instance, that most valuable proposal in relation to the time of prorogation made by the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Bridgeton Division (Sir G. Trevelyan), a proposal which seemed to recommend itself generally to the House. I think this proposal carries far greater hope of solid improvement in the business of the House than anything contained in the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. H. Smith). The Committee ought to inquire into the general management of business during the Session, and also into that question which seems to be one of growing importance—the practice of postponing the Estimates to the very end of the Session. There are many other questions that ought to be taken into consideration when a Committee sits upon procedure; and I want to know what considerations prevent the reference of these to the Committee, for we have had no grounds of urgency put forward, no reason why the Committee should be confined to the narrow terms of reference read out to the House? If the question of procedure is to be opened at all, the Committee should be left free to consider the whole conduct of business; the period of assembling, the period of prorogation, and all other matters touching the business of the House. The extreme inconvenience of the proposal that has been made has been pointed out by the hon. Member for Bedford, and I can add nothing to the weight of his statement; but I think Conservative Members should hesitate before they assent to the proposal. We know that in America, and in Democratic forms of Government, the most extreme Radical section favour the most violent alterations in Parliamentary procedure. If you set us the example of continual alteration of Rules for a specific purpose without allowing the Committee to consider the subject in all its bearings—if you set us this example of recurring to an alteration of procedure when the Government get into difficulties, you will find the Radical Party very apt to follow the precedent you set; and the time may come when you will find yourselves, as an Opposition, tightly fettered, and we shall refer to this example you are now setting us. This Motion was originally announced on the plea that the business of the country could not be done in the present Session; but what relief will this Motion bring to business in the present Session, and what relief in the approaching Session? Absolutely no relief at all, except that, possibly, if the Committee report favourably, you may spare the House two or three days' discussion on the Second Reading of the Land Purchase Bill. Now, are Conservative and Independent Members of the House prepared to set this precedent, that they are ready to alter the procedure of the House of Commons for no purpose under the sun except to save three days' discussion on the Irish Land Purchase Bill? What other result can follow the consideration of the Committee with this reference? True, we may be spared the re-discussion of this Bill on Second Reading, but in order to secure that the right hon. Gentleman is prepared to sacrifice at least two nights of the present Session when the Government are driven to the greatest extremity for time. We are placed in an unparalleled position, and the only proposal the Government make for relief is that we shall waste one or two more nights in discussing a change of procedure which can give us no relief this Session, and can give us but trifling relief next Session. In the whole history of Parliament never was a more inane set of proposals submitted for the relief of public business. I shall say no more on this aspect of the question. I propose to move an addition to the Resolution in the following terms:—

"And by what means it can be secured that the consideration of Supply shall be taken before some fixed date."

I do not see what good purpose the Committee is to serve as regards this Session; but if the Committee is to be appointed, the time has come when this serious growing grievance should be brought under notice and carefully considered; that this portion of the business of the country, the first mentioned in the Queen's Speech to the House, which is the primary and essential duty of the House of Commons to the exclusion of all legislation if it becomes a question of choice, that this business should be postponed to suit the convenience of Ministers to such a period of the Session as to turn discussion into a mockery and a farce. It is useless to set about the discussion of Votes in Supply in the month of August. It would be just as well and more honest to the people to announce that discussions on Supply are abandoned. On Supply questions arise in which the people are more keenly interested than they are in the Land Purchase Bill or the Licensing Bill, and I know of no question connected with procedure that more deserves attention than means to secure that the Government of the day—Liberal or Conservative—shall not be permitted to postpone Votes in Supply to a late period of the Session. It is perfectly within the competence of the House to frame some Standing Order by which it shall be the duty of the Government to introduce all Votes in Supply by a certain fixed date. Or, on the other hand, the subject might be approached in this way: We heard the First Lord mention the other day a suggestion, of which he now appears to have lost sight, which I am sorry for, because it seemed to me an excellent idea, not to proceed with Bills of a contentious character after 15th July.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: This is not lost sight of; that is a point to consider; but it is obvious that we do not wish to tie the Committee to consider a specific proposal. As a means of bringing the Session to an early end, this may be one of the proposals we may have to submit to the House.

MR. DILLON: I thought that was excluded?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No.

MR. DILLON: I intended to move that such proceedings should close on the 1st of June. That would secure in another way that Supply should be brought on at a time when it could be reasonably discussed. There are two proposals: a Standing Order might be passed binding the Government to bring on Supply by a certain date, or a Standing Order might stop legislative proceedings on June 1, leaving an interval in which we should be free to deal with Supply. Either of these proposals would meet the difficulty. Meantime, on the grounds I have urged that there are no claims of urgency to tie the Committee to this narrow reference that the Committee should be free to deal with the duration of the Session and conduct of business, and particularly this question of Supply, I move my Amendment.

Amendment proposed, at the end of the Question, to add the words—

“ And by what means it can be secured that the consideration of Supply shall be taken before some fixed date.”—(Mr. Dillon.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

(6.20.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I will only interpose for a few minutes between the right hon. Gentleman and the House, because I want him to have the opportunity of saying a word or two upon the present condition of business in the House. The object of this Motion is to facilitate the earlier rising of the House for the Session, and as I think we are aware from unofficial sources to avoid having an Autumn Session. Well, I am afraid if the Resolution is passed we shall not rise earlier, and that we shall have an Autumn Session. I will ask the House to look at a figure or two and then see if this is a sufficient remedy for the impasse in which we find ourselves. We have now arrived at the 23rd of June, and assuming that we rise on August 17, which is not, I think, a very early date, at all events it is an average date; and assuming that the Government take, as I presume the Government will, all the Wednesdays, we shall have 38 available days to wind up the business of the Session. Now, there are on the Order Book 33 Government Bills, including the Local Taxation Bill and the Land Purchase Bill, which, I presume, we may now say are gone, and there is the Tithes Bill in a state of suspended animation. Apart from these three, there are 30 Bills to be dealt with in some manner, while my hon. Friend has called attention to the state of Supply, and Supply is the key of the position at this moment. We can only judge from analogy and the average time occupied by Supply. In 1887, excluding Supplementary Estimates, 38 days were devoted to Supply. In 1888, I think, 37 days were thus occupied; and in 1889 we got through Supply in something like 38 days. I take it within the mark when I say that 36 or 37 days have been required for Supply in the last few years. Now, we have already this year been 13 days in Supply, and therefore 24 days more are required, and when I remind the House that not an Irish Vote has been touched—and I think there are more contentious elements in the Irish Votes this year than there have been for many years—when I mention that grave questions of policy arise on the Foreign Office and Colonial Votes, and important considerations in relation to law and justice on the Votes for law and justice in the three Kingdoms, and that the Votes for the Revenue and Post Office Departments bristle with questions of difficulty, I am not predicting too much when I say they will probably occupy as much time as in previous years. Now, look at the figures: 24 days for Supply, and 14 days left for the remaining business of the Session. Well, the Government have not yet withdrawn the Bills I have mentioned. I use the word “yet,” but no doubt this will happen before many days are over. Nevertheless, the stages of the journey will occupy some time. We have not heard a word of the Tithes Bill; whether it is to be gone on with or dropped; the last we heard of it was that it was to be proceeded with. Then we have the Indian Councils Bill, upon which we know there is to be an important Second Reading Debate, and there will be, probably, considerable discussion in Committee. We have on the Table a Bill of primary importance that must be dealt with—the Police Bill, which, in the interest of discipline and peace in the Metropolitan Force, cannot be postponed for another year, and I may be thought too sanguine when I say it will not get through Second Reading in less than two days. There is the Western Australia Bill must be passed; and the Bill to sanction the cession of Heligoland must provoke a good deal of discussion. You are going to have a discussion on procedure on which many questions must arise, and you have the residuum of these 30 Bills, together with the inevitable four days for the Appropriation Bill. Here is a programme to get through in 14 days. I say it is an absolute impossibility. If the First Lord would rise and say that without wasting any more time the Licensing Bill and the Tithes Bill are dead, it would still be impossible for the House to rise before the end of August; and if we are to go on with those Bills, we shall have an Autumn Session without the advantage of a summer vacation. All the evils which you endeavoured to avoid by the meeting at the Carlton Club will be developed and accentuated by the present proposal. The time has arrived when we should know what the Government mean to do in the 38 or 40 remaining days of an average Session.

(6.27.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): The reference to this Committee is very oddly drawn, whether by inadvertence or design I do not know. The Government propose to ask the Committee a question, the answer to which is obvious. Without reference to a Committee it is obvious that the progress of a Bill will be facilitated by carrying over its stages to an ensuing Session, and the Report of the Committee can add nothing to our information on that point. What we want to know is, if it is desirable or expedient to carry forward Bills in this manner? If the Government had dealt with it by Standing Order, we should have known how to treat it; and had the Standing Order been adopted, the right hon. Gentleman would have known how to apply it during the present Session. But how stands the matter? We have almost reached the end of June; the Committee has yet to be nominated and appointed, and then has to meet and consider not only the precedents, but the evidence that will be laid before it, after which it must report. It may determine that it is not desirable to give the facilities asked for, or that if those facilities are desirable, they should be given by Statute. In that case, would the right hon. Gentleman proceed to pass a Statute this Session, or, should they recommend that we should proceed by Standing Order, would the right hon. Gentleman propose to tackle that Standing Order now? We all know the object of the proposal. It is to enable the Government to get through the Land Purchase Bill. If the right hon.

Gentleman thinks he can hang up that Bill over the present year, we certainly shall take a strong view of the question; but if he says he no longer intends to hang it up, we shall take another and a more favourable view; but it is reasonable considering the date we have now reached, and the length of time that will be taken by the Bill in Committee and in the Report stage, to take this step for the purpose of remitting the further stages of the Land Bill to another Session of Parliament. My hon. Friend the Member for East Mayo has added to the Motion a matter which, in my judgment, is more important than anything the Motion itself contains. The present proposition has reference only to one Bill, and that Bill a measure which is opposed by the great majority of the Irish Representatives. My Friend's Amendment deals with the question of Supply, and that is a matter in which we have infinitely more interest than in the proposed legislation. In fact, we have no interest in any legislation proposed by the Government, except the interest of an ardent Opposition. It has been pointed out by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Thanet (Mr. J. Lewther), who seems to be the only man on the Ministerial side of the House who has the intelligence to perceive the point that the Government have to face, that they can have no possible legislation this Session. It is a lamentable thing that the House should be reduced to this state of things because there are two Ministers of the Crown who cannot reconcile the situation. The facilitating of business in this House rests with the Government themselves; and if they would only take ordinary care at the beginning of the Session, and bring forward no more Bills than they can pass in six months, there would be no occasion for this reference to a Committee. Of course, if they introduce enough Bills to last them two or three years, they cannot expect to pass them in a single Session. With regard to Supply, I think we have a right to complain of the action of the Government. Before the Whitsuntide Recess, I called attention to this subject, and reminded the right hon. Gentleman that the Irish Representatives never had the opportunity of calling attention to the grievances they desire to discuss. The business of Supply is the fundamental business of the House, and in that respect our functions have practically ceased. Our financial business is discharged in the most slovenly and unconstitutional manner by taking Votes on Account. The Irish Members have an ardent interest in the business of Supply, because it is only when in Supply that they have the opportunity of calling attention to the gross and scandalous misgovernment of Ireland, of which from day to day they have most bitterly to complain. We have this very evening had complaint made of the length of time occupied by the questions put upon the Paper from day to day. Why is it there are so many questions? It is mainly because we have no other means of bringing forward our grievances except when in Supply. The right hon. Gentleman promised to exert himself to secure the transaction of the business of Supply; but for the last three years he has made similar promises, and although I was at one time somewhat deceived by the imposing manner of the First Lord of the Treasury when that promise was made, I shall no longer regard his promises as worthy of attention. Unless some special steps are taken in regard to Supply, the Constitutional rights of Members of this House will not only be impaired but practically destroyed, and it is for this reason that I feel it my duty to support the Amendment of my hon. Friend.

* (6.38.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I think hon. Members opposite will feel that the appeal made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian deserves some consideration at the hands of his supporters. The right hon. Gentleman stated that there is a strong desire that the House should come to a speedy conclusion on the question before it. The hon. Member for West Belfast has referred to the question of Supply, which has been raised by the hon. Member for Mayo. It has been said that it is perfectly impossible for the Committee to make any provision with regard to the period up to which Bills should be considered in this House. The Standing Order which I intended to move on the present occasion provided that—

“In future, after the 15th of July and in the present Session after a date to be hereafter appointed, no public Bills, except Money Bills, Continuance Bills, and Bills returned from the Lords with amendments shall be further proceeded with, provided that, with respect to any public Bill which is in progress in Committee of the whole House, or in a Standing Committee, or which has been reported therefrom, a Motion can be made, after notice given, that further proceedings on such Bills be suspended until the next Session.”

The Committee is free to make any recommendation with regard to the date, or to name an earlier date than the 15th of July. I believe that there exists a strong desire that the House should rise earlier in the summer, and this is my principal reason for suggesting to the House the appointment of a Committee to examine into this point, so as to provide facilities for allowing the House to do what I believe is practical and reasonable, namely, to rise at an earlier period of the summer, and at the same time to get through their business. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton has spoken of an impasse. No Government, however, could have contemplated that the Debates would have been carried to the length to which they have been carried; and if the argument is to be used that the Government must always look forward to continued discussion on opposed business, whatever Government may be in power, after the same fashion and manner as has characterised our proceedings this Session, then it is obvious that very small progress must be the consequence. Whether that course would be taken by hon. Gentlemen opposite if we should hereafter be in another position remains to be seen; but I am justified in saying that discussion cannot be carried on as far as it has been without practically delaying and obstructing the business of the House. The right hon. Gentleman opposite has referred to the fact that there are 33 Government Bills on the Paper; but I think that if the right hon. Gentleman would refer to the years from 1881 to 1885 he would find that there has not been less than that number of Government Bills on the Paper on the 23rd of June. Reference has also been made to the large amount of Supply yet to be got through. I am sorry that there is so much. I agree that one of our first duties is to consider Supply; but, again, I would say that we have had no reason to suppose that discussion would have been protracted in the manner in which it has been. It must not be assumed that the House is bound to rise at a given date, however much that may be desired. The first duty of the House is to transact and conclude the business which is brought before it. I trust the hon. Member for East Mayo will not press his Amendment, as it is one which the Government cannot accept, because they desire to enable the House to deal with the Report of the Committee during the present Session. The Government do not desire to withdraw from the House the consideration of the Irish Land Purchase Bill, although, no doubt, the recommendation of the Committee will admit of that Bill, with others, being dealt with under the proposed Standing Order on the ground that it is a Bill of very great importance, and one which the House ought to approach with full time for its consideration.

(6.45.) MR. SEXTON: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, in the event of the Committee reporting in favour of procedure by Bill instead of by Standing Order, he intends to proceed with that Bill during the present Session?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: That would be a matter for consideration when the Report of the Committee is presented. If the Committee decides in favour of the principle involved in the reference to it I do not exclude the hope that the House may be able to give effect to that recommendation as rapidly as possible. Measures must be taken in the present Session to secure the object in view, if the House is to have the advantage of a better arrangement than is now in existence for an early adjournment next Session. I trust the House will understand that the Government desire to leave the Committee free to consider the whole question referred to them.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I do not rise for the purpose of prolonging this discussion more than a moment or two; but I would remind the Committee that the right hon. Gentleman opposite has undoubtedly introduced controversial matter. Among the reasons he gave for making this proposal the right hon. Gentleman referred to the great length to which the discussions in this House had been protracted.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I said the first ground for the proposal was the general desire of the House for an earlier adjournment.

MR. J. MORLEY: That is so; but the right hon. Gentleman also referred to and made a point of what he termed practical obstruction. I do not intend to go into this; but I would point out, as a matter of fact, that the great and protracted opposition the right hon. Gentleman complained of has been offered to a particular set of proposals that were not announced in the Queen's Speech, and have not received a very enthusiastic support even from the right hon. Gentleman's own friends. Has the opposition to those proposals been without effect? On the contrary, the announcement that has been made this evening as to a change of front on the part of the Government, although it is an unsatisfactory and inadequate change which the Government will yet have further to amend, affords the most perfect justification for the attitude taken by the Opposition in resisting the Compensation Clauses of the Government Bill. I am glad to hear from the right hon. Gentleman that the Select Committee is to be empowered to examine into the whole subject in all its length and breadth, and that the House is to be at liberty when the Committee reports to determine what course it would be best to adopt. The Irish Land Purchase Bill is one which, above all, ought not to be subjected to the process of suspension, because in the time that would elapse before next Session considerable alteration would have to be made in it. I agree with the hon. Member for West Belfast that Irish Supply, and especially the Irish Constabulary Vote, should be taken at an early day. Until those Estimates are discussed there will necessarily be a large number of questions put from day to day in reference to the administration of Irish affairs. The complaint made by the Irish Members as to the period at which the most important items of Irish Supply are taken is a most reasonable one; and although the right hon. Gentleman professed not to understand how it was, when a question was put as to the enormous number of questions asked in the House, and could not see the connection between that fact and the delay in taking the Irish Votes, I think, upon reflection, he is bound to see the connection. The number of Irish questions which have been overwhelming us for some days past are entirely due to the inability of the Irish

Members to discuss fully and fairly the administration of Irish affairs. These questions are, doubtless, a most inconvenient interruption of the business of the House. Although they are, under the circumstances, a necessary and inevitable interruption, we can hardly expect it will be greatly modified when the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary uses his opportunity of answering questions, as he did the other night in connection with the statement of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bridgeton (Sir G. Trevelyan), by putting into his answers matters of a very controversial character. With regard to the Amendment of the Member for East Mayo, I hope my hon. Friend will not press it; because, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian said at the commencement of this discussion, we shall be at liberty, when the Committee reports, to make whatever alterations in their recommendations may seem expedient. I therefore beg to ask him to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. DILLON: With the leave of the House I shall be happy to withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question again proposed.

(6.25.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I do not share the right hon. Gentleman's view that this Motion has been fully discussed. To my mind, no more important Resolution has ever been submitted to the House. I do not, however, wish to continue the Debate, but merely to ask the First Lord of the Treasury to answer one point that has been raised from these Benches. He says this Motion is proposed with a special view to an early adjournment, and it is exceedingly important that the Irish Members should know what representation they are to have on the Committee. I therefore ask the right hon. Gentleman to state how many Members are to compose the Committee, and how many of those Members will be Irish representatives?

(6.27.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I am rather in favour of the Motion of the First Lord of the Treasury. I am in favour of the carrying over system, and, therefore, think that this matter ought to be referred to a Committee. I also think that when it comes back from the Committee their recommendation ought to be carried out by Bill instead of by Resolution. I hope, however, the right hon. Gentleman will seriously consider the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton. The right hon. Gentleman has complained that we obstruct the business of the House, and he said it was the duty of the Government to keep the House together as long as there was business to be done. I appeal to those who have been in former Governments, whether this has not always been said, and whether it has not sometimes happened that the House has been kept together until opposition has come from the Government's own supporters, rather than from their ordinary opponents, with the result that the House can no longer be kept together? The reason why there has been an exhaustive discussion of the Government measures was because there was no popular leverage behind those measures. If these Bills were really desired by the country, the country would raise such an outcry against exhaustive discussion, that exhaustive discussion would be swept away, and the Bills passed. The right hon. Gentleman probably knows that the Publicans' Compensation Bill, which he is pressing forward, is detested more on his own side of the House than on this. The other day, when the Bill was only saved by four votes, the right hon. Gentleman was in despair. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton made a very moderate estimate when, putting aside this Compensation Bill, he held it would be absolutely impossible for the House to rise before the 17th August. If this resolution is passed to carry Bills over, there will be a good deal of discussion as to what Bills are to be carried over. My hon. Friends from Ireland might not think it desirable that the Land Purchase Bill should be carried over. So that you must add to the little reckoning of my right hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton the time which would be occupied in such discussions. Now, in the kindest spirit, I will give the right hon. Gentleman a little advice. It appears to me that there is no man at the head of the Government who understands the business of this House. Every Member seems to have his own way in the Cabinet. Each one is anxious to bring forward his own Bill, and none can be induced to withdraw it except in piecemeal fashion, and after looking to see whether his neighbour in the Cabinet is first going to withdraw his Bill. I am bound to say that the right hon. Gentleman and his friends are exceedingly ignorant of opinion on this side of the House. When the right hon. Gentleman made his proposal to expedite business, I presume he was under the impression that the Compensation Bill would go through in a day or two. He has awakened to the fact that that is not likely to be the case. I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it would not be better not to make half-a-dozen bites at a cherry, but frankly say, "I am human; I do not pretend to be anything more than human. I have made a mistake, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer very possibly has made a mistake, and we were in error when we brought forward this Compensation Bill after Whitsuntide." The right hon. Gentleman may throw the blame upon us, but if he will withdraw the Bill, we will give him a free hand to say what he likes with respect to us. I would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that he might allow the Committee to sit and report, but that he should not carry over any Bill to next year. Let him withdraw for the present Session his Land Purchase Bill and the Tithe Bill. I can assure him that he will not lose much by doing it. Next Session let him bring in his Bills again if he likes, and carry the Second Reading. He will have only lost four days on the Second Reading of the one and two days on the Second Reading of the other. Then next Session we could consider his very excellent plan of carrying Bills over. I implore the right hon. Gentleman to really seriously look into the question of time. Even if he withdraws this Compensation Bill at once he will have the greatest difficulty in bringing the Session to a close before the end of August, and if he continues this Compensation Bill I do really believe every single day that is spent on that Compensation Bill means a day we shall have to sit in the month of September.

Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire whether by means of an abridged form of Procedure, or otherwise, the consideration of Bills, which have been partly considered in this House, could be facilitated in the next ensuing Session of the same Parliament.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

LOCAL TAXATION (CUSTOMS AND EXCISE) DUTIES BILL.—(No. 244.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 2.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 5, to leave out sub-section (i).—(Mr. Hunter.)

Question again proposed, "That sub-section (i.) stand part of the Clause."

(7.10.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): Sir, when the discussion of this Bill was postponed on Friday night, there was an expression of regret that the Scotch Superannuation Bill had not been produced. The First Lord of the Treasury stated that it would be circulated on Saturday morning or this morning. Unfortunately, the First Lord did not know that the Bill had to be read a first time, and the result is that we only got it an hour and a half ago, and until then we had not the smallest inkling of the proposal of the Government. What makes this conduct very much worse is, that when I look into the Scotch Bill, it seems to be an exact imitation of the English Bill. There was no reason in the world why this miserable copy of a miserable system of superannuation should not have been in our hands, at all events, 10 days ago. It seems to me that the action of the Government in this matter has been illiberal, and that their object has been to obtain the sanction of the Committee to a proposal without giving us the slightest notion of what that proposal is. A worse scheme of superannuation for Scotland, under the circumstances, could not have been brought forward. The English scheme is bad enough, and it has given rise to the greatest possible discontent. But in Scotland such a Bill is absurd. It divides the country among 81 Police Authorities, under some of which there are only four or five constables. It would be out of order in a discussion on a clause of the Bill before the House to enter into a criticism of the measure just introduced. But what is the position in which we are placed? We are asked to vote a sum of money towards a scheme of superannuation, which is a bad scheme. What I suggest to the Government is, that they should not press this Bill during the present Session, but should refer the question to a Select Committee. If the Government press the Bill they may lay their account that it will not pass in a short space of time. I believe it will not be satisfactory to the police or to the public of Scotland. To save time, the Government should state now and at once that they will not press this Bill, which is wrong in principle, and would be most exasperating and objectionable in practice. If the Government would refer the matter to a Select Committee, then, so far as I am concerned, I would agree to this sub-section of the Local Taxation Bill. I do not believe that by postponing the Bill the police will suffer any injury. Superannuation is a very serious matter. You have not, unfortunately, got a free hand with regard to it in England. You are bound by vested interests. We have no vested interests in Scotland; and in that country, in considering a scheme of superannuation, I think we ought to take advantage of the experience and mistakes which have been made in England, and consider the example set in that country as a precedent to be avoided. If the Government are anxious to facilitate their business, I think the best course they can pursue is to hang this Bill up and refer the matter to a Select Committee. But if they insist on proceeding with the Bill now before the Committee, without giving us an opportunity of considering the Scotch Superannuation Bill, I shall be compelled to move that you report Progress.

(7.20.) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): On the last occasion when this Bill was before the House, the Debate was postponed in order that we might have the Superannuation Bill before us, and the Lord Advocate here. We have not had time to study the Bill, and I must say that I was very much astonished to find the Lord Advocate introduce it without vouchsafing so much as a word of explanation. But, on reflection, I am really not surprised that he did not say anything, because the Bill is nothing but a slavish copy of the English Bill, word for word. But the circumstances are not the same. In England you have got superannuation already in existence. In Scotland, we pay an officer a lump sum on his retiring. Under the circumstances, I do hope that we shall have some explanation from the Lord Advocate of the system which the Government propose to introduce. It does seem to me most regrettable that a Bill should be forced upon this House with a view to giving effect to a sub-section of the Local Taxation Bill without hon. Members having the smallest opportunity of discussing it. It is said we should not look a gift horse in the mouth, and that £40,000 is given to us. How far will that amount go, and how heavy a demand will be involved upon the rates? A very much larger sum than £40,000 may have to be taken out of the rates. Scotland is only to have £40,000, with its larger area, while London is to have £150,000 a year. The representatives of the Scotch constituencies are bound to watch this matter very closely. I do not agree with my hon. Friend. I do wish to see a scheme of superannuation.

MR. HUNTER: So do I.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I am very glad to hear it. At the same time I repeat what I said the other day, that while a system of superannuation of public servants is necessary you may carry it too far by laying down regulations which would permit of your best men retiring with pensions in the prime of life, and ready to take up other pursuits, while you would be left with only the scum and the dregs to carry on the Public Service. I am very much alarmed by the extent to which the Home Secretary yields to agitation in this matter with regard to the Metropolitan Police. I was very much astonished to hear him say that he was not going to put any check on the age at which a policeman might take his pension and retire. I think that a very dangerous thing. I want to know whether that may be done with regard to Scotland or not, with the effect that choice men, at the age of 45 or 46, may, to the injury of the Public Service, retire on their pensions, and take up other pursuits. I hope the Lord Advocate will give us a complete and satisfactory explanation of the scheme, and of the method of working the scheme.

*(7.25.) THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. M. T. STORMONT DARLING, Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): It is not easy to satisfy the

hon. Member for Kirkcaldy. The other night he objected that the Bill to be introduced might not be similar to the English Bill. And now he objects, after he has seen it, that it is very similar. I do not know that that is a ground of objection, unless it is shown that the English Bill is not satisfactory. I hope, in a few words, to show that this Bill proceeds on reasonable and just grounds. The hon. Member for Aberdeen said that the Bill was open to a number of objections, but he did not show what they were.

MR. HUNTER: It would have been out of order to do so.

*MR. M. T. STORMONTH DARLING: Therefore, I must be excused if I confine myself to a very general outline of the proposals of the Bill. The hon. Member for Aberdeen specified one objection. He said the Bill creates 81 Police Authorities. That is not so. We are creating no Police Authorities. We are taking the Police Authorities in counties and boroughs just as we find them. Obviously it would be exceedingly inconvenient that a scheme of this kind should be administered by any but Police Authorities, who are masters of the police, and have the right to appoint and dismiss them. Therefore, I think the answer is complete, that the Police Authorities should have this subvention.

MR. HUNTER: The objection I make is this, that you are creating separate funds in counties where there are only five constables altogether, instead of having one Superannuation Fund for the whole of Scotland. To have 81 separate Superannuation Funds would involve innumerable difficulties.

*MR. M. T. STORMONTH DARLING: Would you have the whole of the police of Scotland managed by one authority?

MR. HUNTER: No; one Superannuation Fund.

*MR. M. T. STORMONTH DARLING: The proposals are these: Every constable in Scotland will, after he has completed 25 years' service, if he is of the age specified in the pension scale, be entitled to retire on his pension. If he has not completed 25 years, but 15 years, he will be entitled to his pension, provided he is permanently incapacitated. If he has not completed the full period of 15 years, and it can be shown that he is permanently incapacitated, he will be entitled, not to a pension, but to a gratuity. In the case of a man who is killed or injured, there is special provision for compensation to his family. For these purposes there is to be a Pension Fund, which will be made up, in the first place, by a stoppage out of the men's wages, the appropriation of certain fines, and the money to be voted under the Local Taxation Bill. If there is still a deficiency it must be made up from local sources. The money will be distributed in the first year according to the number of efficient members of the Police Force in each locality. In future years a system will be adopted very nearly corresponding to the actual requirements of the Force, and the distribution will be according to the amount of contribution, that is to say, every 6d. obtained from the men's pay will be met by a proportionate amount from the £40,000, and the residue will be in accordance with the actual necessities of each Police Authority, that is to say, in proportion to the actual demands made upon them. That, I should say, is a perfectly equitable system of distribution. Of course the Government have not made these proposals without inquiring as to the probable demands on the funds, and the result of this inquiry has been to show that the sum here proposed will be more than sufficient for the first few years; and the Committee must remember that, year by year, the funds will be largely increased from the other sources I have mentioned, and in particular from the contributions from the men themselves. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy seemed to draw a contrast between the sum to be allocated to Scotland and the sum to be allocated to the Metropolis, and the hon. Member urged that, as the populations are about the same, the sums to be allocated to the two places ought to be about the same. But the hon. Member forgets that there are 15,000 police in the Metropolis, and only a little over 4,000 in Scotland, and that if the amounts paid were in proportion to the number of police, whilst Scotland received £40,000 the Metropolis would receive £150,000. While it is impossible for the Government to foresee whether or not there will ultimately be a demand on local resources, we have taken every means to provide such a sum as will, in the first instance, entirely meet the charge, and as it will constitute a growing fund that will very largely meet any possible claim in the future. I trust the Committee will adopt the view I ventured to urge on the last occasion when the subject was under discussion, that all we are doing is laying down the principle that Superannuation Funds are to be established, and that £40,000 is a proper sum to devote to them. These are the only two propositions to which the Committee will be committed by adopting the subsection. I have not heard from the other side any rooted objection in principle to the creation of a Superannuation Fund. All the Committee have to do now is to say whether they are, or are not, in favour of such a plan, and whether they are, or are not, in favour of the allocation of this money to this particular purpose. There were expressions of opinion on the Front Opposition Bench, on Thursday night, very strongly in favour of the creation of a pension; therefore, I apprehend that all we have to say now is whether or not we favour such a fund. I hope the answer to the whole of this question will be in the affirmative.

(7.35.) MR. HUNTER: The hon. and learned Gentleman has not answered any of the questions which I put to him, and on the answer he gives will depend whether I move to report Progress or not.

*MR. CHILDERS: This is not a question which ought to be disposed of lightly. Police superannuation is quite a different matter from superannuation in most Departments of the Public Service. For instance, there are large bodies of men connected with the dockyards and arsenals, and connected with the Revenue Department and the Customs in England, in whose benefit a system of superannuation has been established, whereby the men, when falling ill or reaching the age of 60, receive a proportion of their salary, calculated on the number of years of service. Here we have a very simple system, which has gained ground ever since it has been established, and which now applies to the mass of the public servants of this country. But the police are avowedly a very different body to those I have enumerated. You cannot apply the same rules to the superannuation of the police that you can apply to ordinary public servants. The conditions of their service are far more exhausting, and you cannot postpone their superannuation until they reach the age of 60 years. You cannot superannuate the police on the same terms as you superannuate the soldiers and sailors, who have a comparatively short service. The whole question of the superannuation of the police is, therefore, extremely difficult, and I must say I entirely disagree with the hon. and learned Gentleman when he asks the Committee in a light and airy way, to vote the money first and to decide how it is to be applied afterwards. The Committee ought first to know on what principle we are going to carry out the system, and then it will be time to decide how much shall be contributed from public funds, and how much from other funds—that is to say, from the contribution of the men themselves. The hon. and learned Gentleman is beginning at the wrong end. He ought to have laid down a system before saying in an airy way that £40,000 or £50,000, or any other sum, should be allocated for this purpose. This question is of great importance. I am not one of those who think it a light matter, and I differ from the hon. and learned Gentleman, because I think it is desirable to lay down something like a common system for the superannuation of the police of the whole of Scotland before deciding as to the amount to be allocated to the purpose. In England we have already systems of superannuation in above 100 counties and boroughs. Excepting in Greenock, there are no Superannuation Funds existing in Scotland other than of the most imperfect character; therefore, in dealing with Scotland, an opportunity arises for laying down a sound system ab initio. It is also, I think, very questionable whether every Local Authority should have its own independent Superannuation Fund; it would be best to follow the system of superannuation in the Civil Service, where the fund is administered by one Central Authority for the Service in all its Departments. If the Scotch Police Fund were administered by some representative police authority it would, I think, be found not only more economical, but more advantageous to the men themselves. The men would feel that they were all treated alike, and not according to the arbitrary view of a petty Local Authority having control over 10 or a dozen men, and consequently influenced often too much by the circumstances of every man. It would be agreeable to the men themselves to know that they had a thoroughly impartial authority to administer the superannuation. To my mind, it would be well not to carry the Debate on these words further, but to let the whole matter be considered by a Select Committee. Such an inquiry would not occupy more than 10 days or a fortnight, and after it we should be able to approach the question much more satisfactorily.

(7.45.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman expects that the Government could put the cart before the horse in the manner he suggests. What the Government now propose to do with regard to Scotland is what we have already done with regard to England. We have voted the money for England, and the Bill proposes to put Scotland in the same position as England. I should not care for the reproaches that would be levelled at the Government by the Scotch people if, the money having been voted for England, we refused to vote the money for Scotland. I presume there is some object in wishing to put off the Bill. Presumably, the right hon. Gentleman thinks that if the superannuation we propose is not satisfactory, it would be well to drop it and not use the money for that purpose at all.

*MR. CHILDERS: My view is exactly the reverse. I think it is most important that this superannuation question should be dealt with this Session, and it is for that reason that I make the proposal.

MR. GOSCHEN: Then I would advise the right hon. Gentleman to secure the money. But I do not see why the right hon. Gentleman should wish to postpone voting the money for the present, unless it is that he considers it possible that the money may not be wanted at all. For my own part, I scout the suggestion of such a possibility. Scotland must need the money, whatever differences there may be amongst Scotch Members as to the form of superannuation to be adopted. One word with regard to the extraordinary plan propounded by my right hon. Friend. My right hon. Friend proposes a superannuation scheme for the whole of Scotland—a superannuation scheme subsidised by this money which we are proposing to give, but which must, ultimately, depend upon the rates. He suggests that in Scotland we should have a Superannuation Fund managed by the State, and that the localities should have no control over it, and that any deficiencies there might be should be made up out of the local rates. Well, I think when my right hon. Friend considers the tendency of Local Bodies in Scotland, like Local Bodies elsewhere, to have a very decisive voice as regards local finance, he will see that to propose such a scheme for Scotland would be to insure its rejection at once. Any scheme for Scotland placing the fund for the superannuation of the police in the hands of the State, while the local rates are to make good deficiencies, will not be acceptable to the Local Authorities in Scotland. Such a scheme, moreover, would, necessarily, be of a cast-iron nature, whereas it is obvious that a different scale of pensions ought to apply to the rural districts than to the large towns, where the police are worked very much harder, and where, therefore, they are entitled to higher pensions. Are the Local Authorities to determine the rates of pensions, or are they to be left to the decision of an Imperial Authority? That is the question I put in the best spirit before hon. Gentlemen opposite, and I am quite certain that whatever scheme of superannuation may be adopted, that which the right hon. Gentleman has proposed would not be just, and would not commend itself to the people of Scotland. You could not impose a new burden on the rates without giving the localities control over the scale of pensions. I would urge that against the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman, but the main point is whether this money should be given to Scotland. I would advise the Scotch Members to take the money, and, then, whatever form of superannuation is established, they will find it an advantage to have this endowment from the State.

\*(7.50.) DR. CAMERON: I would point out that much time would have been saved if Scotch Members had had the information on Thursday night which is vouchsafed now. It is said that the principle of the proposal is to base superannuation in Scotland on precisely the same principle as that in England, and when last the subject was under discussion I rose to point out that it was quite impossible for the scheme proposed in England to be workable in the case of Scotland. On referring to the English Bill I find it is proposed to give a grant from the Imperial Exchequer, proportionate to the amount of the deductions made from the pay of the police, for superannuation allowances. I now find that it is proposed to distribute the grant in Scotland in proportion to the number of men maintained. I should like to know whether the wish of the Scotch police has ever been ascertained on the subject? Do they know it is proposed to impose upon them a fine of  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., to be deducted from their pay, for the purpose of superannuation? I do not think they do. Do the Government intend, after having started a system of superannuation in Scotland on the principle of distribution according to the number of men maintained, to adopt subsequently the English proposal—

THE CHAIRMAN: It is out of order to enter into a discussion of the proposals of the Police Bill. The simple question is whether £40,000 shall be allocated.

*DR. CAMERON: Exactly, Sir; and I think it will be most germane to that question to inquire how far the £40,000 will go. As far as the principle of police superannuation is concerned, I am in favour of it, but we should know the feeling of the Police Authorities, and the ratepayers who are to be called upon to make good deficiencies should know what amount of deficiency they are likely to be called upon to make good. We have no information on these two most important points. It is proposed that we should have a Committee on the subject. I do not think that is asking too much. The right hon. Gentleman has told us that the amount proposed to be allocated is more than sufficient to carry out the scheme. I do not think it will be at all adequate. The heaviest demands will be made at the commencement. Every constable of 25 years' service when the Bill becomes law, will be entitled to his pension. I doubt very much whether the police throughout Scotland know it is proposed to take their pay in order to provide them with superannuation allowances, and I doubt whether they are prepared to submit to the deductions without at once demanding an equivalent increase of pay. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer said we had better take the money when we can get it. I quite agree with him on that point, and I agree with him all the more when I remember that the right hon. Gentleman got the money for the English superannuation scheme, to a large extent, by a perfectly unjust and unprecedented taxation of the national drink in Scotland. The Government might logically hang up this £40,000 by adding words to the effect that the money should be applied

“For such purposes of police superannuation in Scotland as shall be provided for in any Act that may be subsequently passed by Parliament.”

This proposal would enable the question to be considered without unduly rushing a Bill of this magnitude through the House. I trust, at any rate, the Government will be able to give us some assurance as to the adequacy of the sum proposed to be given to Scotland, and that they will further assure us they have explained to the rank and file of the police that they will have to provide the most substantial contribution to the fund.

(8.1.) MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): The argument used by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that money ought to be voted for England, and therefore ought to be voted for Scotland, and that we had better take the money now that we have the chance, ought not to be passed by without notice. This is a question which has been frequently under consideration during the last seven or eight years. I earnestly press on the Government to give an answer to the question put by my hon. Friend the Member for the College Division of Glasgow, namely, whether any steps have been taken to ascertain whether their proposals will be acceptable to the great body of the police, and also to the large Municipalities in Scotland. Personally, I do not think their proposals can be very widely known, and that is certainly a reason why we should not come to a hasty decision. It is important we should know how the Local Authorities, particularly the County Councils, will look at this scheme. During the last seven or eight years there has been a considerable alteration in the view entertained by Local Bodies as to police superannuation, and therefore the Government must not consider, that because they are practically re-introducing an old Bill, they have the full support of the majority of the inhabitants of Scotland. The Local Authorities will not be in possession of the Government's proposals until Wednesday morning, and it is hardly likely they will be able to come to a decision with regard to them forthwith. I trust that ample time will be allowed for the consideration of this matter by those chiefly interested.

(8.10.) MR. MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbright): I can hardly think hon. Gentlemen opposite are serious in their opposition to this section, nor can I understand that the people of Scotland will not be thoroughly satisfied with this Bill. If the hon. Gentlemen who are raising obstacles to the passing of this measure feel that they require more time, no doubt they will have ample opportunity of considering the question in all its bearings when the Police Bill is before the House. But to suppose that the Scotch Police are not as anxious to be put in the same favourable position as the police in England is a great mistake. I am satisfied the Local Authorities will think this measure a very good one, and, therefore, I hope hon. Gentlemen will not any longer resist the passing of the clause.

(8.15.) MR. DUFF (Banffshire): I approve of superannuation, but I certainly think that the sum proposed, which is to go on accumulating, is very large, especially when there are various other objects in Scotland to which the money could be applied. At the same time, while desiring further information, I am far from being opposed or antagonistic in any way to a proper and well-considered scheme of police superannuation.

(8.16.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: It seems to me that when the Chancellor of the Exchequer told us we had better take this money when we could get it, he forgot we have got it already. We have got it under the Inland Revenue Bill, and now we are considering how it is to be distributed. I think the superannuation of the police is a desirable object; but the question is, whether £40,000 which is proposed to be given, is a right sum to give for that object. In regard to that question, I have not heard a word from hon. Gentlemen opposite. The Lord Advocate seems determined by his silence to justify the suggestion that he was not wanted here and that we have brought him up from Scotland for nothing. I have no doubt that the Solicitor General for Scotland gave us the best answer he could under the instruction he had, but he did not say why the Government fixed upon this particular sum. I did think we should have had some actuarial calculation, but we have had nothing of the kind. The Solicitor General believes that for some years there will be a great deal more money than is required. Is it desirable to bottle up this money for purposes which, perhaps, may never arise, when there are extremely pressing necessities in Scotland for more money? We are just short of getting free education; we want something added to what we have not got to complete the matter. Indeed, there are many subjects to which this money could be applied, and, therefore, I think we ought to be told what are the reasons under which they ask the House to give this particular sum for this particular purpose.

(8.20.) MR. LYELL (Orkney and Shetland): As representing Orkney and Shetland, I object entirely to this proposal. My constituency will not receive a single penny of this money, and I am not aware that the Government are going to refuse the increased duty from spirits and beer which my constituents will have to pay. The superannuation grant is only to be given on the certificate of the Secretary for Scotland, and only when the Secretary for Scotland obtains a certificate from an Inspector of police as to the efficiency of the local force. The Police Force of Orkney and Shetland have remained entirely independent of the Central Authority, and receive no portion of the grant for the pay and clothing of the police. They have maintained their independence, and I think it very unfair that the people of Orkney and Shetland should be forced to contribute towards this large sum of money, and obtain nothing in return for it, in the way of grant for police superannuation, that I can see.

(8.23.) THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): The question as to how much money will be required is one which, owing to the nature of the condition, requires to be answered guardedly, because, if we take the question of how much money will be required at once, it is obvious that that is a partial and one-sided view. We have to deal with a case where the number of pensioners will continue to increase for a number of years to come.

MR. HUNTER: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to put the matter a little clearer. I asked whether the Bill is intended to apply to those now in the Force and eligible, but who have contributed nothing, or only to those who may come into the Force.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: It is proposed to let the men who are now superannuated receive benefit at once. It has been asked whether the assent of the police has been obtained for this scheme. If that means whether a plebiscite has been taken, certainly not. But there is one reason why there can be no objection to the passing of the scheme so far as individual interests are concerned, and that is that there is a clause expressly providing that if anyone dislikes the terms, he may remain outside the scheme, and that without prejudice to his position. As to whether £40,000 will be required at once, I will point out that, assuming 300 men were to retire at once, and that each was allowed £50, the amount required at once would be £15,000. We have looked into this matter very carefully, and we have found that as we go on the amount demanded will rise up to so large a sum that it will exceed immensely the sum of £40,000; and, therefore, it will be fallacious to treat this question as one which can be answered absolutely. We must deal with it in a sensible way, and there is every reason to believe that a grant of £40,000 will not entail an inordinate claim on the ratepayers, because we shall have the 2½ per cent., which will amount to £7,500 a year, and other contributions will amount to a considerable sum. The residue necessary to be found will, of course, fall upon the ratepayers. This scheme is, as every superannuation scheme must be, one in which it is desirable that the Imperial contribution shall be but a contribution, and not a sum which will carry the whole burden. Further, it is desirable that there shall be some stimulus to the savings of the men, and that they shall have an interest in the fund to which they are contributories. I have frankly stated the financial aspect of the question, and all I can say is that this is a reasonable and adequate contribution in order to put the scheme upon a fair footing. I do not wish to throw at hon. Gentlemen the taunt or suggestion that they are opposed to the superannuation of the police, but they can best get rid of any doubt on that point by proceeding to accept this clause, which does not go into any of the details. The Government do not propose a Select Committee to deal with this matter, but it may be sent to a Grand Committee, where it can have a business-like discussion. (8.30.)

(9.2.) Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present.

(9.5.) MR. HUNTER: There was one statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer on which I should like to say a word. The right hon. Gentleman objected that if this scheme is rejected the ultimate liability will be cast on the ratepayers. It is true that the Bill provides for an ultimate liability, but I doubt very much whether that proposal can be sustained. It certainly will receive a most vigorous opposition from this side of the House in the absence of the exact calculations with which the Government ought to furnish the Committee. I would compare the use of that argument with the assertion sometimes made in support of the solvency of a Friendly Society in the words, "If we cannot pay our way, we can make a levy." I regret very much that the Lord Advocate indicated the opinion on the part of the Government that the Superannuation Bill should be referred to the Grand Committee on Law. The question of superannuation ought not to be referred to the Grand Committee, because that Committee cannot hear witnesses. The matter should go to a Select Committee, because the Committee will require the evidence of actuarial experts, for it is evident that at the present moment the Government are entirely in the dark as to the financial position of their scheme. How utterly erroneous their view is, the Government have shown in one part of their Bill. One clause says the contribution from the £40,000 should be equal to the weekly payments of the men, but as the deductions from the men are to be at the rate of 2½ per cent., which would yield only £7,300, the £40,000 would be 5½ times the contribution from the Force, equivalent to an increase in wages of 2s. 9d. in the £1, which would be an enormous increase in the amount available for the Police Force. I mention that, not because I object to the increase, large as it would be, but because I think that, if the Government were really to go into the question, they would find that sum would enable them to give far larger benefits to the police than they have under the Superannuation Bill. Take, for example, the total amount required to superannuate the existing officers. The proposal to give two-thirds of the actual pay a constant is enjoying would require a certain sum of money. The Lord Advocate did not tell us how much the superannuation of the police would cost, but I have made a calculation based on the minimum figure in regard to age. Putting down pensions for officers at £60 and men at £50, I estimate that the sum required is £18,840. The other proposals in the Bill are quite insufficient to bring the sum up to £30,000. Yet it is obvious that the grant supplemented by the contribution of the men and by money derived from other sources must be considerably in excess of £50,000. The total cost of the police in Scotland is only £292,000, and a sixth part of that sum would make a very heavy Pension List. These are points on which I think we should have some information. I do not bring this forward for the purpose of pressing the Lord Advocate for an answer, but I do it for the purpose of impressing on him the importance of referring the matter to a Select Committee in order to obtain some actuarial evidence. According to the Rules of Debate, I may not discuss the provisions of the Bill, but I believe I shall be in order in saying what would be the kind of superannuation for which I would gladly vote. I should desire that a superannuation should be based on the idea of an Insurance and Provident Fund, and on which the contributions of the men themselves should form a most material circumstance, both in determining the time at which they should receive the pensions and the amount they should be paid. I would say, not only that a certain age should entitle a man to a pension, but that he ought to be entitled to a pension if he is permanently disabled from any cause, whether previous to that age or not, and provision should be made for the children of any man who is killed until the youngest is 15 years of age. Provisions of that kind may be found in the Bill, but I would make the measure more extensive. If we take this Bill before an ordinary Select Committee, it may be that we shall hear enough to satisfy us that a larger object would be obtained by this sum of money. The Lord Advocate may take a different view, and, therefore, it is most important that we should have this Committee before which evidence can be given decisively one way or the other. I believe that with this £40,000 a great deal more than is proposed by the Government ought to be accomplished in the way of police superannuation. And before I sit down I should like to say that whatever pension is paid ought to be paid as a right and not as a favour. Is it to be paid as a favour? ["No, no!"] I infer from the right hon. Gentleman's denial that he will be willing to strike out that portion of the Bill, and I will put down Amendments for that purpose. Then, the pension should be absolutely irrevocable. To say that a certain amount of money is due to a man as a legal debt, and then to say that if he does something or other it will be taken away, is inconsistent with the theory of insurance and thoroughly objectionable. I think a considerable part of the fund should be found from the contributions of the men. As matters now stand, the contributions of the men cannot be more than one-seventh of the whole—that is to say, six-sevenths are to be contributed by the State and one-seventh by the men. I am not sure that a larger sum should not be contributed by the men. It would be a most satisfactory way of dealing with the question for the Government to give us some information as to the persons they have consulted and the information they have received as the basis of their calculation, or for them to put before us in the form of a Paper the practical scheme they intend to work out. When I rose at an earlier portion of the evening to ask the Lord Advocate to appoint a Select Committee, and said if his answer was not satisfactory I should move to report Progress, I was actuated entirely by a desire to enable the Government to get through with this question. We heard nothing about that question until the very last moment, when the Lord Advocate interposed. I am sure hon. Members will agree with me that the details of this question can be better discussed in a Select Committee than in Committee of the whole House. It is impossible to exaggerate the importance of this question. We have now an opportunity of starting a system financially sound from the beginning and bound to be sound all through. I am sure that the proceedings before a Select Committee will be at least as short as proceedings before this House would be, and I believe the results obtained would be much more satisfactory. Personally, I am favourable to a scheme of superannuation, and I am only anxious to render the Government every assistance in my power in obtaining as good a scheme as possible.

\(9.22.)* Mr. LENG (Dundee): I wish to state a further reason why the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee rather than to the Grand Committee on Law—

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out that the Motion before the Committee refers to the allocation of £40,000 to the Superannuation Fund, and any question as to the desirability of referring the Bill to a Select Committee or a Grand Committee, except in strict connection with that, is quite irrelevant.

\(9.23.)* Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): I anticipate with some degree of certainty that it may be imputed to my hon. Friends that they are spinning out the Debate for some ulterior reason, but I can assure the Government that they had no such idea. If they had such an idea it would be a very foolish one, because the next sub-section provides ample opportunity for Debate. The question before the Committee is a serious one, and my hon. Friends have treated it with considerable forbearance. My hon. Friend would have been justified in moving to report Progress, because we have, until this afternoon, received no information as to the mode in which the money is to be expended, and the Bill introduced this evening reached the hands of hon. Members too late to be studied before discussing the sub-section before the Committee. The question of police superannuation is entirely new in Scotland. We have a blank sheet of paper on which to write, and it is, therefore, all the more necessary that Scottish opinion should be thoroughly informed on the subject. I am not sure that in every part of Scotland there is a burning desire to have any system of superannuation. Scotch Members, however, wish to know upon what data the Government arrive at the sum of £40,000. I will tell the Committee why I think they ask for £40,000. When the Government made up their minds to impose the tax on spirits, they had an object to serve in England; but when they came to Scotland, they found themselves with the money in hand, and had to look about for some object to which they might apply it. That is the cart before the horse with a vengeance. My idea of finance is that you should, first of all, find the object for which you wish to expend the money, and then lay on the taxes to meet the expenditure. If my supposition is not correct, let us have from the President of the Local Government Board some little information as to the data on which this sum is based. The figures quoted to-night on this side of the House would seem to imply that this is a grossly exaggerated sum. I have already said that I do not look with much favour on the policy of Police Superannuation. That is my personal, academic, and pious opinion. But if this thing is to be done at all, we, at least, do not want to vote a larger sum of money than is necessary. We further want to know what reason there is to suppose that this money is needed. The Chancellor of the Exchequer adopted a tone on this subject which I, as a Scotchman, do not much admire. He looked rather knowingly, and he said to us, "Surely Scotch Members won't refuse this money when it is offered to them; they will take it, and then, afterwards, they will see how it is to be applied under the Police Bill." That is the old Cockney view of the Scotchman—that he is a greedy fellow, anxious to take money from whatever source he can get it. I do not accept that character of my countrymen. They are a frugal people, who do not wish to see their own money mis-spent, and who do not wish to see the money of other people mis-spent. We are entitled to ask for more information than we have yet received. We were told the other night that we had no reason to complain, because this was the way in which the English Bill was dealt with—that the sum of money was voted before the Bill was introduced. If that bad example was set and protested against at the time, there was all the more reason for avoiding it on this occasion. Then we were told that the Bill was a very simple matter, because it followed the English precedent. If that were so, it was the more easy to produce the Scotch Bill earlier. On every ground we have reason to complain that we have received so little accurate information on the subject from Her Majesty's Government. So far from making any unreasonable demand upon the Government, the Scotch Members have been most forbearing in not interposing a Motion for the Adjournment on the ground that we have not in our possession that which I feel perfectly certain—if there is a real foundation for this scheme—the Government will give us in a moment, namely, the positive data upon which this sum of £40,000 has been arrived at, and in what proportion the sum which is to superannuate the police is to be derived from its different sources.

*(9.5.) THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I regret I was not here during the earlier part of the right hon. Gentleman's observations, but I think I can give a general answer to his question. I believe the tendency of his remarks and those of other hon. Members from Scotland is that £40,000 is too much. I would point out that actuarial calculations are the most difficult and impossible to present with accuracy; but from the information I have, I believe myself that the sum of £40,000 in a few years will not represent much more than one-third of the police superannuation.

*MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: For Scotland?

*MR. MATTHEWS: Yes; I can only give the right hon. Gentleman general figures on the subject. And I take the Police Force of London, in which the police superannuation is less excessive and liberal than is provided for in this Bill. It was in 1862 that the extravagant and excessive scale of superannuation was brought under notice by Sir George Grey, and it was then reduced to the present scale. The present expenditure on the 15,000 members of the Metropolitan Police is £202,591 a year, and I am told by actuaries that we are likely to have that amount doubled, and that, ultimately, the charge will be more than £400,000. I agree that the analogy I have given is rather a rough one, but it is almost impossible to give a correct actuarial result. If the right hon. Gentleman will take the trouble to turn to the proceedings of the Committee in 1877, he will find that they waited for two years until Dr. Farr got out of the police books the data on which were based certain Resolutions laid before the Committee. I am sorry to say, after all the elaborate research, the greater part of Dr. Farr's conclusions were mistaken. The number of pensioners in the Metropolitan Force turned out to be double what he estimated.

*MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Can the right hon. Gentleman give any reason why the actuarial calculations of the amount of pensions should be so much more difficult in the case of the Police Force than in the case of the Army and Navy and the Civil Service?

*MR. MATTHEWS: I will not enter upon the question of the Army and Navy. I have not considered these two Forces. I have told the right hon. Gentleman of the difficulty in the case of the Police Force. Observe that from 15 years to 25 years, if a man is disabled from duty, he is entitled to a pension. That disablement depends on a thousand and one contingencies. I daresay, if you took 300,000 policemen, you might be able to get an average which would afford a basis for probable calculations. But you cannot get anything like that number to enable you to estimate the number of pensioners. Dr. Farr calculated the number of pensioners at 14 to the 100; but the result has shown that 38, instead of 14, is the actual number taken out. We have consulted the best opinion we could get, and the Actuary (Mr. Finlaison), who was consulted also by my right hon. Friend (the Lord Advocate), informs me that the amount of superannuation may be expected to go up from £202,591 to £550,000. Seeing that we are giving to Scotland with 4,000 police £40,000, the right hon. Gentleman will see that, approximately, the proportion is the same as £150,000 for the Metropolis. I really have not the information with regard to Scotland. We want to know, for instance, how many of the Scotch Police have taken service for 25 years, and would come out under the Bill at once.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): 370.

*MR. MATTHEWS: I have not been able to obtain that figure, and I have very grave doubts as to its accuracy. However, it really does not matter for the purpose of my argument. You have to ascertain the number who have served 15 years, and the number likely to be disabled by sickness or accident. Possibly, for the first three or four years the £40,000 will be too much, though I do not think that will be found to be the case. But should it turn out so, then Clause 22 of the Police Bill provides that part of the accumulations may be devoted to other local purposes. But I own, myself, that I do not think that £40,000 in Scotland will be too much, even if the funds are allowed to accumulate.

(9.45.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): The speech just made by the right hon. Gentleman is the most important speech that has yet been made during the Debates on this Bill, because it alters the whole situation of the case both as regards England and Scotland, for the right hon. Gentleman has told us, but without producing the Papers on which his calculation rests—Papers which the House ought to have if they are in existence—that which must be appalling both to County and Borough Members, and which will necessitate a re-consideration of the whole position. The entire amount now paid in pensions is £371,000, and the Home Secretary has told us we must count upon that sum being at least doubled, so that it will amount to between £700,000 and £800,000. The result will be that, instead of the counties and boroughs deriving an expected advantage from the £150,000 a year, which is to be given under the Bill, they will have to pay an enormous amount in addition to what they already contribute. I think the Government will find that the boroughs and counties of England will have a good deal to say before they sanction a system of police superannuation which will involve such a vast increase of expenditure. We have some figures—not the right hon. Gentleman's actuarial calculations, which are hidden somewhere among the archives of the Home Office—on which we can go. I allude to the Returns furnished by the Under Secretary. From these the House can form some opinion as to how the Police Fund is working, and how this proposal will affect the Scotch people. There are 4,100 policemen in Scotland. Now, let me take one or two typical cases in England, where I know in one case, and I believe in the other, the Superannuation Fund is administered efficiently, liberally, and well. In Liverpool the Police Force is as nearly as possible one-third that of Scotland, namely, Liverpool has 1,346 policemen, against 4,100 in Scotland; the entire amount paid in pensions in Liverpool is £1,700 a year, upon which basis the amount required for Scotland would be £23,000 a year. Then I take the County of Staffordshire. The Police Fund there is divided among three counties, rated by three separate rates, there being a town police, a patrol police, and a rural police. Staffordshire has a large accumulated fund, which is not only in a position of perfect solvency, but out of which the men are most liberally dealt with. There are nearly 600 policemen in Staffordshire, the number being 581, and the sum paid in pensions is £3,500 a year. On that basis the amount required for Scotland would be £24,000 a year. If you go between those two figures, namely, £24,000 and £33,000, it would seem impossible to spend anything like £50,000 a year in police pensions in Scotland.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): £40,000 a year.

*(9.50.) MR. H. H. FOWLER: The contribution of the Government is to be £40,000 a year; but, taking the deductions from the men's pay at 2½ per cent. there will be an extra amount of £10,000, which will make the total £50,000. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has indignantly denounced the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh (MR. CHILDERS) that he should make a common fund; in which case, I believe, there would be no burden on the Scotch rates at all; but whether this be so or not, it is evident that £40,000 a year would be enormously in excess of the requirements of Scotland. Such an expenditure is unknown either in the Civil Service or in the Army and Navy, and would be an intolerable burden upon the country. This proposal very strongly confirms my determination to resist this measure.

*(9.52.) MR. RITCHIE: The Home Secretary has pointed out that the actuarial calculations on this matter are not altogether reliable, while some of them have been shown to be incorrect. As I understand, however, there seems to be a general opinion in the House that the matter requires further investigation.

[An hon. MEMBER: A Select Committee.] There can be no doubt, after the various statements that have been made, that there is considerable room for difference of opinion on the question, and I understand that the desire for a Select Committee is not accompanied by any wish to delay the application of the principle of superannuation or to throw any difficulty in the way of settling the question. Under those circumstances, the Government, anxious to meet the wishes of the House that the subject shall be fully investigated, and believing that this course will be generally approved, will consent to the suggestion as to the appointment of a Committee.

(9.54.) MR. STOREY (Sunderland): If this were a purely Scotch quarrel I should not have entered into it; but as several English Members have taken part in the Debate, perhaps I, as representing a constituency near the Scottish border, may be allowed to offer a few remarks. Although what I am about to say may be regarded as a voice crying in the wilderness, I cannot but think that the whole system under which the Government propose to superannuate the police is utterly wrong. I cannot see why the police should be treated better in Scotland than the soldiers who fight for their country, and I entirely object to an arrangement under which the servants of one Department of the State are allowed the benefit of this superannuation process. I warn the Government to look to this matter. The Socialistic claim is that all men should be pensioned by the State at a certain age, and this will receive strong support from this attempt to superannuate the Scotch Police. At the present moment we are paying a sum amounting altogether to between £6,000,000 and £7,000,000 for what I may call dead men; that is, men who are dead so far as the service of the State is concerned; and now it is proposed that this system shall be extended to the police throughout the country. I am astonished to find that the President of the Local Government Board should, of all men, be the Minister to propose a measure like this, because two years ago, when he brought forward his Local Government Bill, many on those Benches applauded his statement that the ancient rotten system of subvention by the Central Authority to the Local Authority was to be done away with; that the ancient system of centralisation was to be put an end to; and that in future not only the old Local Authorities, but the new Authorities, who are his own children, should have to deal only with their own burdens.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Member that he is travelling somewhat wide of the question.

MR. STOREY: I am only arguing that it is wrong to spend this £40,000 for police superannuation in Scotland, and was illustrating my argument by the fact that the right hon. Gentleman is re-introducing the very system he professed to destroy two years ago. Who is to arrange it? Are the Municipalities in Scotland to do as they please; are the County Authorities to make what arrangement they choose? Not so. The Home Secretary comes here and resuscitates that old-fashioned and condemned method of using the central power to control the local power. The Government propose the form in which the Local Authority should give this superannuation, but they go a step further in the very bad system. Under the old system we in Berwickshire could get rid of the control of the right hon. Gentleman at any time by refusing the half grant. But what is the case now? The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board gives us the money, and, at the same time, introduces a Bill which will become an Act, which will be binding on all the Local Authorities in Scotland. Therefore, in this system of police superannuation, the right hon. Gentleman is re-introducing in a baser form the very vice of control by the Central Authority which he put an end to two years ago. I, in common with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton, have been concerned to hear what cost all this is to involve the Municipalities in. In our own borough the County Council will, I believe, reject the Bill; but the police have already done so, and they have done so because they decline utterly to have this cast-iron rule laid down for them by the Central Authority in London—to have it arranged by a Government which does not understand at all the circumstances of the various localities. I dare say the Home Secretary is quite right. He says he has done his best to understand the Police Superannuation Bill for London, but, to judge from his attitude to-night, I do not think he understands it. But even if he did understand the necessities of London, that would not justify the House in believing that he understands very much about the northern counties. Local circumstances differ, and local needs differ, and for the House of Commons to permit the Government to lay down a cast-iron rule without regard to special circumstances seems not only to return to an evil state of things, but is also a very bad thing in itself. Therefore, I shall oppose the proposal. I do not believe the Committee will be doing wisely in face of the important social questions that are being raised, and will be raised, throughout this and other countries, to carry this system of superannuation, not merely to military persons and servants serving in our public offices, but still further to persons serving under our Local Authorities. The view of the people of the North, at any rate, is that you should pay a man—whether he be a Cabinet Minister, or an officer of the Army, or a Civil servant, or a policeman—as all workmen are paid: give him good wages, so as to enable him to provide for old age by contributing to some Benefit Society. That I claim to be the manly plan, and I object to the principle by which we apply this system of superannuation to one set of public servants after another. I object to it unless the Government will go the whole length of their principles, like the Emperor of Germany, and bring in a Bill to provide for the superannuation of all people in every rank and grade of society when they are no longer able to support themselves. I warn the Government that, even after the Bill has passed the ordeal of a Select Committee, there will still remain men in the House compelled to resist the measure because it restores the evil principle of centralisation, and because it applies a principle to policemen which ought not to be so applied unless the Government are prepared to extend its operations very much further.

*(10.8.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.) rose to continue the discussion.

Mr. Storey

(10.8.) MR. MARK STEWART rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but the CHAIRMAN withheld his assent, and declined then to put that question.

*(10.9.) MR. ESSLEMONT: I think the prohibitory Motion which the hon. Member (Mr. Mark Stewart) has put, will not do much to further the interests of police superannuation in Scotland. As a Scotch Member who has believed for many years that a prima facie case has been made out for superannuation, I think the proposal of the President of the Local Government Board, to refer the Police Superannuation (Scotland) Bill to a Select Committee, is, in many respects, satisfactory. We have only late this afternoon received the Bill, which contains a great many intricate clauses and startling proposals, and it is but reasonable that time should be given to fully consider the nature of these proposals. I can assure the Government that the proposal that a policeman earning 24s. a week should, at the age of 46, receive for the remainder of his life 16s. a week, is one which it will be very difficult to induce men who at no period of their lives can earn more than 16s. a week to agree to. Although I think there is a strong case made out on behalf of those who have been hurt in the execution of their duties as policemen, and the families of those who may be killed while discharging their duties as policemen, I think it is most desirable that the Police Bill should not be in any way rushed through Committee, but that ample time should be given to consider the measure, both in the interest of the police and the ratepayers.

(10.12.) MR. HUNTER: I beg leave to withdraw the Amendment, the Government having so handsomely made the concession that I asked for at seven o'clock. I would merely point out that, if the Government had conceded the point when I raised the question, we should have been saved this three hours' discussion. The right hon. Gentleman did not appear to be aware that £40,000 is 15·7 per cent. of the whole sum spent on the police in Scotland.

(10.13.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: As to the alarming statement of the Home Secretary, I think it would have been better if the Government had made arrangements to reconcile the statements of its several Members. The Solicitor General for Scotland tells us that this money is more than enough, but the right hon. Gentleman opposite says it is three times as much as will be wanted. I think the Home Secretary is entering on a mad career of excessive and extravagant superannuation which will do more harm than good.

(10.14.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): Am I correct in thinking that we have now done Sub-section 1? ["No, no."]

MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND (Sutherland): I have no objection to the superannuation of the police, but I should like to know who asks for this scheme of superannuation for Scotland. I have frequently in this House pressed the claims of a part of Scotland in which I am particularly interested, but the Government have persistently refused to do anything for it. Yet they introduce this huge scheme for the superannuation of the police without having, so far as I am aware, having ever been asked for it.

(10.16.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): Let us understand where we are before we divide. I understand the Bill is to come before a Select Committee, and that before the Select Committee reports we are to decide whether we are going to spend £40,000, or £20,000, or £5,000, or perhaps nothing for this purpose. We will not allow the Amendment to be withdrawn, as we are some of us altogether opposed to the clause. This is an attempt to thrust English ideas upon Scotland. Until now we have been able to prevent that. We have no system of pensions in Scotland, not even in our Poor Law, and those of us who are opposed to such a system intend to vote against it now.

THE CHAIRMAN: Is it your pleasure that the Motion be withdrawn? [Cries of "No."]

Question put, "That Sub-section (1) stand part of the Clause."

(10.20.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 237; Noes 170.—(Div. List, No. 151.)

*(10.34.) MR. RITCHIE: Looking at the time we have now arrived at, I propose to move to report Progress, so that the Committee may see the Government Amendments on the Paper. I hope to-morrow we may commence the discussion of Sub-section 2, dealing with licences in Scotland, and that we may have some hopes of going on to a rapid conclusion of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Ritchie.)

(10.35.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Government propose to take Wednesday?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): The Amendment of which notice has been given by the First Lord of the Treasury bears a little resemblance to an Amendment of mine moved a week ago and rejected.

THE CHAIRMAN: That is not relevant to the Motion before the Committee. I have no doubt the Committee will allow the right hon. Gentleman to state the difference, but he must not argue the question.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: My Amendment proposed that this Bill should be hung up, and that the money should accumulate until Parliament had dealt with two principles, namely, the power of the Magistrates to refuse to renew licences, and the increase of the Licence Duties in respect of the improvement in the value of public houses, caused by the extinction of other houses.

THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Gentleman's statement is not pertinent to the Motion to report Progress.

(10.42.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I am very glad the right hon. Gentleman has moved to report Progress until the House has had time to examine and consider the proposals of the Government. As far as we understand them on this side of the House, they do not seem to remove the fundamental objections we entertain. The right hon. Gentleman expressed the hope that the Bill would have a rapid progress. Some weeks ago we stated the terms on which this Bill should have a rapid progress. I have only to re-state those terms. This Bill will have a rapid progress as soon as the principle of paying for annual licences is removed from it. As long as that principle remains in the Bill, whether in presentio or in futuro, we shall feel it necessary to oppose it as being unsound and mischievous.

(10.39.) MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.): Does the right hon. Gentleman propose to proceed with this Committee to-morrow? As the Government propose to omit some of the clauses, it may be necessary to make some of the Amendments on the paper applicable to other clauses.

*MR. RITCHIE: No, Sir; we must adhere to the proposals we have made. It seems to me that the Amendments on the clauses to be withdrawn would hardly be applicable to the other proposals of the Bill.

MR. R. T. REID: I referred to the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Grimsby (Mr. Heneage), providing that no alteration should be made in the existing law.

*MR. RITCHIE: Of course the Government have assented to that, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Grimsby would be able to bring it forward.

(10.41.) SIR L. PLAYFAIR (Leeds, S.): It might facilitate the consideration of the Amendment if the First Lord of the Treasury would tell us what the precedents are for taking an annual sum and accumulating it for this purpose.

THE CHAIRMAN: That is not relevant to the question.

(10.42.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): We want to know exactly how we stand, and I venture to make a suggestion to the Government in the interest of the dispatch of business. They have moved to report Progress on the ground that it is desired that the House should see what is proposed. I think that we should see that for ourselves to-morrow. I cannot help thinking the Government must have some other little matter up their sleeve. They ask us, against the interest of their own Bill, to assent to this Motion to report Progress. I suggest that the proper course to adopt is to re-commit the Bill. This is a wholly different measure to that we assented to on the Second Reading. Three of the most important clauses are to be struck out. In the famous words of an Irish Judge, that is enough to capsize the intellect. The House in its corporate capacity assented to the Bill on the ground that it was a Bill to compensate the publican. ["Oh, oh!"] We now understand the three compensatory clauses are to be omitted. I said "we." Of course, if you are we, I am satisfied. Not only are the three clauses to be dropped out of the Bill, but in addition some quite Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) is to be adopted. It is well we should know what is the last mind of the Cabinet on this question. Of course, if Cabinet Councils are called so frequently as at present it is rather difficult for us to know how we stand, but I suggest that we should be told what the mind of the Cabinet was on Saturday.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order! The question is that I report Progress and ask leave to sit again.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I am resisting the Motion to report Progress. I object to the Motion unless we get from the Government some distinct announcement as to the reason why Progress should be reported, as I understand Government intend to bring in a number of new Amendments. We have assented to the Second Reading of the Bill on one ground, and they are going to ask the Committee to pass it on another.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. and learned Gentleman asks why we have made the Motion to report Progress. We have done so in answer to an appeal, made at 5 o'clock, from the opposite Benches, that the Government should report Progress when the first sub-section was disposed of. I think the hon. and learned Gentleman will find it is not in accordance with the practice of the House to re-commit a Bill under such circumstances as exist in the present case.

(10.48.) MR. T. M. HEALY: Five o'clock and 11 o'clock are different things. The Government are responding at 11 o'clock to what they were asked at 5 o'clock.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. and learned Gentleman is quite mistaken. We were asked to report Progress when the first sub-section was disposed of, and we have agreed to that suggestion.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The Government were asked at 5 o'clock to report Progress. [Cries of "No."] My hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen appealed to the Government at 5 o'clock not to go on with the Bill at all to-day; but they insisted upon the Scotch Members considering the Bill. Now, at 11 o'clock, they consent to report Progress. I say that is not a fair way in which to treat the House. I will make another suggestion to the Government. They profess to be anxious to make progress with the Bill. I suppose that to-morrow we shall reach the Irish clauses of the Bill. If so, would it not be reasonable that the Government should accept the proposition made by the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell), who in this matter is stronger than the licensed victualling party of the Government, that the Irish Members should be allowed to deal with this matter themselves.

(10.55.) SIR G. TREVELYAN: I was about to rise to move to report Progress when the right hon. Gentleman opposite did so, and on precisely the same grounds. New Amendments of great importance are to be proposed, and it will require time for hon. Gentlemen to see whether their Amendments to Clauses 5, 6, and 7, that are going to be struck out, could be attached to any of the clauses of the Bill, in order that if the Bill was forced through the House we shall not be committed to the principle of compensation without any of the safeguards which some of the Amendments on the Paper will provide.

(10.56.) MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.): I quite agree it was understood that Progress was to be reported to-night when it was convenient, but I did not understand Progress was to be reported for the express purpose of beginning afresh to-morrow. I understood Progress was to be reported to give the Scotch Members time to arrive at a comprehension of the various bearings of the changes which have been made and—

MR. RITCHIE rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

(11.0.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 248; Noes 215.—(Div. List, No. 152.)

Question put accordingly, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House will, To-morrow, again resolve itself into the Committee on the Bill."—(Mr. Ritchie.)

(11.20.) MR. WALLACE: I beg to move that the Bill be set down for Thursday. I do so on the general ground that some little time is required to ascertain exactly how we stand in this matter in the light of the new attitude which, I think in your presence, Sir, was described by the right hon. Gentleman. I think the Government are taking far too light a view of the difficulties that surround the process of completely apprehending and understanding, in all its bearings, the new situation in which they have placed their business in this, as well as in other matters. It is not simply a comprehension of the proposition put before us, but the surveying of it in that historical light in which all their proceedings now require to be set. There are such a variety and number of complications that invite the attention of the contemplative mind in considering the proceedings of the Government in respect to any of their measures, large or small, that the cautious understanding is at once awakened to the necessity for a proper interval for research and consideration. I do not know, Sir, that I should be in order if I endeavoured to convey to your mind an understanding of what has been done, or was attempted to be done, in Committee, but, perhaps, you will allow me to say that while in connection with a matter purely relevant to the Scottish side of the question, I was promptly closed by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ritchie), who, if he does not take care, will rapidly realise a description once given of him by a prominent and distinguished leader of the Party to which he belongs—I was closed while yet in the incipient stage of a very short speech, intended to be an endeavour to show special reasons why Scotch Members should be considered in this matter. It has come with entire novelty upon us, and, speaking for myself, and I think I may speak for some of my Colleagues, we do not at once grasp the full significance of the proposal before us. I have a certain dim sense of the ridiculous in the situation the right hon. Gentleman has put before us to-night, necessarily dim in view of the circumstances and the appreciation of Members from the country from which I hail. I feel faintly and indefinitely convinced that there is something approximating to the farcical in the position in which we are placed towards the Scottish nation, and I and my Colleagues may require to consult our doctors before we can get a proper sense of the situation into our heads, and as many of us have important engagements to-morrow, and require a certain time to recover from the operation our not-sufficiently discerning compatriot has imposed on men of his own blood, it is necessary, in the serious and very important aspects of the case—though I may say the more serious aspect naturally impresses me more profoundly—it is necessary that we should have a longer interval than the right hon. Gentleman seems disposed to allow us. I quite suppose that when the Government proposed to report Progress they thought they had kept their word to the letter, but they proposed to report Progress with the object that the House, not to speak of the Scotch contingent of the House, should have time sufficient to understand the altered situation, and adapt their necessary Amendments to the new position of affairs. I venture to say this is quite impossible if we only see the exact nature of the Government Amendment, and have time to study its effect to-morrow morning. I must, therefore, seriously propose that the Committee shall not be resumed until Thursday.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "To-morrow," and insert the word "Thursday,"—(Mr. Wallace),—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the word 'To-morrow' stand part of the Question."

(11.25.) MR. STOREY: In a sentence or two I must reinforce the suggestion of my hon. Friend. I do not intend to allude to the precise point raised that we shall not have time to put down our Amendments, but I venture to represent to you, Sir, as guardian of the business of the House, as well as to the Government which is supposed to direct us, that an Amendment is to be moved, of which you have no official cognisance; we have only heard it read out, we have not had it set down, and cannot measure its importance; but there is more in this matter than the mere question of putting down Amendments. The Amendment I may state in effect is this: the Government propose that the money shall be tied up in a purse and put away, not being appropriated during this Session of Parliament. Now, I venture to suggest to you, Sir, as Speaker of this House, that there is no precedent for such a proposal as the

Mr. Wallace

Government have now made; and so convinced am I on that point that I intend to raise the question before the Bill is taken in Committee again, and to ask you, Sir, whether, under the Standing Orders and practice of Parliament, such an Amendment is in order. The law of Parliament hitherto, and for 100 years, has been that the money granted and raised by taxation shall be appropriated during the year, either in the Bill providing the money or in future Bills passed in the same Session of Parliament, and I challenge right hon. Gentlemen, and I challenge the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as the highest Government authority in the absence of the First Lord of the Treasury, to produce a single precedent in this or any Parliament where a proposal was made and successfully carried, granting a sum of money to the Government, ostensibly for the service of the year, and then the Government came down, saying, "After all, we do not need it for the service of the year, so we will tie it up for future use." I say that would be getting money under false pretences from the people of the country, and, inasmuch as there are important questions of precedent to be raised, I submit it is unreasonable and unfair that we should be asked to discuss the matter to-morrow. It is now nearly midnight. We shall have this Amendment before us in our Parliamentary Papers, sent to us in the morning, and unless Members are far less indolent than myself, we shall have but a short morning in which to consider the Amendment as one it may be desirable to modify, as well as to search the history of Parliamentary finance, so as to be able to establish my contention, which I am sure I can establish. This goes to the root of the whole question. I submit that Parliament ought to have time allowed it to consider these matters, and I strongly support the Amendment, so that, instead of being forced unfairly—I may venture to say indecently—to take the matter to-morrow, some reasonable time should be afforded to the Opposition and its leaders to consider all the bearings of the question with full information. We are asking the Government only for what is just and reasonable. I submit, in the peculiar circumstances of the case, considering the great change which has taken place, and the important Constitutional point that may be raised, that we ought to take this question on Thursday.

(11.31.) MR. GOSCHEN: It is impossible for the Government to accept the suggestion. However plausible may be the suggestions which have come from the hon. Member who has just sat down, we have learned sufficient lessons to take them at their true worth. Let me remind the House of what has been the conduct of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite. We had assurances from the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian that we might hope to get the Committee on the proposed Standing Order without much discussion. It was shown at once, however, what command the right hon. Gentleman had over his own followers. ["Question."] It is all very well for Members opposite to allow their champions to call "Question" when we show reasons why we cannot assent. I am giving reasons why we consider the suggestion that we may get on with the business by accepting the Amendment as a mere sham. If we were to take other business to-morrow, it would be treated as the business to-night has been treated, with which we hope to make some progress. We were asked to report Progress, and when the hon. Member for Glasgow suggested what was entirely in accordance with the spirit of the agreement, he was thrown over by hon. Members below the Gangway, who endeavoured to speak one after the other. It is very astonishing how sensitive hon. Members are who attack the Government on every point. There is on the Paper the Bill dealing with the housing of the working classes. There is an hour and a half to get on with that Bill if hon. Members would give us the chance. The suggestion that we should postpone the question until Thursday would not advance business at all, for we know the manner in which hon. Members have acted. I am not disposed to discuss the merits of the question. The merits of the question are to be argued, it seems, upon every Motion of adjournment, upon every Motion for Progress, upon every sub-section. The hon. Member who has just sat down, and the hon. Member who preceded him, say they have no time to consider their Amendments. If they devoted the time during which they have been speaking on this subject to considering their Amendments they might do something. Hon. Members know the bearing of the Amendment of my right hon. Friend. Hon. Members have had ample opportunity since the announcement of my right hon. Friend to consider what Amendments should be put down. According to all the traditions of the House the Government would be absolutely justified in proceeding with the Bill to-morrow.

(11.40.) MR. J. MORLEY: The genial and conciliatory tone in which the right hon. Gentleman has just addressed the House enables us to realise the horror with which Gentlemen behind him look forward to an Autumn Session, which might leave the right hon. Gentleman as Leader of the House. An Autumn Session, we have been told, would lead to the withdrawal of the First Lord of the Treasury. Bad as an Autumn Session might be, it would be still worse if for eight or nine weeks we were to have the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer delivering speeches couched in the tone of the speech he has just addressed to us. He has made some remarks on our votes on the Closure Motion. Our answer is very simple. I voted against the Closure because I considered the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board rose and interrupted the hon. Member for East Edinburgh was one of those performances which needed to be protested against. The right hon. Gentleman assures us that the Government have learnt their lesson. I do not think that they have even yet learnt it, if we are to judge by the idle concession that they have made with regard to the Local Taxation Bill. We have still some other lessons to teach right hon. Gentlemen on that Bench. My hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland made a reasonable point which the right hon. Gentleman could have shortly answered. He asked whether there was any precedent for this proposal to accumulate money for a stated object. That was a legitimate point, and ought to have been answered. If the right hon. Gentleman had answered it he would have shown some respect for his political opponents. With regard to the immediate Motion before the House, why should not the Western Australia Bill have been fixed for to-morrow, and this Bill resumed on Thursday? No reason whatever has been given for not adopting this apparently convenient course.

(11.45.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): We have not yet heard a reply to the appeal made to the right hon. Gentleman. I think we have a right to some answer on the part of the Government. Surely they should re-consider their position. They are not treating their opponents fairly, and I think they are placing themselves in a false position.

The House divided:—Ayes 241; Noes 198.)—Div. List, No. 153)

Main Question put.

MR. SEXTON: If this Motion, Sir, be adopted after 12 o'clock, will not the effect be that we will have to re-sume consideration in Committee on Wednesday?

MR. SPEAKER: I must put the Main Question.

MR. SEXTON: It is now past 12 o'clock, and the Motion says "to-morrow." I submit it is now Tuesday.

MR. SPEAKER: The House will observe that the Motion was made on Monday.

MR. SEXTON: And carried on Tuesday.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That this House will, To-morrow, again resolve into the Committee.

SUPPLY REPORT.

Resolution [20th June] reported.

CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

CLASS III.

"That a sum, not exceeding £37,586, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1891, for the Salaries of the Commissioner and Assistant Commissioners of the Metropolitan Police, and of the Receiver for the Metropolitan Police District, the Pay and Expenses of Officers of Metropolitan Police employed on special duties, and the Salaries and Expenses of the Inspectors of Constabulary."

Resolution agreed to.

CUSTOMS CONSOLIDATION ACT (1876) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 247.)

Bill, as amended, considered; to be read the third time upon Thursday.

Mr. J. Morley

BOILER EXPLOSIONS ACT (1882) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 339.)

Bill read a second time, and committed for Wednesday.

EAST INDIA (CIVIL SERVANTS).

Motion made, and Question proposed.

"That a Select Committee be appointed to consider and report upon the alleged grievances of the Uncovenanted Civil Servants of India arising from the change in the relative value of gold and silver money and their leave and pension rules."

The Committee was accordingly nominated of:—Mr. King, Mr. Howorth, Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Bristowe, Viscount Baring, Sir William Plowden, Mr. Barbour, Mr. Alfred Pease, Mr. Buchanan, Mr. MacNeill, and Sir John Gorst.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Five be the quorum.—(Sir John Gorst.)

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Motion whether there is any hope of getting any Report from the Committee this Session with regard to the grievances of the Uncovenanted Indian Civil Servants?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): I am afraid that, owing to the long delay that has taken place in the appointment of the Committee, it may be difficult for them to report during the present Session.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): May I suggest to the Government that they should ask for the appointment of a Royal Commission rather than of a Select Committee, because in that case the Commission will be enabled to carry on its inquiries during the Recess, which a Select Committee of this House cannot do. I should add that I propose to put down an Amendment to the Licensing Bill, that the £350,000 which the Government propose to give for the extinction of licences should be allocated so as to recoup these Indian Civil Servants for their losses instead of being used for the compensation of publicans.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I observe from the language of the Motion that the Committee is to inquire into the alleged grievances of the Uncovenanted Civil Servants of India. All I desire to do now is to express a hope that the inquiry will extend to the grievances of the natives as well as of the Europeans.

Question put, and agreed to.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN SPIRITS.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to consider whether, on grounds of public health, it is desirable that certain classes of spirits, British and foreign, should be kept in bond for a definite period before they are allowed to pass into consumption, and to inquire into the system of blending British and foreign spirits, in or out of bond, and into the propriety of applying the Sale of Foods and Drugs Act to the sale of home spirits, and the Sale of Foods and Drugs Act and the Merchandise Marks Act to the case of foreign spirits and mixtures of British and foreign spirits."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): While I am exceedingly obliged to the Government for moving the appointment of this Committee, I think the right hon. Gentleman, if he were in the House, would see the force of the objection I am about to make. I suggest that the principle of the Merchandise Marks Act should apply not merely to foreign spirits and mixtures of British and foreign spirits, but also to British spirits. I shall move to amend the Motion so that the last line will read—"To the case of foreign spirits, to mixtures of British and foreign spirits, and to British spirits." The subject is one of great importance to the Irish whisky manufacturers. The industry which is concerned in this proposal is one of great magnitude, because not only is Ireland affected but Scotland also. I welcome the appointment of the hon. Member for Leeds on the Committee, because, not only is he a Scotchman, but he is also one whose scientific attainments will be of great service. Perhaps a more useful Bill for the trade of the country than the Merchandise Marks Act has not been passed by the Government during their tenure of office, but, unfortunately, that Bill was not applicable to all classes of goods. On reading the Report of the Committee I see that in the article of rum alone there is an enormous consumption, and it is found that of pretty nearly every 100 gallons of rum imported from abroad 99 gallons are composed of potato spirit. With regard to whisky, the position of the Scotch and Irish manufacturers is this: for centuries whisky has been made by them of malt or a mixture of malt and barley. It was made by a process of slow distillation, but of late, science—which in this case is another name for fraud—has invented a patent still, which, by a short process of distillation, will produce what is termed "whisky" from ingredients of the most deleterious character. The result is, that instead of drinking malt, or malt and grain spirit, the public frequently swallow stuff which is made from wood fibre, treated with sulphuric acid, or a spirit made of rice or horrible brown sugar of molasses, or the dregs of molasses' casks, as well as from Indian corn. That is not whisky. I do not recommend anybody to drink whisky, but if they ask for whisky let them follow the advice of the celebrated advertisement, which says, "When you ask for Glenfield's starch see that you get it." When a man asks for whisky he ought not to get a deleterious substitute. I know it is contended that whisky of all kinds is deleterious. I am not concerned to deny that, but I say there are degrees of unwholesomeness, and those who want whisky ought not to get sulphuric acid and wood spirit, nor an article made from molasses, nor a kind of bastard rum, which is really a spirit of the coarsest and most abominable kind. I acknowledge the concessions that the Government have already made on this matter, but the Motion now made by the Government only covers foreign spirits and mixtures of foreign and British spirits, leaving the native pirate untouched in his native wilds. Why should the Merchandise Marks Act apply only in the two cases stated? I believe I shall have the support of the majority of the House in my proposal, and I should be sorry to divide the House upon it. Therefore, I hope the Government will accept my Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "foreign spirits and mixtures of."
—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N): My impression is that the hon. Member is not correct in his interpretation of what the reference to the Committee really covers. I understand he wants the Merchandise Marks Act to apply not only to foreign spirits but to British spirits mixed with foreign spirits.

MR. T. M. HEALY: And to British spirits alone.

MR. JACKSON: The Act referred to only applies to articles which are marked either fraudulently or in a manner calculated to mislead.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Surely if a draper advertises Balbriggan hosiery and sells the goods of Birmingham or Sheffield he is liable to punishment.

MR. JACKSON: No doubt you may punish the draper under the Trades Marks Act, but that is not the same thing as the Merchandise Marks Act. I am sorry to say that, in the absence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I am unable to accept the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman.

(12.30.) MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I do not like to be absolutely certain, but I do not think the right hon. Gentleman is quite correct as to the Merchandise Marks Act. I think it includes the sale as well as the import of goods fraudulently marked; and, if that is so, the only objection the Secretary to the Treasury takes to this proposal would be removed. I do not know that we should all be ready to agree with my hon. and learned Friend, who would forestall the conclusion the Committee are likely to arrive at. But the questions he has raised are of great importance to the whisky distillers of Ireland, and it is well that they should be considered by an impartial tribunal.

*(12.31.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyronne, S.): I remember the question raised by the hon. and learned Member being brought up in reference to Balbriggan hosiery, when the Merchandise Marks Act was before the House.

*(12.32.) MR. TOMLINSON: The Balbriggan hose question properly comes under the Merchandise Marks Act. Imitations of these productions were manufactured first at Nottingham and then at Chemnitz in Saxony. The question now raised is rather that of adulteration than of false marking.

(12.32.) MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): The reference to the Committee is not sufficient, and requires to be amended. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer consented to appoint a Committee it was left on our mind that the Committee would inquire into the question of the adulteration of Irish and Scotch spirits; and I venture to submit that the reference will be defective unless this proviso is agreed to. I cannot consent to the construction the Secretary to the Treasury puts on the words of the Motion. It must be clear that they do not apply to a mixture of different kinds of home spirits, or deleterious home spirits, or to such an admixture of spirits as goes on very largely in Scotland and Ireland, where a fairly good spirit is mixed with a vile compound produced at home. It might be possible to apply the Trades Marks Act to such a case, or the combined wisdom of the Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench might be able to frame an Amendment to meet the point.

(12.36.) MR. JACKSON: I cannot make any proposal in regard to this matter in the absence of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but I have no objection to postpone the Motion until to-morrow.

(12.37.) SIR L. PLAYFAIR (Leeds, S.): Great care will be required in framing the reference. I have no objection to the remarks of the hon. Member for Longford, but he must remember that out of the 36,500,000 gallons of spirits consumed in this country per annum, only 16,000,000 are whisky. The interests of the producers of spirits other than whisky must not be lost sight of.

(12.38.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I accept the statement of the Secretary to the Treasury, and I would just point out that the Merchandise Marks Act is not a Customs Act. It is a home Act. I would also say that, though it is true that the amount of whisky consumed is only 16,000,000 gallons, there is no reason why stuff should be sold as whisky which is, in reality, nothing but fusil oil.

(12.39.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): What view does the Solicitor General take of the operation of the Act?

*(12.39.) THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir EDWARD CLARKE, Plymouth): As the matter is to stand over for consideration it is hardly necessary that I should say anything upon it.

Debate adjourned till to-morrow.

House adjourned at twenty minutes before One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

DEEDS OF ARRANGEMENT BILL.
(No. 106.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*LORD MACNAGHTEN: My Lords, I have to ask you to allow this Bill, which has passed the House of Commons, to be read a second time. The object of the Bill is to amend the Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1887, so far as regards its application to Ireland. That Act applies to both England and Ireland, and provides for the registration of all Deeds of Arrangement between a debtor and his creditors in the Bills of Sale Office, and also in the Bankruptcy Court having jurisdiction. At the time when the Act was passed there were no local Courts of Bankruptcy in Ireland. That defect was remedied by an Act passed in 1888, which established local Courts in Cork and Belfast, and made provision for establishing local Bankruptcy Districts, as occasion might require. The object of this Bill is to provide, in the first place, for the local registration of Deeds of Arrangement in Ireland, and, in the second place, it provides for the registration of proposals of arrangement between a debtor and his creditors under the Irish Bankruptcy Act, 1857. That, my Lords, is the whole scope of the Bill. It involves no controversial matter; it has, I think, the support of all the Members from Ireland, whatever their political opinions may be; and it has, I believe, the good will of the Government. I move that the Bill be read a second time.

Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> (according to order), and committed to the Standing Committee for Bills relating to Law, &c.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING ACTS AMENDMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 122.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: I ask your Lordships to read this Bill a second time. It is purely to amend the Scottish part of the Schedule in the Act of 1882. That Schedule provides for certain conditions and circumstances in which various of the Local Bodies in Scotland shall, for the purpose of the Electric Lighting Act, be the Local Authorities named in the Act. Doubts have arisen as to the proper meaning of the Scottish part of the Schedule, and in certain burghs in Scotland it is not certain whether the Police Commissioners, the County Council, or the Gas Commissioners are, in the eye of the law, the Local Authority for the purpose of Electric Lighting. In the course of the past winter several of them have applied to the Board of Trade, to know in which of those capacities they are the Local Authority within the meaning of the Act. The Board of Trade have been advised by the Law Officers of the Crown for Scotland that there are doubts and ambiguities in the Schedule as it stands, and the sole purpose of this Bill is to remove those doubts. A considerable amount of correspondence has taken place between the Department and the various Local

Lord Macnaghten

Authorities concerned, as to the proper course to pursue and the way in which this should be done. I am now able to say that, with one exception, that of the Town Council of Glasgow, the Bill which I have to ask your Lordships to give a Second Reading to, is an agreed Bill, and I believe no conflict will arise with regard to it. Under those circumstances, unless it is desired to ask any questions about it, I will abstain from taking up any more of your Lordships' time, and I will now move that the Bill be read a second time.

Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> (according to order).

*LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: My Lords, under the circumstances, and as time is very valuable—it is almost a question of days whether three important towns in Scotland will be able to have their Electric Lighting Provisional Order, passed during the present Session of Parliament—I would ask your Lordships to facilitate the passage of this Bill through the House, by allowing it to be taken in Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

Bill committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT ACT.

*EARL SPENCER, in rising to call attention to the decision of the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice, on a case submitted by the Somersetshire County Council, in relation to the respective powers of the County Council and the Standing Joint Committee, as to the management, control, maintenance, and erection of buildings connected with Assize, Sessions, and Justices' Courts, police stations, &c., and to ask whether Her Majesty's Government intend to introduce any Bill to amend the Local Government Act in respect to Standing Joint Committees, said: My Lords, I have put down on the Notice Paper a question which is of considerable interest to the various County Councils in the country. By the Act of 1888, Clause 29, power was given, when any difference of opinion arises between a County Council and the Standing Joint Committee, for a case to be stated to the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court, in order to obtain the opinion of the Court, on the subject in dispute.

In consequence of this, the County Council of Somerset, having a dispute as to their jurisdiction with the Standing Joint Committee, referred the case to the High Court, and the High Court gave an important judgment on the subject. It refers to the management and control of county buildings, and the question was whether the actual control rested with the Standing Joint Committee, or whether the County Council had jurisdiction over those buildings. In the Report of that case the head note is as follows:—

“A difference of opinion having arisen between the Somerset County Council and the Standing Joint Committee as to the maintaining and repairing buildings for Assizes and Sessions purposes: Held, that though the property is vested in the County Council, the Joint Committee have complete control over, and can direct the expenditure of funds which it is the duty of the County Council to find the means of supplying. Held, further, that both bodies can issue regulations for managing the buildings so long as these do not conflict.”

Now, my Lords, that is a very important decision, and a great many of the County Councils in England have read it with considerable surprise. They were quite aware there was some ambiguity in the wording of the Act, and I think I may say here that there is considerable ambiguity as to other clauses of the Act; at the same time, they did not expect that such complete control was to be handed over to the Standing Joint Committee. The result of it is that in most counties hardly any buildings at all, except the bridges, remain under the control of the County Council. It may happen that the County Council have to erect a Council-room. If the Council-room is to provide accommodation for the Justices or the Judges, then the County Council no longer have control over the Council-room, and the Standing Joint Committee have, by this decision, the complete ordering of the room, without consulting the County Council at all. All police stations, all Magistrates' rooms, and any room which may be used by the Magistrates or the police, are handed over bodily to the Standing Joint Committee, and the County Council are obliged to pay whatever sum the Standing Joint Committee may order. That is very clear from this decision, and Mr. Justice Cave distinctly says: “The only thing which the County Council have got to do is to pay the Bill.” My Lords, I think that is a very serious matter, and it is one on which a very strong feeling exists throughout the country. There is, moreover, one extra important matter in the judgment which, I think, needs elucidation, and which, I think, if not dealt with by Her Majesty's Government, may really create a very serious difficulty indeed. It is with regard to the last part of the inquiry, namely—

“To which body is transferred the power of making Standing Orders and making regulations as to the general management and control of the said buildings or any of them.”

Now, with regard to that, Mr. Justice Mathew, who was one of the Judges of the High Court who gave the opinion in this case, says this—

“Power appears to be conferred on both parties, and they may conflict with each other.”

That is a very serious matter. I think a very serious conflict of opinion might arise between the Joint Committee and the County Council in a matter of this sort, and it is very poor consolation to read the end of the learned Judge's Judgment, where he says—

“If a question should arise as to which order should be obeyed, the Courts, I trust, when that question arises, will have no difficulty in saying what the proper decision ought to be.”

That, I repeat, is a very poor consolation to those who are administering affairs in the County Councils. Thus, there may be distinct orders given, one set of orders being given by the County Council, and another set of orders given by the Standing Joint Committee; and I think it is very important that the Government should state whether they intend to deal with that matter, and should give their opinion, if possible, on the whole question. I am not quite clear whether, under Section 29, there is an appeal. The words of the section are very doubtful, but I think, from an answer that has been given, by the President of the Local Government Board in another place, he seemed to imply that an appeal in another important case, the Warminster case, might go forward. If there had been an appeal pending in this Somerset case, of course I should not have troubled your Lordships with it, but as a considerable time has elapsed and no appeal has yet been brought, I think I am entitled to bring this important matter forward, and ask the opinion of the Government upon it. My Lords, I cannot help saying a word or two upon the general question of Standing Joint Committees, because this has opened the question, and it is one in which, sooner or later, some change must take place. When the Bill of 1888 was passed there was very considerable objection, not only on the side of the House to which I belong but on the other side too, to the establishment of a dual authority in the new County Administration. It was said that there was no reason whatever why, if a Municipal Council, through their Watch Committee, could manage the police of their boroughs, the new County Councils, either by themselves or through a Committee, should not manage the police of the county, and, with regard to that matter, a strong feeling was expressed. I venture to say that, though happily in the case of my own county no conflict has arisen between the Standing Joint Committee and the County Council, for nothing could have been more conciliatory than the attitude of both the County Council and the Standing Joint Committee, still there have been very serious administrative difficulties to be dealt with, and we have seen how easily very serious difficulties might arise. Take the question of finance. I believe I am not overstating the case when I say that in most counties the Standing Joint Committee have the control of one-third, or more than one-third, of the whole expenditure of the county. The whole of that third of the expenditure is taken out of the control of those who are elected by the ratepayers whose representatives have nothing to do but to carry out the orders of the Standing Joint Committee. Then with regard to the police. The police in most counties, it certainly has been so in mine, have been employed in a great variety of duties. Happily, there has been very little crime, and they can very easily carry out many administrative Acts which, without their assistance and services, it would have been very difficult for the county to have carried out. Take, for instance, the Weights and Measures Act, a measure which I am sorry to say is going to throw perfectly needlessly an enormous expense upon various counties. That Act has, in most counties, been admirably administered through the police. Now, the Act which has been brought in makes it impossible, in a great many places, and certainly in my county, for the police to continue administering that Act. At the same time, we have in various places police stations and other facilities connected with the police service, and the County Council, in administering the Weights and Measures Act must have constant recourse to police stations, and in some respects to the police. If the Joint Committee, who have the control of police stations, are in opposition and in conflict on many subjects, as they might well be with the County Council, who represent the ratepayers of the county, would be put to an enormously increased expenditure, and there would be constant friction and difficulty in administering this part of the Act. Take another very important matter—we had a Debate on the subject, your Lordships will remember, a short time ago—that is the Contagious Diseases of Animals Act. That Act could not be worked, I venture to say, except at enormous expense, without having recourse to the police. Happily, we have come to terms with our Standing Joint Committee; but if the Standing Joint Committee resisted and refused to give the assistance of the police for the purpose of carrying out this Act, we should have disease among animals spread broadcast all over the country. Those, my Lords, are two instances where I think the dual authority works exceedingly ill. Then I will give another instance. Take the appointment of officers. There is no more important officer than the Clerk to the Council. The gentleman who is Clerk to the Council has generally been Clerk of the Peace. As your Lordships know, Lord Lieutenants of counties formerly had the appointment of Clerks of the Peace. When this new Act came into force those appointments, which have been taken from the Lord Lieutenants, were given to the Standing Joint Committee. Mark what the result of that is. The Standing Joint Committee, half of whom might have been perfectly ignorant of any of this new work connected with the County Council, have the appointment of the most important officer of the Council. The Council have no voice in the matter whatever. That seems to me to be a very gross scandal, and it might lead to very great difficulty indeed. Then take the question of clerks. The County Council have a great deal more work than Quarter Sessions, and in many cases they have had to increase their staff, but they cannot appoint their clerk if that clerk had had anything to do, say, in collecting fees for the Magistrates; according to the interpretation given to the Act that matter would have to go to the Standing Joint Committee. My Lords, I have given those instances to show how difficult the working of this dual system is, and how important it is that some change should take place with regard to it. Now, I understand that in some counties great difficulties have arisen—in Leicestershire a very serious conflict of opinion has arisen between the County Council and the Standing Joint Committee in regard to a police rate. I am informed that a good many County Councils in England have petitioned for the abolition of Standing Joint Committees. There is one county which has done a very remarkable thing, that is the county of Gloucester. In the opinion of the majority of the County Council of Gloucester the Standing Joint Committee seems to be so much more important than the Council itself that they have established a Standing Joint Committee twice the size of the County Council. I will explain to your Lordships how this is: they have appointed the whole Council to be the representatives of the Council on the Standing Joint Committee, and the Magistrates have to double that number. So that you have this extraordinary anomaly, that you have a Standing Joint Committee twice the size of the Council, and you would have, therefore, to build a room not for the Council but for the Standing Joint Committee. My Lords, I do not know why the wise people of Gloucester did this; but it shows what importance they attach to the Standing Joint Committee, and I confess it rather points to some absurdity existing in this arrangement. I have thought it right to allude to one or two of these points because they are points of great interest in the country, and as this decision in the Somersetshire case brings up the whole matter it may be desirable, if the Government are going to deal with it, that they should deal with other points as well as this point with regard to the buildings. It is for that reason that I have troubled the House with these few observations, and I now ask the question of which I have given notice.

*LORD BASING: My Lords, before my noble Friend replies to the inquiry which has been made of him I should like to say one or two words, because my experience differs somewhat from that of the noble Lord who has brought forward this question. I am far from disputing the justice of the criticisms he has made upon the various anomalous provisions which pervade the Local Government Act in respect of the Standing Joint Committees. We all know that they were introduced into the Bill of 1888 as a sort of compromise, and like many compromises it has entailed many clumsy, awkward, and inconsistent provisions. But I confess, although I greatly deprecate the pushing home of the decision of the Judges in the Somersetshire case, I think County Councils in many quarters have been over frightened by the apparent completeness and fulness of that decision. At all events, in the County Council over which I have the honour to preside, it has made little, if any, difference in the mode of conducting business as regards buildings, repairs, and the maintenance of works. As regards my own County Council in Hampshire, they certainly consider that as they find the money and find the officers, it is only under their own Committees' care that important public works could be managed, and, therefore, they do not hold that the County Surveyor is at the beck and call of the Standing Joint Committee, nor do they consider that the Standing Joint Committee is competent to put their hands into the till of the County Council. They, therefore, conduct all the business with regard to the police buildings and Courts of Justice; they entrust the Committees who have to do the work with power to do it, but with instructions that they are to observe the requirements of the Standing Joint Committee. In that way the matter has worked very well, and, though difficulties have been raised from time to time, we have found that, with forbearance and good temper, anything like a conflict has been avoided hitherto, and so I think it will be hereafter. Nevertheless, the provisions to which the noble Earl has alluded may, at any time, provoke hostility and cause dissension where none now exist. It should always be borne in mind that one moiety of the Standing Joint Committee are themselves elected members of the County Council, and their places may be filled by other persons if they fail to represent the interest of the rate-payers in any way. I should be glad if the Government could see their way towards proposing some change. At the same time, if they were to open this question of the Local Government Act of 1888, with the view of making all the alterations which the little experience we have now had during two years has shown to be necessary, I am afraid they could hardly stop at the Standing Joint Committee, but that they would find far more than that enactment requires elucidation if not amendment and change.

*EARL COWPER: My Lords, as the whole subject of County Councils and Standing Joint Committees has been raised by the noble Earl who asked this question, I may be allowed, perhaps, as a Chairman of a County Council, to say that, though in the first instance I was certainly inclined to think it would have been better to have had the Police Committee appointed by the County Council, like all other Committees, and that it would be quite safe to entrust the management of the police to the representatives of the ratepayers, yet I do hope we shall not have any alteration made now, for I think that just as we have begun to get into the performance of our work, and just as every Committee has begun to understand its business, and to know what it has to do, there ought to be some very clear, very decided, and very great proof of positive inconvenience existing, before we begin tinkering once more with this measure, after so short an interval since it was passed. I think, in calling out for change, we should be rather like the gentleman in a famous sporting novel, who was always beginning to alter his stirrups just as the hounds began to run. I can safely say that in my county there has been no friction whatever. The first thing that happened was that a great number of members appointed upon the Standing Joint Committee by the Magistrates were members of the County Council, while, on the other hand, a great many of those appointed by the County Council were Magistrates, so that many members of the Standing Joint Committee scarcely know whether they were put upon it by one body or the other. I confess I think the instances given by my noble Friend where difficulty might arise were certainly not numerous, and are such as, if you look into them, either do not exist, or could not easily be avoided. For instance, with regard to the appointment of the Clerk of the Peace, would it be fair that the Magistrates, who necessarily trust very much to the Clerk of the Peace, should have no voice in the matter? I think they should have as much to do with the appointment of the Clerk of the Peace as the other body. The appointment must either be a joint one or there must be two offices, which would probably entail a waste of money. Then, as regards the Weights and Measures Act. I certainly should be prepared, if it were necessary, to contend that it would be better not to leave the carrying out of that Act in the hands of the police. I may say that we have discussed the matter completely and fully, and we have ended by deciding that the police should have nothing whatever to do with the matter beyond seeing that in this as in all other matters the law is carried out. My Lords, I only rose to say that I hope we shall not have any tinkering with this County Council Act, at any rate at present, until we have seen a little better how it works, and, at the same time, may have been able to see whether other alterations might not be advantageously made.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY: My Lords, I should like, in a few words, to support what my noble Friend opposite has said, having had some experience in County Council work as Chairman. In my own Council, I may say, we have had no difficulty whatever in working this measure. We laid down, and very rightly, I think, that the members of the County Council should be all non-Magistrates. That was a happy arrangement, but the effect of it was this: that half of the Standing Joint Committee was composed of Magistrates, and the Magistrates themselves elected several members who were on the County Council. As a matter of fact, the County Council has a very considerable majority on the Standing Joint Committee. But no practical difficulty has arisen hitherto, though the County Council did petition to have a change, but only half the County Council was present, and the resolution was carried only by a small majority. I think it would be very unwise to make a change at the present time, without further experience. All the arguments we have heard this evening in favour of a change are just the arguments we heard at the time of the passing of the Bill, and I would add, for myself, the opinion that at present it is not advisable to change the present system. I think in an important matter of this kind we should get all the experience we can before making alterations. Every year we are picking up more experience, and I think it would be very unwise to again unsettle this matter without more practical knowledge of how it works.

*LORD MONK BRETTON: My Lords, as Chairman of another County Council, I should like to say a few words. I differ from the two noble Lords who have just spoken. I should be very glad to hear the Government declare that they thought the Standing Joint Committees could be dispensed with, and that they were prepared to bring in a Bill to abolish them. I say that without the least personal feeling against the Standing Joint Committees, because, in the case of the County Council to which I had the honour to be elected, we have worked most harmoniously with the Standing Joint Committee, and there has been a fixed determination on both sides to avoid any possible collision or friction. But I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that the existence of a third statutory body, alongside of the Quarter Sessions and County Council, is surplusage, and tends to render the transaction of business cumbersome. Assuming that the Standing Joint Committees are to be continued until we have further experience of the working of the Local Government Act for some time longer, and for certain purposes, I still hope that the powers given in regard to county buildings, which is the immediate question raised by Lord Spencer, will not be withdrawn from the County Councils; and I use the word "withdrawn" expressly because it was generally supposed that the Local Government Act intended to make the County Councils really the possessors of the county buildings. It was generally believed that the Act had done so, but then came the decision in the Somersetshire case, and the decision in the Somersetshire case has left the County Council with a dry legal estate. I admit that the Act is not very clear, and the position is rather an embarrassing one. The prevailing opinion, however, was that the County Councils were, to all intents and purposes, the owners of the buildings, subject to the obligation to provide the necessary accommodation for the Justices, to allow the proper use of them for the Justices and for the police; and that the Joint Committee was a sort of tutelary Divinity, to intervene if that obligation was not fulfilled. Now, the effect of the Somersetshire decision is that the Joint Committee are the absolute masters, and that they have power to erect, repair, decorate what they please, and as they please, and then, as my noble Friend said, send the bill to the County Council, who have nothing to do but to pay it. Well, that, I think, is a very anomalous and a very unsatisfactory condition of things, and the decision puts the County Council in a very false position. My noble Friend Lord Basing pointed out that the Joint Committee was a body on which the County Council was represented in equal numbers with the Quarter Sessions. That is perfectly true; but there is this peculiarity in the case, that this Joint Committee, on which the two bodies are represented equally, is the master of the one and is not the master of the other. No doubt there are a good many ambiguities and anomalies in the Act, which further experience will show require correction. I am content to wait for those; but as regards this particular point, it appears to me that a short Bill might very well be brought in to prevent the real intention of the Act from being defeated, as it were, by an accident; and that that might be done without waiting for other Amendments or alterations of the Act. As I said at first, I hope that before a very long time the Joint Committees will be dispensed with altogether, but as regards this question of public buildings it does seem to me to be so inconvenient a state of things which we are placed in by this Somersetshire decision, that I trust the Government will say they are prepared to bring in a short Bill which will restore the position which the Local Government Act intended.

LORD WENLOCK: My Lords, if you are not wearied with the remarks of the various Chairmen of County Councils who have addressed your Lordships, I should like to say a few words with regard to the question which has been asked by my noble Friend Lord Spencer. One point which has not been brought out, I think, is as regards the financial question. As Chairman of the Finance Committee of my own Council, I found there was some danger of their losing the grant made by Government, and that the Finance Committee would find itself mulcted, without any fault at all of its own, to the extent of one-half of the loans of the county. That is an important point, and is a matter to be guarded against. Section 80 of the Local Government Act gives the control to the Finance Committee in all financial matters, but now that control seems to be taken out of its hands. Therefore, I think, in this respect there is a source of great danger to the ratepayers, unless Government finds some satisfactory means of placing the matter on a more satisfactory footing. In my own experience there has been some slight friction, as regards buildings, between the County Council and the Standing Joint Committee. It was only the other day that I received, as Chairman of the Finance Committee, a Report calling my attention to the fact that my own action upon the Standing Joint Committee was unsatisfactory. The matter in question was one in which the Standing Joint Committee recommended that a large sum should be expended on county buildings; and, as Chairman of the Finance Committee, I thought the expenditure ought to be carefully watched. The Council were very much with me in the matter, and against the Standing Joint Committee; and if it had not been for this decision in the Somersetshire case, I believe they would have taken the matter up to the High Court. I hope, after the remarks which have been made by the noble Lords, who have spoken from experience of the working of the Act in their own Councils, Government may see their way to put this question on a more satisfactory footing, because we have now had experience of the difficulty in working which may arise and which may become more serious in future.

Lord Monk Bretton

THE EARL OF JERSEY: My Lords, it is evident this is a question which excites considerable interest among County Councillors; and I think it is very fortunate that we should have had the varied opinions and experience of so many Chairmen of County Councils. The question of the noble Lord may be divided under two heads, one dealing with the Somersetshire case, and the other dealing with the wider question of Standing Joint Committees. I need not, I think, follow the noble Lord right through what he stated with regard to the Somersetshire case, because the decision was a very simple one, handing over to the Standing Joint Committee the control of all the buildings which have to do with the administration of justice or with the police. By that decision the County Councils are declared not to have the right of exercising the powers which they originally thought they had, but it may be that that interpretation of the law by the High Court of Justice has reference to what the intention of Parliament may have been when the Act was passed. But I must point out that it does not rest with a Department of the Government to interfere at all with the law. They must accept it as it is laid down by the Courts of Justice. Still I may state that the Government are quite alive to the importance of this point, and that, whenever a Bill is brought in to deal with Amendments generally, which may be found desirable, of the Local Government Act, it will not be left out of consideration. Now, as to the wider point, as to the existence or non-existence of the Standing Joint Committees, I must observe that this system was adopted by Parliament, after careful consideration and discussion, as the best means of meeting what was an acknowledged difficulty. The Joint Standing Committee is, as has been pointed out, composed not of aliens, but half of the County Council and half of Magistrates, and though it is perfectly true there may be opportunities for friction to arise, yet I think the experience of most Chairmen of County Councils is—it certainly is my own—that those opportunities have not been taken, because there has been a very strong desire on the part of members of County Councils generally to facilitate the working of the Local Government Act, and there has also been shown that strong common-sense which I hope will always be a characteristic of the English people when they are entrusted with the carrying out of any important work. But, my Lords, it does not rest with me to enter into a long defence of the Standing Joint Committees. As has been pointed out, the Bill has only been passed within the last two years, and certainly the experience of the Department so far has been that it has worked well. In the circumstances, I am sure the noble Earl will not be surprised when I tell him that it is not the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill upon the subject. I do not know really that I can say more than that.

*THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: My Lords, I cannot say that I have derived any great comfort from the speech of my noble Friend, who has just sat down, on behalf of the Government. He has been good enough to tell us that the particular question arising out of the decision in the Somersetshire case will be, at some period or other, which is, I am afraid, likely to be somewhat distant, considered by Her Majesty's Government. Therefore, I do not think we can rest with much hope upon the remarks which have been made upon that point. But really, my Lords, the point is a very important one; and I cannot help believing that it was not the intention, either of Her Majesty's Government, or of Parliament, in passing the Bill of 1888, to place the control of a great portion of the county buildings completely in the hands of the Standing Joint Committee, and to take it altogether away from the County Council itself, putting aside lunatic asylums, which, I admit, are buildings of great importance, by far the larger portion of the county buildings are, by this decision, completely taken out of the control of the County Council and handed over to the control of the Standing Joint Committee. That was not at all the view, as the noble Earl has stated, which was taken by the County Councils when they first entered upon their duties. With regard to the County Council of which I have the honour to be the Chairman, we always supposed, and I had the best reason for believing that we were right in that opinion, because I took some pains to inform myself upon the matter, that though the County Council was bound to supply the buildings required by the Standing Joint Committee for the purposes of police and the administration of justice, it rested with the Council to determine how those buildings were to be erected, to go to contract for their erection, and to control the whole matter. Now, this decision tells us that the County Council has nothing to do with the matter at all, except to vote the money required, and to leave the Standing Joint Committee to go to contract, to direct the surveyor, and to have the whole business carried out altogether under their orders. My Lords, I venture to say that if the Hampshire County Council is acting as the noble Lord, Lord Basing has described, I am afraid they are acting in contravention of the decision in the Somersetshire case, because they are doing exactly what we did before the decision in the Somersetshire case, and what we have been recommended by our legal advisers to abandon. Now, my Lords, if the Government did not intend, and I do not really think they did, that this should be the case, and if it was not the intention of Parliament either, surely there is ground for introducing a short measure to put the matter right, because, although serious difficulties have not yet arisen, serious difficulties may arise at any moment. In the case of my County Council we had actually gone to contract for certain buildings under our original interpretation of the law; the Somersetshire case was decided, in the meantime, before they were erected, and we had to give up the whole matter and refer it to the Standing Joint Committee, for them to deal with as they pleased, and make the contract afresh if they thought fit. Now, I do think a very strong case, at all events, has been made out for restoring the system to that which, I believe, was originally intended, by both Government and Parliament. Then, with respect to the general question, I should like to say a few words, and they shall be but few. I do not know whether noble Lords have altogether realised what seems to me to be the fact, that this body, the Standing Joint Committee, is a body altogether without precedent in this country. It is a body which has now the power of decision in reference to one-third, or more than one-third, of the whole county expenditure. In the case of the West Riding of Yorkshire, with which I am connected, the sum with which the Standing Joint Committee has to deal is upwards of £100,000 a year. It has the power to make requisitions upon the County Councils to levy whatever rate they please for providing that sum, and the Council is bound to obey those requisitions without contest or inquiry. Now, my Lords, let me ask you to consider what this body is. This body—I take the case with which I am best acquainted, that of the West Riding, which, I may say, presents the matter under a very favourable aspect, because it is comparatively a numerous body—is a body consisting of 38 members, 19 of whom are elected by the County Council and 19 appointed by the Justices, and they have the entire disposal of over £100,000 a year of the ratepayers' money, and absolutely without any appeal whatever! The old Police Committee had to report to Quarter Sessions, and there was, therefore, a power of revising their proceedings in Quarter Sessions. I admit it was very rarely done, but nevertheless the whole body of Justices could revise their proceedings in Quarter Sessions. There is no such power in regard to this body. They decide the matter for themselves; they make the requisitions, and the County Council can be "mandamussed," I am told, if they do not obey. I venture to say, that for a body of that kind so composed, having absolute power without any appeal against their proceedings or any control by anybody, to have power to spend such a sum as I have mentioned, is altogether without precedent in this country, and it is certainly contrary to what I have always understood the President of the Local Government Board to have declared to be the fundamental principle of the Act of 1888, namely, that the representatives of the ratepayers were to have the control over the county expenditure. But, as I have said, the result is that the control of one-third of that expenditure is taken out of the hands of the County Council by this decision, absolutely and entirely. Now, my Lords, with respect to one other matter I wish only to say a few words—that is, the question of the appointment of the Clerk of the Peace. If there is any officer who ought to be appointed by the County Council I think it is their own clerk, the head of their office. The person who is to manage, under them, all their business, and who has to take their orders, ought to be a person in whom the majority of that Council have absolute confidence. But even such an officer as their clerk is not to be appointed by the County Council, but is to be appointed by the Standing Joint Committee. It is perfectly possible, indeed it is very likely, that the Standing Joint Committee, with the best intentions, would appoint a person who would not be acceptable to the majority of the County Council, and I say that the Clerk of the Council is a person who ought to be altogether acceptable to the majority of those he is intended to serve. I think it was my noble Relative behind me who spoke, I thought, as if he supposed the Clerk of the Peace was appointed by the Justices of the Peace. Of course, if my noble Friend did so, it was a slip, because he is as well aware as I am—

EARL COWPER: If the noble Marquess will pardon me, what I said was that I thought it was fair they should have a voice in the appointment of their own clerk, and that I knew it had been done previously by the Lord Lieutenants.

*THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: But they had nothing to do with the appointment of the Clerk of the Peace in old days; he was appointed by the Lord Lieutenant. If it is thought that because the Clerk of the Peace has certain duties to perform connected with Quarter Sessions therefore he ought to be appointed either by the Justices or by the Lord Lieutenants, you had better separate the two offices than perpetrate such an anomaly as to take the appointment of their own clerk out of the hands of the County Council. That, my Lords, seems to be an illustration of the extreme anomaly of investing the Standing Joint Committees with these controlling powers. My noble Friend the Earl of Hurrowby has said that he hopes no hasty change will be made in regard to this matter; but he was obliged to admit that his County Council, however he might explain it, had themselves passed a resolution in favour of a change. My County Council have passed a resolution, not quite, but almost, unanimous, in favour of a change, and one member of that Council, who is well known to some of your Lordships, (Mr. Dent), in that discussion said that whereas he had himself suggested this Joint Committee in Quarter Sessions, when they were considering the Bill, he was now convinced that it was an inconvenient arrangement, and that the powers of control ought to be left with the County Council. My Lords, it has been often said, in the course of this discussion, that no irritation has yet arisen. I am happy to say that I can bear the same testimony in regard to the West Riding; but that being the case, so far, this is exactly the time when the matter can be discussed without raising all the difficulties which would attend bringing up disputed questions between County Councils and these Standing Joint Committees. The question seems to me, I confess, to be a question of principle. The establishment of these bodies is anomalous, and altogether, as I think, inconsistent with the principles upon which the Local Government Act was founded; and I do hope, in spite of the natural caution with which my noble Friend, representing the Government, has spoken, that Her Majesty's Government will, in the course of the Recess, consider the whole question.

CONTROL OF RIVERS AND WATER-COURSES.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

*LORD BELPER, in rising to call attention to the necessity of giving to Local Authorities some control over rivers and watercourses within their districts for the purpose of prevention of floods, and to ask Her Majesty's Government whether they will consider the desirability of conferring on County Councils defined and strictly limited powers for this purpose, said: My Lords, the question I have put down upon the Notice Paper is one not only of some interest to County Councils, but also to your Lordships and the public, and especially those who live in counties which are subject periodically to inundations from the rivers in their districts. I am very conscious of this evil, as I myself live in the neighbourhood of two rivers. At the outset, I should like to say that I am thoroughly aware of the extreme difficulties which surround this question on account of the very large number of interests which have to be considered, interests which, owing to the various minor Acts of Parliament which deal with the question, have had their powers extended or curtailed by those particular Acts of Parliament in different districts. Therefore in any suggestions I am going to make, I hope I shall make none that are unreasonable, or that will in any way interfere with those interests, or which could reasonably be taken exception to by those ratepayers who are not themselves sufferers. The question of the conservation of rivers is one which has attracted a large share of the attention of Parliament, both here and also in the other House. In 1887, a Committee of your Lordships' House took a large amount of evidence from skilled witnesses, and from persons who were conversant with the various local circumstances, and there were, I believe, at least two Bills introduced into your Lordships' House, dealing with the matter. In successive Sessions the question was discussed, both in the House of Commons and in this House, and, although no legislation actually took place, I think one of the Bills, at any rate, that of the noble Lord Earl Spencer, passed through this House. Since that time the question, as far as legislation is concerned, has been allowed to slumber; but I think that the interest in it has not abated is clear from the fact that almost immediately on the formation of direct Councils of the ratepayers, this was one of the first questions taken up in the counties which are subject to floods. The county of Huntingdon was the first to move in the matter. There they passed a resolution in favour of some powers being given to them. The neighbouring county of Cambridge also, I believe, took up the question, and the County Council of Nottinghamshire, of which I am Chairman, has passed a resolution very much in the terms of the notice which I have placed on the Paper of your Lordships' House. Therefore, I think, I may be allowed to assume that there is an evil existing which has to be dealt with, and which has been recognised by both Local Authorities and by Parliament. If you look at the evidence brought before the Committee to which I have referred, it is abundantly clear that there has been a large amount of damage done by flood to agricultural land, and also that those poor people who live in villages and small towns subject to floods, suffered a large amount of loss, discomfort, and even of sickness from that cause. I should like to say at once that I do not wish to suggest any legislation on the lines of the Bills which have been previously brought into your Lordships' House. I do not wish, in the slightest degree, to criticise those measures, but I venture to think that public opinion has somewhat modified on this question during the last 10 years. Your Lordships will remember that those Bills gave an enabling power for the purpose of setting up authorities in different localities, under which Boards might be formed which would have very large powers of dealing with the surplus flood water in their neighbourhood; and the principal contest and opposition upon those Bills arose, I think, on what are called the rating clauses. There was a very strong feeling among those who do not suffer from floods themselves that they should not be rated, in any degree at all, in order to relieve the lands of those who were less fortunately situated. I must say that I think this feeling with respect to rates has increased, because, generally speaking, the rents of agricultural land in the neighbourhood of rivers have decreased during the last few years, and there is certainly a strong feeling that we ought not to pass any legislation which would be liable to increase the rates on lands which are now heavily rated. But the point which I wish specially to present to your Lordships is that, whatever may be your opinion with regard to such measures, there are certain obligations which are imposed by law both on private individuals and on those who have rights over rivers, which ought in the first instance to be enforced. Clearly, if you look at the circumstances, which must be known to many of your Lordships, there are many of those obligations under which conservators of rivers, millowners, and others, have been placed, which are never carried out at all. It is perfectly true if a private individual chooses to prosecute, if damage results from carelessness, he may do so; but there is an indisposition to prosecute. What is everybody's business is nobody's business, and private individuals do not like to place themselves in the position of public prosecutors. The consequence is that no action is taken, because there is no body or power which has any control over rivers for this purpose, and there is really no power whatever of enforcing the law, if it exists. Now, I do not wish to trouble your Lordships at greater length than necessary, but I think I ought to call your attention to certain instances of the sort which arise where those obligations are not carried out. I will mention the cases which have come within my own knowledge, and I have also found that all those cases are absolutely confirmed by the evidence of the various witnesses called before the Committee in 1877, who, I may say, were resident in all parts of the country. First, let me take the case of flood-gates and weirs. It is an extremely common incident of rivers, where rights have been given either for the purpose of navigation or to millers, that weirs have been erected and flood-gates with them. An elementary duty of those who have had such powers given them over rivers is to keep those flood-gates properly open, not only while flood-water is actually coming down, but for a sufficient time to enable the water to get off before the flood has taken place. That is a duty which may be recognised, but it is certainly not carried out; and the witnesses before that Committee spoke to the importance of having some special authority, which shall take care that those flood-gates on rivers shall be kept open for a particular time, which may be necessary to allow the water to come down. Then with regard to weirs. It is, of course, the duty of the Navigation Authorities or owners to keep their weirs free from weeds and rubbish; but there is an even more important point to which I wish to call your Lordships' attention, and that is, that in many cases, to my own knowledge, and it is, no doubt, also within the knowledge of many of your Lordships, weirs have, during some years past, been erected perfectly legally, and under pretence perhaps of repairing them have been raised it may be several inches, which has had the effect of raising the water above the original height. In regard to this matter I should like to mention this one point: in the evidence given before that Committee the present Speaker of the House of Commons gave some most valuable testimony with regard to floods in the rivers in his neighbourhood, and he mentioned a case which actually occurred within his own knowledge. A millowner finding he did not get quite as much water as he wished for his mill, actually built a wall right across the river! And though the height of the wall was afterwards modified, as the Navigation Authority had to go to Parliament for the purpose of its being abolished, yet it seems almost inconceivable that anybody having a mill upon a river could build a wall right across the stream without any interference whatever from anybody in the neighbourhood. My Lords, it is something like a scandal that there should be no Public Authority of any kind which should possess a power of interference with anybody who may choose to act in that way on a river, under circumstances such as I have mentioned. Then there is the question with regard to beds of rivers. Undoubtedly floods are often caused by the beds of rivers becoming silted up from not being kept properly clear. Many of the witnesses before the Committee spoke to the fact that though that duty is imposed upon companies which have navigation rights, they are never carried out, because there is nobody to interfere for the purpose of enforcing that obligation. I believe that any County Council, acting through their surveyor, and with a Committee properly formed to look after such matters, would be able to do a great deal in the way of keeping beds of rivers free from silt and rubbish coming down. Then there is the question of bridges. As your Lordships are aware, when new bridges are now built County Councils have power over them in certain ways. If it is a bridge on a main road, the County Councils have themselves power, or if it is a bridge to which they have to contribute in any way, to see that the arches of the bridge are wide enough to permit the flood-waters to come down through them; but in respect of any ordinary bridge the County Council would have no power whatever, and many bridges have been built which would seriously interfere with the flow of flood-water, and, therefore, cause floods in the neighbourhood. I might mention one case within my own knowledge of a bridge over the River Trent, at Nottingham. That was a very old bridge, with a considerable number of arches. The surveyor for the borough of Nottingham gave evidence that, when the old bridge was done away with, and a new bridge was placed in the same position, it actually lowered the height of the water 18 inches. Your Lordships will, therefore, understand the importance of seeing to that matter, and the necessity of taking care that the waterway is kept open in rivers and streams. I will only mention one more case, that is with regard to new schemes under private Acts of Parliament which may be got by Local Authorities, such as the Corporations of large towns. I myself know a case in point, and many other cases were mentioned before the Committee where Acts were got for the alleviation of floods by Corporations; greatly for their own benefit, undoubtedly, but the inevitable result is that, unless there is some authority which can watch them and see what they are doing, the flood waters are sent down much more quickly on the lands below them, and, though the town may benefit, the county may suffer. If the County Councils had some power with regard to rivers, of course they could see that any scheme that was carried out in their neighbourhood would not interfere with the streams or water over which they have jurisdiction. Now, my Lords, I have mentioned a few cases, and I believe many more might be mentioned where, if some authority of this sort could be given, it might be valuable. It may be said that the rules and regulations under which rivers are governed vary so much that powers to interfere may not exist. Even in these cases, however, I think the County Councils might do a great deal by arrangement and by conciliation, and by inducing agreement among the different authorities along the banks of the rivers. I would call your Lordships' attention to this point, that it is not to the interest of anybody on a river, either Navigation Companies or mill-owners, that floods should be allowed to occur. By a little activity and timely attention those floods could be diminished, and, therefore, I believe, all the authorities would feel themselves interested in acting with the County Councils for the purpose of seeing that the necessary precautions were carried out. There is only one other point with which I will trouble your Lordships, and that is, if you agree that some sort of power ought to be given to a Local Authority, whether that power ought not to be entrusted to the County Councils. The County Councils now represent all classes. They do not merely represent the land-owners, but ratepayers of all classes equally with the land-owners. They have acting under them a qualified surveyor, who is generally an engineer also, who is perfectly competent to deal with such matters. Such suggestions as might be made could be carried out really without any great expense on the part of the County Councils; and if the question of expense arose, it is clear that a body directly representing the ratepayers would not incur expense unless they thought it for the benefit not only of the people living on the banks of the river, but of the county generally. I should like here to point out that you have already conferred on County Councils powers very similar to those which I am mentioning with regard to the prevention of floods in reference to fisheries, and in regard to the pollution of rivers. The powers which I ask for them with respect to floods are almost precisely identical with those which they now have for preventing the pollution of streams. The power of prosecuting and of combining with other bodies should be given as far as might be necessary for the purpose of carrying out these matters. I am well aware that the powers given in regard to the pollution of rivers are not very extensive, and perhaps for that reason, if adequate, they are more likely to be successful. I would venture to make the same remark in reference to floods, that if the powers given were too extensive, they would be more likely to lead to friction than powers less extended. They would obtain the support of manufacturing people better than more extended powers. I have only now to thank your Lordships for the very kind attention which you have given to my remarks on what I am afraid I must call, in one sense, a very dry subject. I have put no

Motion on the Paper, and I only ask the Government for their favourable consideration of the matter. I am well aware that there may be many of your Lordships who might think that more extended powers would be desirable; but I will only say that I do hope the Government will seize the opportunity of the County Councils being now established for taking the first step in the matter, even though it may be a very small one, that is of grappling with an evil which is universally acknowledged in this House and throughout the country, and which has been too long standing in the way for settlement by Parliament.

THE EARL OF JERSEY: My Lords, I think the House will quite agree that the subject which the noble Lord has brought forward is one of great importance in many counties. Personally, I may say that I was one of those who were anxious that some Bill of the character to which he has alluded should be passed some years ago; but, as he is aware, great difficulty was experienced in passing the Fisheries Protection Bill, partly, if not mainly, on account of the incidence of rating. The noble Lord has asked whether the County Councils would not be the proper authorities to carry out any future measure in regard to the prevention of floods, and certainly I am pleased to be able to say that, so far, the Department which I represent entirely agrees with him. But I must point out that at the present time there are no general powers belonging to existing Local Authorities; and therefore, before any such measure as that to which he alludes could pass, not merely an extension of powers, but really a new Bill would be required. I think we have heard to-night quite sufficient to show that any Bill dealing with County Councils, however small in its inception it might be, would have a tendency to greatly increase in size. Bills in passing rapidly through Parliament have a tendency that way. What I have to say, in answer to the noble Lord, is that the points to which he has alluded will be carefully and fully considered by Her Majesty's Government when any measure dealing with the extended powers of Corporations is brought in.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY : My noble Friend Lord Rosebery has given notice of a question which he desired to ask the noble Marquess, but he is unable to be present, having duties elsewhere. He has, therefore, requested me to ask the noble Marquess opposite the question on the Paper. Perhaps I may make one remark in order to explain it. It relates to a passage in the noble Marquess's Despatch 10 days ago concerning the recent arrangements in East Africa. The noble Marquess there says that—

“England will further assume, with the consent of the Sultan of Zanzibar (which has been given), the exclusive protectorate over the Sultanate, including the Islands of Zanzibar and Pemba.”

The question which my noble Friend Lord Rosebery desired me to ask is this :

—1. The exact meaning of the expression “the Sultanate of Zanzibar” in Lord Salisbury's Despatch of 14th June, 1890; 2. If maps will be furnished to the House showing the exact limits of the various territorial proposals involved in the new Convention. As your Lordships are aware, the Sultan of Zanzibar exercises authority over parts of the coast as well as over Zanzibar and Pemba ; and, therefore, for the purpose of rightly understanding the arrangement which has been come to, it is desirable to know exactly what is meant by, according to the noble Marquess' Despatch, “the Sultanate of Zanzibar,” over which the protectorate is to extend. The maps referred to in the second question would, no doubt, show precisely the boundaries of the territory in reference to the protectorate.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY) : I imagine that the word “Sultanate” has the same relation to Sultan as Monarchy has to Monarch, or Empire to Emperor. The protectorate over the Sultanate of Zanzibar means, I imagine, the protectorate over the territory which is under the government of the Sultan, or under his suzerainty. If the noble Earl asks me to give him an enumeration of those territories, of course I shall meet with greater difficulty, because there is a certain amount of controversy attaching to some portions of them ; but, generally speaking, they consist of Zanzibar, the islands with which that is connected, and a considerable portion of the coast. With regard to the second question, as to maps, I inquired to-day, and I was told that the maps have already been sent down to the House of Lords this morning. If that has not been done I will take care that they are sent down without any delay.

House adjourned at five minutes before
Seven o'clock, to Thursday next, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

BURNLEY RECTORY BILL [LORDS]

(By Order.)

Order for Second Reading read,

(3.5.) MR. MACLURE (Lancashire, S.E., Stretford) : In moving the Second Reading of this Bill, it will be necessary that I should occupy the time of the House for a few moments in order to explain how the necessity for the Bill has arisen. By an Order in Council, dated the 28th of March, 1890, Burnley has been created into a Suffragan Bishopric. This Bill proposes to make provision for the maintenance of the Suffragan Bishopric, and it has received the approval of the Archbishop of York, the Bishop of Manchester, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The present Rector of Burnley, Canon Townley Parker, is the owner of the advowson of the living, which is now worth £4,000 a year, with a population of 13,000, the rest of the spiritual wants of the town being provided for by other churches, which are not so well endowed. The proposal which Canon Parker makes is that, on the voidance of the living by him, he should surrender to his successor—the Bishop Suffragan of Burnley—the sum of about £2,000 a year, leaving the remaining £2,000 to be divided among the smaller churches of the town, and extended beyond the present parish of Burnley. A somewhat similar arrangement was made in the case of the Suffragan Bishopric of Stoke, which received the sanction of this House. In this case it is an absolute free gift on the part of Canon Parker, who surrenders this valuable property simply for the benefit of the town in which he has worked for something like 38 years. As the arrangement has received the approval of all the authorities I fail to see what possible objection can be made to such a noble gift. The Bill has already passed the House of Lords without opposition, and I now beg to move that it be read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Maclure.)

*(3.10.) MR. SPENCER BALFOUR (Burnley): In moving the Amendment of which I have given notice, I wish to say that I entirely concur as to the merits of the gift which the Rector of Burnley proposes to make. I have no doubt that he is actuated by the highest motives of benevolence and generosity, and that he is desirous of taking the best course of dealing with the very large funds of this somewhat remarkable rectory. But the objections to the Bill are of a numerous and weighty character. In the first place, is it desirable that a question affecting the status, position, and organisation of the Church of England in East Lancashire should be decided by a private Bill in the same way as other questions are decided by a Railway or Canal Bill? My hon. Friend says that there was no opposition to the measure in the House of Lords, but the reason was that under the locus standi arrangements which govern the procedure of a Private Bill Committee it was not possible to formulate an opposition. My hon. Friend further states that the Bill has received the approval of the Archbishop of York, the Bishop of Manchester, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. So far as the Archbishop and Bishop are concerned I can quite understand that they approve of the Bill which provides the parochial funds shall be applied to the maintenance of the episcopacy. But the people themselves, who ought to be consulted, have never been consulted. The measure has never even been submitted to the Vestry, and there is this remarkable fact, that it is a Bill to dispose of funds originally called into existence for parochial purposes without the consent of the parishioners being asked in any form or shape. I think before a measure of this sort is treated as a Private Bill there ought to have been some kind of Wharnccliffe meeting of the parishioners, and it is unfair to say that the Bill has not been opposed, when the parishioners had no means of opposing it in the House of Lords. It is also objected that of this £4,000 per annum, which is the present revenue of the rectory, but which, it is calculated, will be considerably increased hereafter, no less than £2,000 is assigned for the purpose of creating a Suffragan Bishopric of Burnley. I submit that the churchmen of Lancashire are wealthy and influential enough to maintain a Suffragan Bishop without appropriating these funds, and if the revenue is to be diverted it ought to be diverted for local purposes. Upon these grounds, and these grounds only, I have been asked by my constituents at Burnley, who have not had an opportunity of being consulted in the matter, to oppose the Bill. Everybody appears to have been consulted except those who are most particularly interested. In the case of Stoke, which is the only analogous case, the Hybrid Committee to which the Bill was referred expressly introduced a provision that a future Suffragan Bishopric should not be erected in Stoke-upon-Trent. This Bill is directly opposed to the decision then arrived at, because it proposes that every Suffragan Bishop of Burnley shall be Rector of the parish. I beg to move that the Bill be read a second time on this day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Spencer Balfour.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

*(3.20.) SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH (Lancashire, N.E., Clitheroe): I cordially acknowledge the manner in which my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. S. Balfour) has spoken of my friend and neighbour, the rector of Burnley, and the handsome recognition he has made of the extremely liberal spirit in which this gift is proposed to be conferred by Canon Parker. I live in the immediate neighbourhood, and know something of the circumstances of the town. I, therefore, wish to explain why I cannot agree with my hon. Friend, although I know that he represents the feeling of some of his own constituents, and of mine also, in opposing the Bill. In the first place, there has been an entire absence of opposition to the Bill in Parliament. No objection was raised to it in the House of Lords, and no Petition has been presented against it in the House of Commons. To-day is the last day for the presentation of Petitions, and up to this time no Petition has been deposited. I venture to say, therefore, that it would be a strong and extreme measure for the House to adopt the course now suggested of throwing out the Bill. My hon. Friend says that the parishioners have not been consulted, but, as far as I know, the Churchmen of Burnley unanimously approve of the measure. When it was first announced that the rector proposed to make this generous gift, there was a chorus of approval, not only from churchmen, but from the inhabitants generally, and although there has been some little opposition since, I believe that it has been based upon a misapprehension. In my opinion, this is a most liberal measure, and the kind of measure of reform which Liberals should desire to see carried out. There has long been a desire on the part of Burnley and the neighbourhood that this rich living should be re-distributed, so that other districts in the town should receive some benefit from it. Upon two occasions the rector has met that feeling. He has devoted out of the revenue of the living £150 a year, or £450 in all, to three of the poorer parishes in Burnley, and for another parish he has set aside an annual sum of £150, irrevocably as an endowment. By this Bill he proposes to devote about £2,000 a year to various districts within the ancient parish of Burnley. This Bill, therefore, simply re-distributes the resources of a large living, which is an object in itself most desirable, and one which, I think, will commend itself to the House. It abolishes the private patronage now connected with the living. At present the living is entirely in the hands of a private person—the Rector of Burnley, who can do what he likes with it. He can sell the advowson, with the consequent scandal of putting it up for sale in a newspaper advertisement. Such a scandal will be prevented for ever if this Bill is passed. Sooner or later the Rector proposes to retire, and his successor will not only be Rector of Burnley, but will be able to give a helping hand to the Bishop of Manchester as the Suffragan Bishop of Burnley, the Bishopric having already been constituted by an Order in Council, dated March 21, this year. My hon. Friend says that it is a serious thing to decide a matter of this kind by a private Bill. I quite agree with him. I very much dislike the system of private ownership in connection with these matters, but the present Bill destroys the very thing to which he objects, and if the measure passes, it will be impossible hereafter to deal with the living by a private Bill. At present, however, it is the only course open. My hon. Friend says that the revenue is likely to increase. I am not sure that it will be so, seeing that a large portion of it is derived from leases for 999 years, and, although there may be an increment when the leases fall in, I hardly think that my hon. Friend looks forward 999 years. There are two alternatives open to the House—either to pass the Bill, which will be a great reform and a benefit to the town of Burnley, or to reject it, and to continue the present order of things, which appropriates this revenue of £4,000 for the benefit of a population of 13,000, instead of making it available for a population of something like 80,000. Moreover, the living will remain as a piece of private patronage, instead of being in the gift of the Bishop of Manchester, and available for wider and more general purposes.

(3.27.) MR. WOODALL (Hanley): My right hon. Friend says that there are only two alternatives in dealing with this measure. I would venture to suggest a third, namely, the precedent which was set in the case of the rectory of Stoke-upon-Trent. There are many points of similarity between the two cases. Both are rich livings; in both cases the proposal was to make a wise and generous application of the funds for the better service of the Church, and in both it was proposed to place the patronage in the Bishop of the diocese. But such a proposal, which necessarily comes before the House in the form of a Private Bill, establishes a precedent of a novel and dangerous kind, and consequently requires very careful attention. I venture to submit that the House would do well to follow the precedent established in the case of Stoke, and to refer the Bill, after having read it a second time, to a Hybrid Committee, which would inform the House of circumstances which would aid us in coming to a decision on the matter.

(3.30.) MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): I listened with attention to the speech of my right hon. Friend near me (Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth), but I must say that I strongly object to deal with fragments of a huge national question in the form of a Private Bill. What would be thought if it were proposed to make similar arrangements in connection with the Army or Navy, or any other branch of the Public Service? I, for one, feel bound to protest against such a mode of procedure: and I do not think any hon. Member will be prepared to get up and say that the National Church is not, for all practical purposes, a branch of the National Service of the country. There is, therefore, to my mind, the gravest possible objection to any proposal for dealing with questions of this kind by a Private Bill. Without desiring to enter into the merits of the case, I think that we who look forward to a general measure for effecting a final settlement of all these questions will not be prepared to vote for the Bill. I, therefore, give my hearty support to the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley for the rejection of the Bill. There are some features of the case which are open to serious objection. The present Rector of Burnley is the owner of the advowson. I presume that the Bill is not to take effect until he vacates the living; and, therefore, I think it is for the House to determine whether £2,000 a year is not too large a sum to leave for the incoming Rector. If we are to cut down the income of the living, I do not see why we should not lop off another £1,000, and make it available for the extension of the Established Church in other parts of Burnley. If a re-adjustment is required, I think it ought to cover a much wider ground. The time is not far distant, I believe, when we shall have the whole question of the endowment of the Church in Scotland and Wales before Parliament, and those who are looking forward to the increased usefulness of the Established Church will then have an opportunity of discussing the whole question.

(3.4.) VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, N.E., Darwen): I do not see why the hon. Member for West Bradford (Mr. Illingworth) should endeavour to convey an imputation against Canon Townley Parker for what is really a very generous act on his part. He is the owner of an advowson worth £4,000 a year, but he proposes, if Parliament will allow him, to give up this important piece of patronage, and to devote the living for ever afterwards, not only to the benefit of Burnley, but to that of the diocese at large. I do not think that we on this side of the House can support the Bill from quite the same point of view as the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth). It is not because we dislike private patronage that we support the Bill, but because we have really at heart the interests of the Church at large. The diocese of Manchester is a growing diocese, with a large population urgently in need of increased facilities for following the worship they believe to be right, and it is proposed to place at the disposal of the Bishop this large and rich living. It is a very generous act on the part of the Rector of Burnley, and one which I think Parliament ought gratefully to accept. Precisely the same thing has been done in the borough of Blackburn, although in that case it was not necessary to apply for an Act of Parliament. A living has been given there to a clergyman who acts as a Suffragan Bishop to the Bishop of Manchester, and I have never heard any objection raised to the fact that that gentleman performs functions which are for the benefit of the country at large. I do not propose to enter into the question which has been raised by the hon. Member for Bradford, but I do not think, even from his own point of view, that the question of Disestablishment will be advanced or retarded in the slightest respect by the fact that either the rector or the Bishop has the use of these funds.

MR. ILLINGWORTH: I presume that the noble Lord has no intention of misrepresenting or doing an injustice to me. My views are well known, and have been often explained both here and elsewhere. I have not the slightest wish to touch any national property at all, and I would remind him that there was no confiscation of the Irish Church Fund.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: Does the hon. Gentleman wish to confer the Church property of Burnley upon Lunatic Asylums, which is what was mainly done in the case of the Irish Church Fund? Certainly I do not hold that view, but I do not think the question of Disestablishment will be in the slightest respect advanced or retarded by anything this Bill may do. In this case the patron himself, the Bishop, and the people of Burnley, are strongly in favour of the Bill, and, seeing that it will be of great advantage to the diocese at large, I would urge the House to read it a second time, although I do so upon very different grounds from those which have been adduced by the right hon. Member for Clitheroe.

(3.45.) MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): I hope that the House will endeavour to approach the question without losing itself in that cloud of prejudice which the hon. Member for Bradford was the first to throw out, and which the noble Lord who has just addressed the House has certainly not clarified. I think we ought to look upon the matter as men of common sense. Here is a living of £4,000. The advowson is the property of the person who is now the Rector, and he has the uncontrolled disposition of that advowson. He proposes to vest it in the Bishop of Manchester, and it is further proposed so to re-distribute the value as that £2,000 shall be attached to the existing church, and the remaining £2,000 shall be apportioned in augmentation of the minor livings of Burnley. I cannot see that any possible case whatever has been made out for the rejection of the Bill. I, therefore, hope that the hon. Member for Burnley will not press his objection; and in regard to his second proposal that it should be referred to a Hybrid Committee, I confess that I do not see that it would do any great amount of harm, even if no gain is likely to result from the adoption of such a course.

*(3.50.) MR. BYRON REED (Bradford, E.): The right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Committees says that all the Bill does is to transfer this property from a private owner to a public servant. Perhaps the Bishop of Manchester is willing to accept that designation in a general sense, but I think in no other.

MR. COURTNEY: I meant nothing more than a general sense.

*MR. BYRON REED: I think I am entitled to place my own interpretation upon the right hon. Gentleman's words. Of course, I am unable to say what was in his mind, but I wish to point out that the loose use of terms by a right hon. Gentleman of such weight and position is calculated to render our discussion somewhat difficult. All I have to say is that the Bishop of Manchester is in no ordinary sense a public servant. He is neither appointed by the State nor paid by the State, and he cannot be dismissed by the State. He is, therefore, in no Parliamentary sense a public servant. I should like to point out to the hon. Member for West Bradford that this is a Private Bill. If the advowson of Burnley were a public endowment created by this House, it would be unnecessary to proceed by Private Bill. The very fact that the question is being dealt with by a Private Bill proves the reverse of the case the hon. Member for West Bradford would have the House believe, namely, that the endowment is national property. The Rector proposes to make an extremely liberal re-distribution of this property, and I cannot understand how such a provision can be objected to by hon. Gentlemen opposite.

(3.55.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): If anything is calculated to defeat this Bill it would be the speeches of the noble Lord opposite and the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. Both of them have endeavoured in a very special manner to raise the question of Disestablishment.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: I was very far from raising that question. It was raised, and, in my opinion, most unnecessarily, by the hon. Member for West Bradford.

*MR. BYRON REED: I equally deprecate the raising of such a question. My remarks were only made in reply to the hon. Member for West Bradford and the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Committees.

MR. ILLINGWORTH: Perhaps I may be allowed to explain. I did not raise the question of Disestablishment. What I urged was that this property ought not to form the subject of a Private Bill, but might fairly await the time when the whole question of the present condition of the Established Church will have to undergo review.

SIR W. HARCOURT: All I wished to say was that I desire to support the Bill, and that if anything would induce me to vote against it, it would be the speeches of the noble Lord opposite and the hon. Member for East Bradford (Mr. Byron Reed). I am under the impression that the Bishop of Manchester was appointed by the State. I always thought that he was appointed by the Crown, acting upon the advice of the Minister of the Crown; and I regard the Minister of the Crown as the representative of the State. But I do not think it is necessary to discuss the position of the Bishop of Manchester at this moment. The question is whether the proposed Bill is one which, under the circumstances, would be advantageous to the town and people of Burnley. I hope the House will bear that fact in mind, and will vote upon the Bill quite irrespective of the question of Establishment or Disestablishment, which really does not arise upon it.

*(3.57.) MR. SPENCER BALFOUR: I will not put the House to the trouble of a Division if it is understood that the suggestion of the Chairman of Ways and Means is carried out, and that the Bill is referred to a Hybrid Committee.

(4.0.) The House divided:—Ayes 172; Noes 131.—(Div. List, No. 154.)

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be committed to a Select Committee of seven Members, four to be nominated by the House, and three by the Committee of Selection."—(Mr. Spencer Balfour.)

MR. MACLURE: I must decline to accept the Motion.

(4.11.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): Then I trust that the hon. Member for Burnley will divide the House upon it.

(4.12.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I think the hon. Member below the Gangway (Mr. Maclure) ought to agree to this proposal, especially after the suggestion of my right hon. Friend the Chairman of Ways and Means. I understand that a precisely similar course was taken in the case of the Stoke Rectory Bill. It involves a question of divided interests which ought to be considered by a Committee constituted as Committees generally are, to whom questions partaking more or less of a public character are referred.

*(4.13.) MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): I also voted for the Second Reading, although the speech of the hon. Member for East Bradford made it somewhat difficult for Liberal Churchmen to do so. I must, however, join in the appeal that, having been read a second time, the Bill should be referred to a Hybrid Committee. The measure itself, carrying out, as it does, a useful Church reform, is a step in the right direction, and ought to be considered without in any respect prejudicing any larger question. The House ought to allow the people of Burnley to be heard, and every interest to be represented, as can only be done before a Select Committee.

(4.15.) MR. MACLURE: I beg to withdraw my opposition to the Motion.

Question put, and agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

THE NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Address to the Crown on the French Fisheries dispute voted by the Legislature of Newfoundland has yet been received; and, if so, whether it will be presented to Parliament?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): The Address referred to has not yet been received. It may be expected by the mail arriving about the 2nd or 3rd of next month. There will be no objection to giving it to Parliament whenever Papers are presented.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is in a position to give the House any information regarding the alleged conflict between French and Newfoundland fishermen?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: No such information has yet been received.

MR. W. REDMOND: Are we really to understand that the Government have taken no steps to ascertain whether these conflicts have occurred or not?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: If such an occurrence has happened, the Local Authorities must make inquiries before reporting, and it is only right to wait a reasonable time for their Report.

MR. W. REDMOND: I beg to give notice that I will repeat this question to-morrow, and until the Foreign Office take proper steps to find out whether this conflict has occurred or not.

IRELAND — POLICE AT ABBEYSIDE, CO. WATERFORD.

MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that on Sunday, 8th of June, a number of police constables and detectives (some of the police wearing side arms and carrying revolvers) entered the grounds of the Catholic Chapel at Abbeyside, County Waterford, as the usual open air Corpus Christi procession was being carried out, and remained on duty until the ceremonies had concluded; that on the same occasion two disguised policemen (one of them a Protestant named Rawson) entered the church with the procession and remained there until the congregation had left; and can he explain what was the object of this action towards people of the district while engaged in celebrating one of the most sacred and impressive ceremonies of their religion?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Constabulary Authorities report that four constables only entered the chapel grounds on the occasion in question. None of them wore side arms or carried revolvers. All were Roman Catholics, and desired to be witnesses of the procession.

CANON KELLER.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Very Rev. Canon Keller, parish priest at Youghal, was on Thursday last pursued whilst driving through his parish by three policemen on a car; and for what reason the rev. gentleman was so beset?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that the rev. Gentleman mentioned is actively engaged in endeavouring to promote an illegal conspiracy in connection with which he is associated with a man named Maurice Doyle, who accompanied him on the occasion in question. They were accordingly followed by the police, who appear to have acted rightly.

MR. DILLON: Is the Chief Secretary entitled to charge respectable gentlemen in Ireland with being engaged in a criminal conspiracy when no charge has been made, and no prosecution undertaken; will the right hon. Gentleman withdraw and apologise for his statement, or will he institute a prosecution against the rev. Canon?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; I see no grounds for withdrawing my statement. I do not know whether the hon. Member for East Mayo is authorised to repudiate on the part of Canon Keller any intention whatever to promote the Plan of Campaign.

MR. DILLON: Is a Minister of the Crown entitled to charge a man with crime, and then persist in the charge unless the person repudiates it? Has any criminal charge been made against Canon Keller, or is it intended to proceed against him?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If any evidence in support of a charge is forthcoming no doubt a charge will be brought. The hon. Gentleman is as perfectly aware as I am that there may be complete moral evidence—[Home Rule cries of "Oh!"] and an hon. MEMBER: "Immoral"—that a person is engaged in a particular conspiracy of this kind, which is yet not of a character to support a criminal prosecution.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): Does the right hon. Gentleman really take up the position that the existence of what he chooses to regard as moral evidence justifies him in making these very serious charges which he is not prepared to substantiate?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman asks me a question. I will answer it by asking him another. Does he mean to say that I am precluded from asserting of any man in Ireland that he is engaged in supporting the Plan of Campaign, unless there is evidence for a prosecution forthcoming?

MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): Yes; and then you would choose the Magistrate.

THE PORTUMNA PROSECUTIONS.

MR. ROCHE (Galway, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what compensation the men are to get who were recently batoned, imprisoned, and prosecuted at Portumna, as is now admitted, at the instance of police whose evidence on oath the Magistrates refused to believe, and who have since been exposed and dismissed from the Force?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have asked for a special Report, but have not yet received it. The facts stated by the hon. Gentleman do not agree with the Report I received on a previous occasion. As to the question of compensation, I think that the ordinary remedy should be resorted to.

MR. DILLON: What is the ordinary remedy, the police having been exposed and dismissed from the Force?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Only one man has been discharged.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Why do not the Government prosecute these men?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. and learned Gentleman does not rightly apprehend the facts of the case; but I would ask the hon. Gentleman to defer the question for the present.

LIGHT RAILWAYS.

MR. GILHOOLY (Cork, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Board of Works have reported favourably on an extension of the railway to deep water at Bantry to accommodate the rapidly increasing fishing traffic on that coast, and recommended a grant to be made under the provisions of the Light Railway Act of last Session; whether this railway extension was also recommended by the Royal Commission on Irish Public Works and sanctioned by the Grand Jury at the last Spring Assizes held in Cork; whether the Cork and Bandon Railway Company are prepared to work the extension line, and to contribute a substantial sum towards the cost of its construction; and whether, the necessary preliminary steps having been taken, the Treasury will now sanction the grant and enable the undertaking to be carried out without further delay?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The statements contained in the first three paragraphs are substantially correct. The distance is about a mile. The cost would be very heavy, and it is thought there are other works more urgent than this.

MAGISTRACY—MR. P. M'LAUGHLIN.

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that the Memorial presented to Colonel Lowry, the Vice Lieutenant of County Tyrone, asking for the appointment of Mr. P. M'Laughlin to the Commission of the Peace, was signed by Mr. Hamilton, J.P., senior Magistrate for the Dromore district, the local Catholic clergy, the Presbyterian minister, and the respectable farmers and merchants of the district of all religious denominations; and if the refusal to appoint Mr. M'Laughlin was not due to the fact that he is a Catholic, whether he will state what the cause is?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not seen the Memorial referred to. But the Vice Lieutenant assures me that the fact of the gentleman referred to being a Roman Catholic was regarded by him as a strong reason to appoint him to the Commission of the Peace if possible. No public advantage would be gained by stating the reasons which I understand led to the decision in the case, which rested, of course, wholly in the discretion of the Vice Lieutenant.

MR. W. REDMOND: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that with a Roman Catholic population in the county of 10,000 there are only four Roman Catholic Magistrates?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know whether these statistics are correct. If they are they would justify the view taken by the Vice Lieutenant, that the fact of the gentleman being a Roman Catholic would be a strong reason to appoint him.

MR. M. J. KENNY: Mr. M'Laughlin is the most respectable Catholic in the district.

MR. F. A. GUY, J.P.

MR. M. J. KENNY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland upon what grounds the Lord Chancellor appointed Mr. Frederick A. Guy to the Commission of the Peace for the County Tyrone; what is the nature of Mr. Guy's connection with the county; whether he has been long resident there; and whether he possesses any real property in the district?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: In regard to the first paragraph of the question, I must refer the hon. Gentleman to a reply which I gave on Friday last. I do not know how long Mr. Guy has been a resident of the county, but he has a residence and property in the district.

HELIGOLAND.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he would place in the Tea Room an Admiralty chart of the sea round Heligoland?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): I have given directions for two of these charts to be sent to the Librarian of the House for this purpose.

FOREIGN MEN-OF-WAR AND BRITISH FORTIFIED PORTS.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether we allow the free entry of Foreign men-of-war into our fortified ports, a practice different from that of other Powers; and whether Her Majesty's Government propose to issue instructions to Naval Commanders or Colonial Governors with regard to the entry into such ports of foreign ships of war and transports carrying troops?

LORD G. HAMILTON: Limitations have, in certain instances, been placed upon the entry of foreign men-of-war and transports into certain specified ports. The Admiralty are not in favour of a general or wholesale restriction, as they believe such Regulations to be unnecessary, and likely, if made reciprocal, to greatly limit the present cruising grounds of Her Majesty's Navy.

WAR OFFICE CONTRACTS.

MR. HANBURY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War on what date Messrs. Ross were struck off the list of contractors for the Government; on what date the War Office issued a Circular to the Volunteers strongly recommending the purchase of the Slade-Wallace equipment; at what date the War Office became aware that Messrs. Ross were under special arrangements with the Slade-Wallace or Wallace firm involving a practical monopoly of the supply of this equipment to the whole Volunteer Force, or whether they are now aware of it; whether, in fact, a very large proportion, practically the whole, of the sets of this equipment so recommended by the War Office have been made, and are still being made, by Messrs. Ross; whether the War Office have taken any, and what, steps to inform Commanding Officers of Volunteers that this firm was not allowed to manufacture for the Army; and on what ground the War Office thus permits and encourages the supply to the Volunteers of work and materials which it will not permit to be supplied to the Regular Forces?

*THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY FOR WAR (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): Messrs. Ross were struck off the list of contractors in March, 1888, and the fact has been publicly announced so frequently that it is impossible to suppose that Commanding Officers of Volunteers are ignorant of it. For the rest, I will refer my hon. Friend to the answer given him on the 8th of May, and will only add that so long as the equipments purchased by Volunteer corps out of their own funds are found on inspection to pass the standard required, the War Department cannot concern itself as to the source from which they come.

MR. HANBURY: The hon. Gentleman has not answered the second paragraph of the question.

*MR. BRODRICK: The second paragraph did not seem to me to be germane to the subject. The War Office have no official information as to the arrangements between Colonel Wallace and the firm of Messrs. Ross. The War Office have given and will give no orders to Messrs. Ross; but they have no control over the places to which the Volunteers may go to purchase articles out of their own funds.

MR. HANBURY: Is it not a fact that the War Office recommended the use of this new equipment, and knew that Messrs. Ross were the only people who could make it, and that the War Office issued this recommendation within a few months after Messrs. Ross had been struck off the list?

*MR. BRODRICK: No; it is not the fact. The War Office have no knowledge that Messrs. Ross are the only contractors that can make the equipment

Mr. Hanbury

MR. HANBURY: For the Volunteers.

*MR. BRODRICK: The Volunteers, like the Government, can obtain the equipment from Colonel Wallace's factory if they desire to do it. There was an interval of 15 months between the striking off of Messrs. Ross and the issue of the Circular.

MR. HANBURY: I beg to give notice that I will raise the whole question on the Vote for the Volunteers.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): Where is the factory of Colonel Wallace?

MR. BRODRICK: I believe it is situated in Bermondsey.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: Will the hon. Gentleman give the address?

[No answer.]

ELECTRIC LIGHTING ORDERS.

MR. OCTAVIUS V. MORGAN (Battersea): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the effect of the provisions which the Board have inserted in Electric Lighting Orders now before Parliament, authorising Local Authorities to transfer their undertakings, will be practically to confer upon the Board of Trade powers to perform functions heretofore exercised by Parliament, and also deprive the public of the means that they now have of resisting any such transfer by appearing before a Parliamentary Committee where evidence is taken upon oath; and whether the Board would have the power to administer an oath if the functions of Parliament were so vested in that Department?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): Section 11 of the Electric Lighting Act, 1882, provides that—

"No Local Authority, Company, or person shall by any contract or assignment transfer to any other Company or person, or divest themselves of any legal powers given to them, or any legal liabilities imposed on them by this Act, or by any licence, order, or special Act, without the consent of the Board of Trade."

The Provisional Orders granted under the Act referred to require that public notice of the proposed transfer shall be given, and the transfer cannot be made without the consent of the Board of Trade, by whom the deed of transfer must be approved, and who will make any inquiries that they may consider necessary in the interests of the public. The Board of Trade would have no power to administer an oath. With regard to the merits of the clause, I wish to point out that the Local Authorities, who are representatives of the ratepayers, ought to be the best judges of their interests in matters affecting the lighting of the town.

ENGINEER STUDENTS.

CAPTAIN PRICE (Devonport): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he could state to the House how many vacancies for engineer students were there last year, and how many candidates competed for them; what were the respective numbers this year; how many candidates qualified in each case; is it on account of a difficulty in getting suitable candidates for studentships that an attempt is now being made to admit assistant engineers direct from the private engineering establishments; how many vacancies have been offered with this object; and how many candidates have been got to compete for them, and with what result?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The number of competitors for vacancies for engineer students in this and last year were given in answer to a question by the hon. Member for Northampton on the 3rd of June. The admission of assistant engineers from private engineering establishments was not instituted on account of any difficulty in obtaining suitable candidates for studentships, but to extend the area of competition, and raise the status of the competitors. The proposal is to give about 10 nominations annually. Five candidates competed and three qualified at the recent examination. This is the first year of outside competition for direct appointments, and I have little doubt that in subsequent years the number of outside competitors will steadily increase.

EDUCATIONAL GRANTS.

MR. A. THOMAS (Glamorgan, E.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education what steps have been taken to remove the impression created by the recent Circulars from the Science and Art Department, "that all grants from that Department will be withheld in future from Higher Grade Advanced Elementary Schools"?

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): I have already stated that this matter is under consideration, with a view to a serious modification of the Circular in question; and, I may add, in order to remove the fears of which the hon. Member speaks, that in the result no impediment whatever will be placed upon Science Instruction in the schools he mentions.

GREYSTONES HARBOUR.

MR. W. CORBET (Wicklow, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, with reference to a representation made to him in April last by the inhabitants of Greystones, to the effect that the harbour recently constructed there had silted up, and is practically useless, and to his statement that Government are considering the matter, whether any decision has been come to; and whether the Treasury, in view of the fact that the plans were carried out in the face of the representations of the fishermen and boatowners, will grant the sum necessary to erect a north groyne, and dredge the accumulated shingle out of the harbour?

*MR. JACKSON: If the locality or the Grand Jury will contribute a fair proportion of the cost of the additional works required, I shall have no objection to directing the Board of Works to undertake them.

POLICE PAY AND SUPERANNUATION.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he can lay upon the Table a Memorandum showing the details of the Police Bill, and in tabular form the rates of pay in the Metropolitan and City Police, and the rates of superannuation now obtaining therein, and also in Constabulary Forces in Great Britain, and those given by the present Bill and the previous Bills upon the question?

MR. DILLON: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the question, I will ask him if he will include in the Return similar particulars with regard to the Irish Constabulary?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I will take an early opportunity of laying upon the Table a Memorandum, which I have had in preparation, and which will exhibit the benefits conferred upon the police by the Superannuation Bill as compared with the existing system, and will state as many of the details mentioned by my hon. Friend as can be promptly given. It would take some time to collect the required information from all the provincial forces. I must have notice of the question of the hon. Member for East Mayo.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): Will a similar Memorandum be drawn up with regard to the Scotch police?

MR. MATTHEWS: I think it would be impossible.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): May I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman will supply the House with the Actuarial Reports upon which the scheme of the Government was based?

MR. MATTHEWS: I will consider whether the documents can be laid upon the Table with propriety.

MR. BURDETT-COUTTS (Westminster): When will the Police Bill be proceeded with?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The Government will proceed with the Police Bill on the earliest opportunity. They recognise the grave importance of this question, and there will be no delay on their side.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): Will the right hon. Gentleman name a day? Does the earliest opportunity mean after the Local Taxation Bill has been disposed of, or does it mean immediately? It is very important that a day should be named. Why not next Thursday?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not able to name a day, but I hope to do so on Thursday.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): If the Bill passes the Second Reading, does the right hon. Gentleman intend to refer it to a Committee?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That does not arise out of the question.

THE PROCLAMATION OF THE NORTHAMPTON MEETING.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the fact that a meeting, intended to be held in the market place of Northampton, on 22nd June, by the opponents of the Local Taxation Bill, was forbidden by the Borough Magistrates to be held at that place; whether Magistrates of a Borough have a right to forbid public meetings in the market place of the Borough to protest against Bills before this House; and whether persons attending a meeting forbidden by them incur any legal penalties; if so, of what kind? I may perhaps be allowed to read a copy of the proclamation which I have here. It runs thus—

Mr. Matthews

"BOROUGH OF NORTHAMPTON.

PUBLIC NOTICE ISSUED BY ORDER OF THE MAGISTRATES.

From Representations and Information laid before the Borough Magistrates this day, they are of opinion that the holding of the Public Demonstration and Discussion to be held on the Market Square to-morrow (Sunday) evening, at Eight o'clock, is calculated to provoke Disorder and a Breach of the Peace, and do Prohibit the Holding of such Demonstration and Discussion at the Place named, and Declare the same an unlawful assembly. And they warn all persons who hold, or attempt to, or take part in the same, after the Publication of this prohibition, that they are liable to imprisonment for so doing.—June 21st, 1890."

*MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): May I ask whether the attention of the right hon. Gentleman has been drawn to the case of "Beatty and Gillbank," in which the Queen's Bench held that a declaration such as the Northampton Magistrates have issued was illegal, and that Magistrates have no authority to declare an assembly unlawful on the mere ground that there are persons opposed to its object who might be disorderly?

MR. C. R. SPENCER (Northants, Mid): May I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman can tell from whom the Magistrates obtained the extraordinary information that the demonstration was likely to provoke disorder?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am sorry to say I cannot answer the last question put to me. I am informed by the Magistrates that they prohibited the meeting in the Market Square on the ground that a breach of the peace and disorder were anticipated, at the same time offering the racecourse as a place of meeting. The second and third paragraphs of the question of the senior Member for Northampton raise questions of law which cannot be exhaustively dealt with in the compass of an answer. I am advised that a prohibition of a meeting by Magistrates operates only as a warning that a particular meeting is likely to become an unlawful assembly, and does not of itself involve legal penalties, which will, however, be incurred if the meeting proves in fact to be an unlawful assembly.

MR. LABOUCHERE: The matter being of such grave importance I shall take the earliest opportunity of calling further attention to it.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is the law the same for the three countries?

MR. MATTHEWS: I believe there is no difference in the law.

H.M.S. EGERIA.

SIR T. ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty what was the offence for which a petty officer and a seaman of H.M.S. Egeria were recently condemned, the one to penal servitude for five years and the other to two years' hard labour; whether the statements appearing in the Sydney newspapers as to the composition of the court martial which sentenced them, and as to the violations of the rules of evidence during their trial, have any foundation; and where these men are at present confined?

LORD G. HAMILTON: One petty officer and one seaman of the Egeria were tried for attempting to make a mutinous assembly and for wilful disobedience to orders, and were sentenced respectively to five years' penal servitude and two years' imprisonment. Five other seamen were tried for disobedience, and sentenced to punishments varying from one year to six months' imprisonment. The Reports of these courts martial are now under consideration at the Admiralty. I have not seen any of the Australian newspapers referred to; but the courts martial are legally constituted, and if there is any reflection on the composition of the courts such reflection is not justifiable. The men are on their way home.

SAMOA.

SIR T. ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies when Her Majesty's Government expect the Samoan Treaty to be put in force, and what the obstacles are to its being enforced at once?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I may perhaps be allowed to answer this question. The Samoan Treaty is understood to be in force, but all the local arrangements cannot be immediately carried out. The taxes and dues authorised by the Convention are being collected. The Courts of Justice and of the Land Commission are not yet constituted, nor has the President of the Apia Municipal Council been appointed; but steps are being taken to this end, and other matters are in progress.

RAILWAY RATES.

MR. T. ROBINSON (Gloucester): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Commission appointed to inquire into the classification of goods and the fixing of rates of carriage under the Railway and Canal Traffic Act of 1888 have reported to the Board of Trade the result of their inquiry; whether he is aware that the merchants and traders of this country are very desirous of having these important matters settled promptly; and whether he will be in a position to bring this question before the House of Commons in time to be dealt with this Session?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I fully appreciate the desire of the merchants and traders of this country that effect should be given as speedily as possible to the provisions of Section 24 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888; but I must remind the hon. Member that Lord Balfour of Burleigh and Mr. Boyle sat for 84 days; that no less than 178 witnesses on behalf of the traders were examined before them; and that their inquiry was only concluded on the 21st of May. I hope to be in a position to present a Report to Parliament before the end of July. But, unless the recommendations which it will be the duty of the Board of Trade to make prove acceptable to both sides, I can hardly anticipate that it will be possible to legislate this Session.

POLICE CLOTHING.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether one of the grounds of difference between Mr. Monro and the Home Office related to the contract for the clothing of the police; whether this contract was entered into by the Home Office against the recommendations of the Receiver; whether throughout the greater part of 1889 the complaints of the responsible officers as to the clothing supplied were frequent; and whether in October, 1889, Mr. Monro disclaimed responsibility for the maintenance of a contract which he considered "injurious to the interests and efficiency of the Force?"

*MR. MATTHEWS: The facts relating to the clothing contract are as follows. In September, 1888, a contract for clothing was entered into with a new firm of contractors (Hammond and Co.), who made the lowest tender. This was done with the concurrence of the then Commissioner, who pointed out that the new contract would effect a considerable saving; but the Receiver recommended that the clothing of half the Force should be given to the new contractors, and of the other half to the old contractors (Compton and Co.), whose tender was higher. The Commissioner complained more than once, and with good ground, of the clothing supplied, and generally of the manner in which the contract was performed. The Receiver endeavoured, by the enforcement of penalties and otherwise, to obtain a better performance of the contract. The terms of this contract were, in reality, too unfavourable to the contractors. The Commissioner renewed his complaints in October, 1889, to the effect stated in the question. After consultation with the Receiver, I decided not to terminate the contract then. At a later period, in May, 1890, on fresh complaint by the Commissioner, and after consultation with both Receiver and Commissioner, I came to the conclusion that it would be for the interest and convenience of the Force that the current issue of clothing should be completed by the contractors, as any new contractor has at first much to learn and many difficulties in executing the work; but that as soon as that was completed the contractors should be relieved of their contract, and that course was followed with the assent of the Commissioner.

OFFICERS OF THE METROPOLITAN POLICE.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether Mr. Monro suggested that by the appointment of Mr. Howard as Assistant Commissioner of Police it would be possible to abolish another office existing in the Force; and, if so, is it intended to act upon this suggestion?

*MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; the late Commissioner did make such a suggestion. The matter is still under consideration, and I am not at present in a position to say whether the suggestion will be acted on.

MR. PICKERSGILL: Was the office that of one of the Assistant Commissioners?

*MR. MATTHEWS: No, Sir.

CONSTABLE JARVIS.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what business was Constable Jarvis in New York; and how long was he away from London?

*MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Assistant Commissioner of Police that Jarvis went to New York in November, 1888. His business was the extradition of Thomas Barton, whom he brought back to this country on the 9th of April, 1889, and who was afterwards convicted at the Central Criminal Court of forging transfers of London and North-Western Railway Stock.

MR. T. M. HEALY: How was it it took Jarvis four months to do this?

*MR. MATTHEWS: I have given the hon. Member all the information I have.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I will renew the question.

SHADOWING IN IRELAND.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state the number of persons "shadowed" and the number "watched" in Ireland for each or any of the three weeks ending 21st June?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not aware whether this would be practicable, and must ask the hon. Member to defer the question.

LICENCES IN IRELAND.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can now state the intentions of the Government as to the suspension of licences in Ireland, i.e., whether by the Government Licensing Bill or by a separate measure?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have consulted with my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board as to whether the suspension of licences in Ireland should be carried out by the Government Bill or by a separate measure; and we have come to the conclusion that it would be very difficult to deal with it by Amendments which proceed by reference to the English clauses, and it would be more convenient to deal with that part of the question, so far as it relates to Ireland, by a separate measure.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Do the Government intend to introduce a separate measure?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the hon. and learned Gentleman has a measure which has passed the Second Reading, and which might fittingly form the basis of a method of dealing with the question.

MR. T. M. HEALY: If I endeavour to make progress with the Bill, will the right hon. Gentleman make arrangements with his supporters not to block it?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The most convenient course would be that, as the Bill of the hon. and learned Member deals with part of the general question, it should proceed pari passu with that of the Government.

MR. T. M. HEALY: If I endeavour to put it down to-night for an early day, will the right hon. Gentleman assist me to make progress? As the Government have got one clause of their Bill, will they allow me to take one clause of my Bill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I shall be glad to help the hon. Member as far as I can.

POSTMEN'S GRIEVANCES.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he will state the number of telegraph messengers employed in London, the scale of wages paid, the rates paid for overtime and Sunday work; whether overtime is compulsory upon them; and what proportion of those willing and qualified to become postmen are appointed?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): To the hon. Member's four questions the answers are as follows: 1st. 2,430; 2nd. 7s., rising by 1s. a week annually to 11s.; 3rd. I have not had time to ascertain the particulars of overtime work and Sunday work; 4th. It has been for many years the practice to promote those telegraph messengers who are willing and qualified to vacancies in the postmen's force as opportunity offers.

MEETINGS OF POST OFFICE OFFICIALS.

MR. CONYBEARE: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the Rule which has now been superseded, prohibiting postmen from attending meetings outside the Post Office buildings, applied to meetings held to discuss questions connected with their "duties or pay;" whether in the Notice recently issued by the Postmaster General for the regulation or abolition of meetings, the term "official questions" is used; and whether a postman who attends a meeting in order to call attention to his low wages, will be liable to be punished for discussing official questions?

*MR. RAIKES: There has been no variation of terms, as the hon. Member's inquiry would seem to imply. "Official questions" was the term employed in Lord Stanley of Alderley's Notice of March, 1866; and the same term is employed in the Notice issued by myself. As I have had occasion to point out more than once, postmen are no longer forbidden, as they were until a few months ago, to hold meetings outside the Post Office buildings for the discussion of their rates of pay or any other official question. All that is required of them is that in connection with such meetings they shall comply with the necessary Regulations.

MR. CONYBEARE: I beg to ask the Postmaster General how many boys, and of what age, are being employed at the Western District Office delivering letters in place of men suspended for attending their Union meetings?

*MR. RAIKES: Six boys. Five are 18 years of age, and one is 19.

THE MUNSTER FUSILIERS.

MR. O'KEEFFE (Limerick City): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if his attention has been called to a disturbance which occurred on Thursday last among the men of the 5th Battalion Munster Fusiliers at Limerick; whether these men (Militia) are contrary to usage compelled to lie under canvas, and that owing to rain and defective arrangements their bedclothes, &c., have been wet, and there is danger of sickness ensuing; and whether a sum of 2s. 5d. per week has been taken off the men's pay, and, as universal dissatisfaction has been excited, whether steps be taken to improve their condition, and revert to the original position of the Force?

MR. BRODRICK: A full Report from the General Officer commanding is expected. Meanwhile, I can only state on the authority of the Adjutant that the newspaper account is much exaggerated.

THE CONSOLIDATION OF POLICE ORDERS.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the present stage in the consolidation of the Police Orders, and when is it probable that they will receive the sanction of the Home Office?

MR. BURDETT-COUTTS: I desire to ask whether it is the case that Sir Charles Warren declined to submit these Consolidated Orders to the Home Secretary; whether Mr. Monro took a different view, and nearly a year ago submitted them to the Home Secretary; whether the right hon. Gentleman proposed to submit them to a committee of three clerks, one of whom was a clerk in Mr. Monro's office; and whether Mr. Monro objected to have his own orders submitted to one of his own clerks?

MR. MATTHEWS: I think the hon. Gentleman had better give Notice of this question. The answer to the first question is: A set of Consolidated Police Orders, prepared by a Board of Police Officers and extending to some 600 pages, is now being examined by a member of the Bar with a view to settling the language of the Orders in consonance with the law. He has not yet completed his task, and, as it is likely that questions may arise for my consideration, I cannot at present fix a date when my formal sanction will be given.

MR. PICKERSGILL: How long has the draft of these Consolidated Orders been at the Home Office; and has not the gravest inconvenience been caused by the detention of them?

MR. MATTHEWS: No, Sir. These Consolidated Orders have been issued from time to time, not simultaneously. The work of consolidation began a considerable time back; it began in Sir C. Warren's time, and it has been continued ever since. When Sir C. Warren left, the Orders formed an enormous accumulation, and some of them struck me as not being in consonance with the law.

CONVERSION OF THE EGYPTIAN DEBT.

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is true that France declines to discuss any proposals for the application of the economies resulting from the conversion of the Egyptian Debt; and whether the money so saved will be employed in paying the corvée in spite of France's refusal, or ear-marked until her sanction is obtained?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The French Government have postponed the discussion, but we understand that they will shortly be prepared to resume it. It is not likely that any arrangements will be made until the matter has been further discussed with the Powers.

BELFAST POST OFFICE.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether seven members of the first-class of clerks in the Telegraph Department of the Belfast Post Office hold the additional appointment of provincial clerks in charge; whether five of these had this appointment bestowed upon them in recognition of long service and in consequence of their having been, at the time at which it was conferred, superseded in promotion to the first-class; if so, upon what grounds were they permitted to retain this appointment subsequently, on receiving promotion to the first-class; whether the discharge of the duties incident to that of provincial clerks in charge obliges the holders of the position to be absent for long periods from Belfast; and, if so, have their duties during their absence to be discharged by members of the second-class without any extra remuneration, and does their absence also cause present members of the first-class, who are not provincial clerks in charge, to be more frequently employed upon night duty; and, if this be so, whether he will constitute the present holders of the position of provincial clerks in charge supernumeraries upon the staff of the Belfast Post Office, and promote an equivalent number of the second-class to be members of the first-class, so that members of this class shall not be called upon to undertake responsible first-class duties without the emoluments appertaining to the position?

*MR. RAIKES: In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that although the case is not quite as stated in the question—inasmuch as the number of first class clerks at Belfast who act as provincial clerks in charge is six and not seven, and their appointments were not given for the reasons assigned—the aggregate absence of these officers from Belfast has been unduly large, and I am considering whether similar appointments should not be made at other offices in the North of Ireland, so as to relieve the pressure at Belfast. The Secretary to the Post Office in Ireland has the matter in hand, and will give it his early attention.

POSTAL IRREGULARITIES AT TWINEHAM.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that considerable delay and irregularity occurs in the postal delivery at Twineham, near Cuckfield, and that on Thursday the morning letters were delivered at Twineham Court about noon by two little boys; and whether he will take steps to remedy this irregularity of the Postal Service?

*MR. RAIKES: I regret to find that there has been such irregularity in the Postal Service to Twineham as the hon. Member indicates, and I have taken steps which, I hope, will remove all cause for complaint in this respect.

THE OLPHERT DISPUTE.

MR. DALTON (Donegal, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been drawn to the proceedings at Falcarragh Petty Sessions, on Tuesday the 17th, in which a man named Peter M'Ginley was charged by a bailiff on the Olphert Estate named Conaghan with assault, and in which, on a cross summons, Conaghan was charged by M'Ginley with assault and with having presented a revolver at him and threatened to shoot him, and to the decision of the Court, consisting of two Resident Magistrates, that, though Conaghan's conduct was reprehensible in this case and generally in going about the country with a revolver and threatening to shoot people, M'Ginley should be imprisoned for a fortnight and then be held to bail to keep the peace for 12 months, while Conaghan should be held to bail merely; whether he will direct the attention of the Lord Lieutenant to this decision with a view to the remission of at least the latter part of the sentence inflicted on M'Ginley, who would appear to have acted only in self defence against a murderous attack on his life; whether the bailiff Conaghan was given a licence to carry firearms; and, if so, by whom, and whether his licence will now be withdrawn; and whether, in view of the fact that this is the third instance within a recent period of human life being threatened in the Falcarragh district by persons licensed to carry firearms, a revision of the list of persons so licensed will be ordered with a view to the removal from it of the names of all persons who have abused the privilege conferred upon them, or who have not furnished satisfactory guarantees that they will use the privilege with discretion?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that M'Ginley was charged at Falcarragh Petty Sessions with a serious assault upon Conaghan, who is a bailiff, by striking him with some weapon upon the head. The evidence (for the defence) put forward by M'Ginley, as to whether the revolver was produced before or after the assault was committed, was, it is stated, very conflicting. It appears, however, as a matter of fact, the revolver was not loaded. The Magistrates made such orders as they considered the merits of the respective cases required. There does not appear to be anything in the decision calling for the exercise by the Lord Lieutenant of the prerogative of mercy. Conaghan has a licence to carry arms for his personal protection, which was issued by the licensing officer of the district. The Magistrates do not appear to have made any representation that the licence should be withdrawn. I will have their opinion asked. No complaints appear to have been received about the improper use of firearms except in one case, and in that the Grand Jury decided that the revolver was accidentally discharged.

STRADBALLY POST OFFICE.

MR. P. J. POWER (Waterford, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he has received a Memorial from the people of Stradbally and district, County Waterford, asking that a Miss Finn should be appointed postmistress at Stradbally; whether it is the practice of his Department to meet the wishes of localities in the appointment of postal officials where consistent with efficiency; and whether he intends meeting the wishes of this locality by the appointment of the lady named?

*MR. RAIKES: I have received the Memorial referred to. The practice of the Department in such cases is to select the candidate who is considered in all respects to be the most suitable both in the interests of the public and of the Post Office. In the present instance, I can only assure the hon. Member that Miss Finn's claims and qualifications shall be fully considered in connection with those of the other candidates for the appointment in question.

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH (Lancashire, Clitheroe): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Her Majesty's Government have considered the Third Report of this Session of the Public Accounts Committee, upon the new arrangement of the Estimates, reducing the number of the Votes; and whether the recommendations of the Committee are accepted by the Treasury, and will be adopted in framing next year's Estimates?

MR. JACKSON: The Treasury has considered the Third Report of the
Mr. A. J. Balfour

Public Accounts Committee, and has decided to accept its recommendations, and adopt them in framing next year's Estimates.

MAP OF AFRICA.

MR. W. ISAACSON: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Her Majesty's Government will consent to issue a map of Africa showing the portions conceded to Germany, the water communications, also the heights of land, as far as is known?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: There is a map in the Tea Room which gives all the information required except the height of the mountains, and I do not think that is very important.

HELIGOLAND.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, agreeably to the precedent set in the case of the cession of the Ionian Islands to Greece, the Government will undertake to despatch a Commissioner to Heligoland for the purpose of eliciting the opinion of its inhabitants with regard to the proposed cession of the Island to Germany?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Her Majesty's Government do not think this necessary; they are well informed of the sentiments of the inhabitants.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will undertake that the proposed Anglo-German Agreement shall not be signed by the British Plenipotentiary until Parliament has had an opportunity of expressing its opinion on the Bill for the cession of Heligoland; and also whether the proposed Anglo-German Agreement will contain a clause providing that the portion of the Agreement which relates to the cession of Heligoland shall not take effect until it has been ratified by the passing into law by the British Parliament of a Bill authorising the cession?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No such clause is necessary, for the Agreement will only provide that a Bill shall be introduced to enable Her Majesty to make the cession.

*MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I desire to ask whether the Prime Minister, in a recent speech, declared that Parliament and public opinion ought to be consulted before any surrender of territory took place?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I do not know what the Prime Minister said on that occasion; but if a question is put on the Paper, I will communicate with the noble Lord.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): Do the Government intend to lay on the Table any Papers whatever relating to Heligoland?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Certainly, Sir; as soon as possible.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is it intended that the island shall be fortified by the Germans as soon as they get possession of it?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not aware of any provision of that kind in the Treaty.

HIGH LICENCE.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is the intention of the Government to adopt the principle of High Licence, as embodied in the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The question is one which should be considered by the House when any general measure dealing with licensing is under review.

POSTAL COUNTERMEN.

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has received a Petition from the countermen of the Metropolitan Postal Districts which was transmitted to him through the Postmaster of the West Central District on the 13th of last month, asking him to favour a committee of their class with an interview; and whether, seeing that he recently granted a similar application to the telegraphists and sorters, he will accede to the request of the countermen?

*MR. RAIKES: In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that I decided upon a Memorial from the countermen in October last, and hardly had I done so when they put in a further Memorial, and upon this I decided in February last. Notwithstanding this double decision, they have sought, in a Memorial to which the hon. Member refers, to reopen the question by a request for an interview. I have not yet had time to consult my official advisers whether I should grant an interview. I am always pleased to have an opportunity of discussing questions affecting any class of my officers with them. But the demands on my time are so great that I am not always able to afford myself this pleasure.

AXBRIDGE RURAL SANITARY AUTHORITY.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if the Axbridge Rural Sanitary Authority have secured a Provisional Order to enable them to acquire certain land under the Compulsory Clauses of "The Allotments Act, 1887;" and, if so, whether he can state the cost to the Sanitary Authority of obtaining such Provisional Order?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The cost to the Axbridge Rural Sanitary Authority of obtaining the Provisional Order referred to was £6 14s. 0d. This amount includes a charge of £4 14s. 0d. in respect of a journey to London for the purpose of depositing the Petition and documents with the Local Government Board, which at present it appears to me might have been avoided. Apart from this charge, the expense incurred by the Authority was £2 0s. 0d.

THE ANGLO-GERMAN AGREEMENT.

MR. JENNINGS (Stockport): In the absence of the hon. Member for the Peckham Division of Camberwell I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the exemption from transit dues granted by the Anglo-German Agreement to the goods of England and Germany between Nyassa and the Congo State, and between the northern end of Lake Tanganyika and the British sphere of influence, would extend, under the Most Favoured Nation Clauses, to the goods of other nations?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I do not find in the Agreement between Germany and Portugal any parallel of latitude named, but the geographical description of the southern boundary of the German sphere of influence would nearly correspond with the 11th degree of south latitude. Should any questions arise south of the line mentioned in the Despatch, they would arise either with the Congo State or with the Portuguese.

POLICE SHADOWING IN IRELAND.

MR. W. REDMOND: I wish to call the attention of the Chief Secretary to a letter which appears in the Pall Mall Gazette this evening from a New Zealand lady, in which the writer says—

"I find some of the customs of this country very strange. I am here on a visit from New Zealand, and I am not two days in town till the police have been making inquiries about me even in such a public place as a bank, as if I were an escaped convict or suspected of felony. Why should I or any lady be subjected to such an indignity? Need I say I am a Protestant; and while my politics should not deprive me of the liberty of a citizen, they are not Nationalist, for, being a colonist, I know little of the Irish controversy. But it would be well that the colonists and English people should know that British citizens cannot move about in broad daylight without being the subjects of police surveillance."

May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, in view of his statement that people are only shadowed if they are suspected of being criminals, this lady was so suspected; and will he take steps to protect at least visitors to our country from this indignity?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member asks whether this lady will be protected. I do not think she complains of being shadowed, but she does complain of certain inquiries being made. I know nothing of the facts, but will cause an investigation to be made if the hon. Member will give notice of a question.

MR. W. REDMOND: Of course I will. At the same time, allow me to point out that the lady complains that "British citizens cannot move about in broad daylight without being the subjects of police surveillance." I think that is the most serious part of the allegation.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that to be a general observation and not a specific complaint.

MR. W. REDMOND: I will put the question down for Thursday next.

THE NEW AMENDMENT TO THE LICENSING BILL.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I wish to ask your ruling, Sir, on a matter affecting
Sir J. Ferguson

Parliamentary procedure. By the Budget Bill, which received the Royal Assent on June 9, the Government provided by the 7th clause of the measure that the duties on spirits and beer were to be dealt with in a particular way, and that the proceeds arising out of these levies

"Shall be appropriated as Parliament may hereafter direct by any Act passed in the present Session."

These words were inserted upon my Motion. At that time the Local Taxation Bill was running concurrently with the Budget Bill, and the one measure was regarded as a kind of companion to the other. So that these words put in the Local Taxation Bill provided that the moneys raised by spirits and beer were to be immediately spent. At any rate, the word "appropriated" used in the 7th section of that measure was not then intended to cover a locking up of the funds, but the words "expenditure and paying out of the fund." Now, the Government propose, by the Amendments of the President of the Local Government Board, to insert in the Local Taxation Bill words which give an entirely different meaning to the word "appropriate," because they propose to provide that the levies on whisky and beer shall be locked up for an interminable period, and shall be spent under an Act which may not be passed for years to come. What I submit is this: that the Government, having passed into law a measure which has now received the Royal Assent, ear-marking a certain meaning to the word "appropriate," and attaching a sense of expenditure to it, it is not in accordance with the procedure of this House that the Government can now entirely change the meaning of this Act passed in the present Session by another measure which proposes to fix to the word "appropriate" a meaning of a wholly different character.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: With reference to the observations which we have just heard, and the subject of which is new to me, I would venture to say that, as I understand the matter, the Bill now before the House does not fix a new interpretation to the word "appropriate," but entirely contravenes the meaning of the word "appropriate." The meaning of the word "appropriate" having been fixed by Statute during the present Session, the present Bill proposes that the money shall not be appropriated. If there is one word well understood in the financial practice of this House it is the word "appropriate." The term Appropriation Act, which is familiar to us all, is sufficient to illustrate our meaning.

*MR. GOSCHEN: On the point of order, may I submit the following point:—In this Bill there were three propositions—one relating to England, another to Scotland, and the third to Ireland. In the case of Ireland the money was not appropriated for the service of the year. The case of Ireland was that a portion of the money was to be appropriated as should afterwards be determined by Parliament. I therefore submit that at that very time the word "appropriate" did not carry the narrow interpretation which the hon. Member for Longford now seeks to assign to it; but that it covered the whole of the money, including the portion which was to be disposed of as Parliament should hereafter direct.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I ask you to consider, Sir, what was the meaning then, from the Chancellor of the Exchequer's point of view, of the introduction of those words "during the present Session." They were introduced for the express purpose of securing that the appropriation of this money should be completed during the present year; and that the money should not be voted while the complete appropriation was postponed until a future period. Those words, no doubt, might have been ambiguous as they stood, but it was to remove that very ambiguity that the hon. and learned Member for Longford asked for the insertion of the words which were accepted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in order to make it clear that the appropriation, except in the case of Ireland, was especially provided for, and should be made in the present year.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I submit, Sir, that this Bill, if it is carried into law, does comply with the provisions embodied in the Budget Bill, and that it does appropriate the money which has been voted.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Longford has raised a question the importance of which I do not think he has overrated.

It is a question, I must confess, rather of constitutional interpretation than one of a point of order, upon which I venture to hope, generally speaking, my ruling would be accepted by the House. But I respectfully give the House such opinion as I have formed on the matter, although I do regard it as a matter affecting the constitutional relations of this House, and greatly affecting the whole question of Money Bills and appropriation. The 7th clause of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, which has been passed into law, enacted that it "Shall be ascertained as to proportion and otherwise in like manner as the one-half of the proceeds of the probate duties applicable to local purposes is now by law divided, paid, and ascertained."

And then occur the following words:—

"And the proceeds so paid shall be appropriated as Parliament may hereafter direct by any Act passed in the present Session."

I observe that there is an Amendment on the Paper standing in the name of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board to insert these words in the Bill now before the House:—

"May be hereafter provided by any Act amending the Licensing Acts, and until such Act is passed shall be invested and accumulated as provided by this Act."

Now, it is a very grave question whether those words do constitute such a specific appropriation as the Budget Act directs. I certainly am not aware, in the comparatively short time that I have had to examine into the matter, of any instance of a tax being raised and the proceeds appropriated to no particular authority and to no specific object as is now the case since the three clauses have been withdrawn from this Bill. It would be, I think, for the House to consider, as a matter of policy and interpretation, whether these words of the right hon. Gentleman, moved as an Amendment, do constitute a sufficient appropriation of the sum raised and granted by the Budget Act so as to come within what is undoubtedly the general principle underlying our whole law, namely, the appropriation of money to a specific use within the then existing Session of Parliament, either partly or wholly—I say partly because, of course, there are permanent appropriations of sums extending over more than one year; but even in that case a certain sum is specifically appropriated to be expended within that year. It appears to me, on taking an impartial view—I need not say as impartial a view as I can—on the subject, that if no Act was passed within this Session appropriating the sums allotted under the Budget Act, it would be a very grave question whether the Treasury would not incur grave responsibility and grave liabilities in issuing any money or in issuing it to any body of persons as Local Authorities. There would be, as I understand, no particular direction to the Treasury from this House to issue money, nor to issue it to any particular body of persons, inasmuch as the County Authorities will not have the money allotted to them. But it will be said the money will be accumulated. I confess, looking at the matter from a Constitutional point of view, I know of no precedent for such an accumulation, and though it may be quite true that the fact of no precedent existing does not prove that the proceeding would be un-Constitutional, I think it is eminently a matter for the House to decide whether it is ultra vires or not, and whether such a course would be in harmony with Constitutional practice. It is a matter which I think the hon. and learned Gentleman will be justified in raising as a question of policy, or even of principle, both in Committee and, if need be, also on the Third Reading of the Bill. I have endeavoured to explain my views to the House as well as I have been able.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: On the point of order, may I ask whether your observations do not equally apply to the Irish part of the Bill, which has not been altered as the English and Scotch portions of the Bill are proposed to be altered by the Amendment of my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board?

MR. T. M. HEALY: May I submit that the Irish Secretary is in error, because there is an Amendment down in the name of the President of the Local Government Board also altering the Irish section and providing that this money is to lie up in Ireland until such time as some new Licensing Act is passed?

Mr. Speaker

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There may be some Amendment to the Irish part of the Bill, but substantially I submit the Irish part of the Bill does provide that the money should accumulate until some future stage—until this or another Parliament should deal with the question of Local Government in Ireland. What I desire to ask your ruling upon, Sir, is whether there is any difference, in constitutional principle, between that part of the Bill as originally framed and those parts of the Bill affecting England and Scotland as modified by the proposed Amendment?

SIR W. HARCOURT: Before that point is raised, I would submit that if the objection equally applies to the Irish part of the Bill, we have not yet come to it. We have not discussed that section; the House has not approved it. Your ruling, Sir, as I understand, will apply to the whole Bill and not merely to the Amendment proposed by the President of the Local Government Board.

*MR. GOSCHEN: It would not, Sir, be dignified for me to enter into any argument at a moment like this with regard to any of those most important words which have fallen from your lips. At the proper time, after the hon. Member for Longford has taken the course which is suggested to him, it will be my duty to submit reasons why I am prepared to defend constitutionally, and as a matter of expediency, for the proposals of the Government. I rise simply to point out to you for your consideration whether the clauses which remain in the Bill directing to whom this money should be paid do not constitute a distinct application of the money which would relieve us from the difficulty you have suggested, namely, that there would be no means of getting the money out of the Treasury. Of course, it is part of the plan that clauses should be kept in the Bill distinctly directing the mode of investment, the mode of account, and the manner in which the funds—ear-marked as it is called—should be used. There would be perfect machinery in the Bill for the accumulation and accounting for the money for a specific purpose. I think the particular difficulties, if I may say so with all submission, with regard to the manner in which the money would be dealt with, would possibly not arise when we come to the clauses which direct the investment of the funds.

*MR. SPEAKER: It appears to me that the money would be equally locked up, no matter in whose hands it might lie. Some observations have fallen from the right hon. Gentleman as to my ruling. I hope I may respectfully say to the House that my ruling on this subject is only a matter of opinion on a grave question of constitutional law. It is not intended in any way to bind any portion of the House, but, as I was asked my opinion, I did not think it would be respectful to the House not to give it.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I do not intend, as at present advised, to do more than what I conceive to be the duty of a Member of the House who is specially seised of knowledge on this matter—to appeal to the Chair, as I understand that, upon financial questions especially, the Chair is the constitutional guardian of the liberties of the House.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): It would be a great convenience to Scotch Members and the House generally if the First Lord of the Treasury would make up his mind to tell us now whether we are to fight right through again the licensing part of the Bill, or whether the Government will make up their minds to swallow the remaining bit of the leak and withdraw the Bill.

[No answer was given.]

MR. W. H. SMITH AND THE DEPUTATION OF LICENSED VICTUALLERS.

MR. T. FRY (Darlington): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is correctly reported in this day's issue of the Times to have said to a deputation of licensed victuallers—

“That he gave them the strongest assurance that no part of the Local Taxation Bill was to be considered as abandoned, and that they might absolutely rely upon it that the money to be accumulated should never be devoted to any other purpose than the extinction of licences:”

and, if so, how far that statement agrees with the announcement he made in the House the same evening that the money would be at the future disposal of Parliament?

MR. D. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): I have given the First Lord of the Treasury notice of a question on the same subject. The hon. Member for Darlington has read only a part of the reply given to the deputation by the right hon. Gentleman, but I think other parts of it should be read. The right hon. Gentleman is reported to have said also—

“That the Government had been driven by the opposition of their Liberal Unionist allies to the conclusion that they could not successfully resist the 10 years' limit Amendment, and that they had, therefore, decided to postpone certain clauses of the measure.”

Then he went on to say that—

“On the other hand, he gave the deputation the strongest assurance that no part of the Bill was to be considered as abandoned, and that they might rely upon it that the money to be accumulated should never be devoted to any other purpose than the extinction of licences:”

and this announcement, it was stated, was “received with applause.”

*MR. W. H. SMITH: In answer to the questions of the hon. Members, I have to say there is one portion of this report which is accurate, and that is that the proceedings were private. I can only say that the report is more or less inaccurate. I stated to the deputation all that I had said in the House a few minutes before, neither more nor less; and as every Gentleman in the House is in possession of that statement, I have given all the information I can.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): I desire to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury what were the precedents he referred to yesterday with regard to the leaving over of money for future use instead of its being appropriated in the Session?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not aware that I did refer to precedents, but I venture to say that the only answer that can be given on such a point must be given in Debate.

PUBLIC PETITIONS COMMITTEE.

Thirteenth Report brought up, and read; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed.

NEW WRIT.

For Borough of Barrow in Furness v. William Sproston Caine, esquire, Manor of Northstead.

MOTION.*PROHIBITION OF PUBLIC MEETING (NORTHAMPTON).*MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. LABOUCHERE, Member for the Borough of Northampton, rose in his place, and asked leave to move the Adjournment of the House, for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, a Proclamation of the Magistrates of Northampton prohibiting a public meeting intended to be held in the market place of that town last Sunday evening, and warning all persons holding or taking part in the same that they would be liable to imprisonment for so doing; but the pleasure of the House not having been signified, Mr. SPEAKER called on those Members who supported the Motion to rise in their places, and not less than 40 Members having accordingly risen :—

(5.32.) Mr. LABOUCHERE: I beg, then, to move the Adjournment of the House, and I assure the House that I do so in no spirit of hostility to the Government. I submitted a question to the Home Secretary on the subject, and he admitted that there were important points of law involved in the matter which could not be answered in reply to a question. When the House has heard the facts, it will be seen that the case is a fair and legitimate one on which to ask for an expression of opinion from the House and the legal advisers of Her Majesty's Government, because it touches the whole question of public meetings, and, if it were allowed to pass by, the Magistrates of any town would be able to prohibit any meeting they chose. The facts are very simple. Last week it was decided by the friends of temperance at Northampton to hold a public meeting on Sunday in the market-place. The meeting was not called in any special way by the Liberals there, but the principal persons present connected with it were Nonconformist ministers of the town. There were to be two platforms in the market-place, which is one of the largest in the country. At 1 o'clock the chair was to be taken by Mr. Campion, who is the editor of a newspaper there; and at the other Mr. Manfield, a large manufacturer, an Alderman, and a Magistrate, was to preside. On Saturday the Magistrates met and asked the conveners of the meeting to hold it on the racecourse. As a matter of fact, meetings are habitually held in the market-place in Northampton; and in this case the managers of this temperance meeting had communicated with the brewery interest, and arranged that there should be a public discussion in the market-place, and it had been agreed that both parties would do their best to maintain order. Very possibly there may have been affidavits laid before the Magistrates to the effect that the meeting might lead to a breach of the peace, but I apprehend that that did not warrant the Magistrates prohibiting the meeting or saying that to take part in it would render those who did so liable to imprisonment. The Queen's Bench Division, in the case of "Beatty v. Gillbank," decided that the Magistrates had no right to prohibit a meeting. The question there was whether a meeting of the Salvation Army could be prohibited because some other army threatened to interfere with the proceedings. The decision was that the Magistrates had no right to prohibit a meeting. They may warn persons against attending a meeting and may tell them they must take the consequences. If they fear that individuals are going to disturb the peace, they may call on them to find securities not to disturb the peace, and may put them in gaol if they refuse to find sureties. If that be the present state of the law, I say that the Magistrates had no sort of right to prohibit this meeting and to frighten people who were going to it by telling them they would be liable to imprisonment if they attended. If this were to be permitted all meetings would be rendered practically impossible, since they could be stopped by the action of disorderly persons, who said that they were going to interfere with them. It is most desirable, in view of the fact that the Lord Chancellor is responsible for these Magistrates, who are an unelected body of men, that the Attorney General and the Home Secretary should distinctly declare to the Magistrates of Northampton, and through them to the Magistrates all over the country, that they have no right to interfere with this fair and proper action on the part of the electors of an English town. I beg to move the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—
(Mr. Labouchere.)

*[5.40.] MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I rise for the purpose of seconding the Motion moved by my hon. Colleague. I would take the liberty of suggesting that it is something new in parliamentary practice that, when a great question like that of public meeting is to be discussed, the bulk of the Ministry should at once leave the House. I make no complaint that the bulk of the Conservative Party should have done the same, because I have been in the habit of attacking them on the same ground, that they disregard the liberties of the people, and I am rather glad that my attacks have been justified by what has happened. We are apparently forgetting in England that regard for public right for which England used to be specially famed. The law is clearly and briefly stated in a little manual called Stone's Justices' Manual, and I will take the liberty of reading a very words from that book to the House. I find it stated that—

"A lawful assembly is not rendered unlawful by the knowledge of the persons taking part in it that opposition will be raised to it."

If it were otherwise, any lawful meeting might be rendered unlawful by any half-dozen blackguards declaring that they would interfere with it. The position of the Magistrates is clear. I am indebted to the Solicitor General's (Sir E. Clarke) arguments in a case I shall refer to, for part of the legal arguments I shall submit to the House. I say for part of them, because it was my duty, some 28 years ago, in the Court of Common Pleas, to argue this point. The Solicitor General held that Magistrates had no authority to prohibit a meeting that seems likely to endanger the public peace. In the case of "Beatty v. Gillbank," the Skeleton Army having declared they intended to break the peace as against the Salvation Army, the Magistrates took upon themselves to require several members of the Salvation Army to give security to keep the peace, and the Court held that the Magistrates had no right to require such securities.

Not only is the law clear that the persons convening a lawful assembly cannot be prohibited by the Magistrates from holding it; but it is also clear that if some other persons threatened to break the peace the Magistrates have no right to call upon the persons engaged in promoting the lawful meeting to give surety to the police, which shall prevent them holding the meeting. In the case of "Beatty v. Gillbank," which is reported in the IX Queen's Bench Division, page 308, the order for the sureties was quashed by the Court, in a Judgment delivered by Mr. Justice Field, who said—

"It is quite clear that there is no sort of ground or authority for any action by the Magistrates in interfering with the meeting."

Now, what do these Magistrates do? They are as impudent as if they were Resident Magistrates in Ireland. They are as ignorant of the law as some of the Law, advisers of the Government appear to be on the subject of Irish meetings. They claim the right to prohibit the holding of a meeting, and they announce that if the people go to it after the prohibition it will be an unlawful assembly. I regret that I have to condemn the legal gentleman who advised the Magistrates in relation to this proclamation. I regret it because, though I do not suppose he voted for me, it is my duty to defend the whole of my constituents as far as I can. I regret that in Northampton, where we have had some experience of the assertion of the right of meeting, there should be found any lawyer ignorant enough to advise the Magistrates they might issue this absurd proclamation. Magistrates cannot; a Government cannot; nothing but Parliament can make an assembly unlawful, if it be lawful otherwise. Parliament can do anything; it can take a man's rights, and it has taken a great many away in Ireland, but, at any rate, I hope the House will not permit the Magistrates to take away, without the authority of Parliament, what few rights we have got left. I can understand that the learned Attorney General may feel bound to defend these Magistrates, because I believe they are nearly all Conservative Magistrates. Unfortunately, we have had a great many deaths amongst the Liberal and Radical Magistrates in Northampton during the last few years. I am sure the Lord Chancellor only exercises his discretion for the purpose of promoting the due administration of the law, but it is unfortunate that he has found his discretion lie in the direction of gentlemen of his own political views and of worse lawyers than himself. Whatever one would say of the Lord Chancellor's views in other respects, no one would venture to cast any doubt on his views as a lawyer. I ask the Government, once for all, to say to the people who look to them for teaching "The Magistrates have no right to do an illegal thing." If the Government will not protect our rights we must protect them ourselves. I have never hesitated to do it in times gone by, and I will never in the future when the occasion arises, hesitate to do it. It is the duty of the Government not only to give no encouragement to, but to discourage any infringement at all upon the rights of the citizens, whether they agree to the Government in politics or not. But this stopping of the meeting did not save the three wretched clauses giving the publicans compensation; they had to go. I can conceive that those Magistrates who have been recently appointed wished to show their gratitude by doing the best they could to help the Government in their sore dilemma; but they will not do it effectively by prohibiting discussion. I trust that, little as the Leader of the House seems to care for the assertion of public liberty, some of the old traditions of his Party will be respected, and that, without reference to the question whether this is a Motion for adjournment or not, there will be some consideration for the rights and the liberty of the people which is involved in the Motion. If it had not been that the Home Secretary hesitated yesterday and mocked to-day I should not be speaking now. I said he mocked to-day, for he declared he knew nothing of the law of the land in relation to a most important matter affecting his Department. The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head. I do not know what that shake means, but I do know that in answer to my Colleague yesterday he declared that this was an intricate matter of law, when there is no intricacy at all about it. He cannot have referred to the records of the Home Office or he would have found the Paper upon the Basingstoke disturbances, which was laid on the Table in 1882 by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby. He would have known then that there was some misapprehension, a misapprehension sanctioned by the Law Advisers of the Crown, as to what the rights of meeting were. That might have been a justification for the right hon. Gentleman's ignorance up to the 12th of June, 1882, but on the 13th of June, when the decision in the case of "Beatty v. Gillbank" was delivered in the Queen's Bench Division, that ignorance ought to have been swept away. I ask the House not to regard this as a Party question. It is our question to-day; it may be yours to-morrow; and the difficulty is that if the prohibition of discussion rests with the majority of the Justices in one place to-day it will rest with the majority of the Justices in another place by-and-by. The great thing which has kept this country in advance of every other country in Europe, and which has kept it more peaceful, has been the safety valve of public meeting, where opinions might be expressed. I can understand the Government feeling touchy about their Bill just now. A characteristic of a weak Government is that it gets annoyed with things that a strong Government passes by. I appeal to the House to join in saying to the Conservative Magistrates of Northampton, "You have no right to gag your opponents, since free speech has been the deliverance of the land."

(5.57.) MR. C. R. SPENCER (Northamptonshire, Mid): I am not in the habit of intruding myself on the attention of the House, and, therefore, I hope I may be allowed to make a few remarks. I have known Northampton well for many years, and I do not think that, in all that time, it can be proved that Northampton is in the habit of indulging in riots. It was, therefore, with considerable surprise that I saw in the newspapers yesterday morning that the borough Magistrates had prohibited this meeting, especially when I know that the two gentlemen who were to take the chair at the meeting were two of the most law-abiding members of a law-abiding constituency. I venture to think that this was an extremely dangerous thing for the borough Magistrates to have done. I do not care what are the politics of the Magistrates, but it is a dangerous innovation in the practice of this country for the Magistrates to lay down the law like this. On Sundays we are accustomed to hold meetings of different kinds in Northampton, and it is nothing new for large crowds to assemble in the market-place, and, therefore, it is an absurd aggravation of the trouble for the Magistrates to have suggested to the people that they should go to the racecourse. I do not see why they should not have met as usual in the market-place, and I regret that some ill-advised persons should have considered themselves obliged to persuade the borough Magistrates that this temperance meeting should be prohibited. If my hon. Friend goes to a Division, I shall have the greatest pleasure in supporting him, as a protest against what I must call an infringement of the liberty of the subject.

(6.0.) THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): The politics of the Northampton Magistrates have been referred to. For my own part, I have not the slightest idea what their political colour is. With regard to my answer on the question of the meeting, I stated that the Magistrates could not by such proclamation make a meeting illegal, and that the proclamation was only a warning to those about to take part in the meeting that, in the judgment of the Magistrates, it would be an unlawful assembly, and that such warning did not carry with it any penalty. I believe the three statements are perfectly correct. The only difficulty I have in speaking on the subject arises from my imperfect information of the facts. I have no information beyond the telegram I will read to the House.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not? There has been plenty of time to get it; only two and a half hours' journey.

Mr. MATTHEWS: The telegram is in an answer to inquiries which I made as soon as the hon. Member's question appeared upon the Paper. Does the hon. Member suggest I ought to have sent down a special messenger to the Magistrates? [Cries of "Why not?"] The telegram which I received this afternoon runs—

"Chief Constable received information of organised opposition to meeting. Three bands to parade the town. Magistrates met three o'clock. Made suggestion to promoters that meeting should be held on race course, where it would be possible to check disorder and prevent damage to property. Impossible to do so in Market Square. Promoters declined suggestion. Second meeting of Magistrates at eight o'clock. Meeting at Market Square prohibited. Magistrates again offered race course. Great excitement in town. Breaches of peace generally regarded as certain. Magistrates only anxious to keep peace in town."

That telegram is from the deputy Mayor. I am reluctant to express any condemnation of men whose only desire was to maintain order in Northampton; but I must say that the prohibited meeting appears to me to have been called for a perfectly lawful purpose. Criticism of a Government Bill is, of course, perfectly lawful. One hon. Member has spoken as if the acts of these Magistrates had been the act of the Government. I must point out to the hon. Member that the Government have no control whatever over these borough Magistrates, who have acted with good intentions, no doubt, but on a mistaken view of their powers. If the facts, as narrated by the hon. Member for Northampton, are correct, I think there can be no doubt that the Magistrates were wrong in issuing this proclamation. At the same time, I do not think that the case deserves the very strong and emphatic language of the junior Member for Northampton, for it does not appear to me that the Magistrates had any dark design against the liberty of the subject, or liberty of free speech.

Mr. LABOUCHERE: Will the right hon. Gentleman excuse me? Will he be good enough to express an opinion upon the proclamation? What I want to know is, whether that was legal?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I have said it hardly becomes me to say more than that I do not think the proclamation was justifiable or warranted in the circumstances. The Magistrates appear to me to have acted from a desire to keep good order, but they went the wrong way to work, as far as I can judge. The main outlines of the law relating to meetings are well settled, but there is considerable difficulty in the application of the law. It is the duty not only of Magistrates, but of every subject of the Queen, to prevent an unlawful assembly from taking place, if he can; but it is not always very easy to determine at what point an assembly previously lawful becomes an unlawful assembly. There are moments of excitement which, in some circumstances, may be overlooked, but the border line of danger to the peace is not always easy to discover, even by a calm and impartial onlooker. In matters of this sort there is always some difficulty as to the application of the law, and, for myself, I should always hesitate to attach blame to Magistrates whose intention was good and whose purpose was only to preserve the peace, and who were really persuaded that the peace was likely to be broken; and in this case it appears to me that the Magistrates did not wish to do more than to preserve the peace. So far as I can express an opinion on the facts, it appears to me, however, that they exceeded their powers, and were wrong in the course which they took. Having said so much, I hope the hon. Member for Northampton will agree that there is no great constitutional principle imperilled by the events that occurred at Northampton. Certainly there is none that will be imperilled by any action or word of mine. I hope I have expressed with sufficient fulness my view of the law of public meeting, and I do not think I am called upon to express any further opinion upon the action of the Magistrates. I trust the hon. Member for Northampton will be satisfied.

(6.7.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I am very glad the Home Secretary has expressed, and I am sure he has with sufficient clearness, his view in reference to this transaction. He has said the proclamation was not justified by law. I cannot agree with him, however, in the belief that there is no great constitutional question raised by this Debate. I think there is. I have no desire to impute any evil motives, or other than good motives, to the Magistrates in this matter, but they have gravely misapprehended the law, there is no doubt. Up to 1882 a different impression prevailed as to the administration of the law by Magistrates acting on the advice of the Home Office, and perhaps, as the matter came under my personal administration, I may refer to this, though, as I have not had the opportunity to refresh my recollection, the House will accept my apology if I am not absolutely accurate in all particulars. In former times it was a moot point whether a meeting prima facie and ab initio lawful could not subsequently be rendered unlawful through the action of people who proposed to disturb it. The point, however, has been set at rest for ever by the decision in the Basingstoke case. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Home Office has no control over the Magistrates in boroughs or counties. This must be understood, for it is the essence of our government that the Executive does not control the Magistrates, and the great complaint of the administration in Ireland is that they do. The independence of the Magistrates of the Secretary of State is to be borne in mind. Though the Magisterial Authorities are not bound to accept the declaration of the Home Office, they are very much disposed to follow the advice which the Home Secretary is in a position to give. Very often, in former times, Magistrates, finding themselves in a difficulty, used to consult the Home Office, and the Home Office consulted the Law officers. For a good many years before I had to do with these matters, Law officers had expressed the opinion that if a breach of the peace was threatened by a counter meeting, then the Magistrates could prevent both meetings. This opinion was acted upon in many instances, for instance, in Liverpool, when there were Orange processions and counter Catholic processions organised, also in Glasgow and elsewhere. Successive Home Secretaries had advised Magistrates so to act. I was consulted by the Basingstoke Magistrates. At Basingstoke, it will be remembered, the Salvationists used to hold meetings every Sunday, and they were attacked by the Skeleton Army, who were practically publicans. The Magistrates of Basingstoke, who had an insufficient number of police at their disposal, consulted the Home Office. This is my recollection of what took place years ago, but the House must take it cum grano salis. I gave the advice formerly given to Liverpool, Glasgow, and other places. In these circumstances, the question arose whether the meetings of the Salvationists were lawful; and in June, 1882, in the case of "Beatty v. Gillbank," the Court held that the course taken in prohibiting the Salvationists' meetings was not justified by law, and that an assembly lawful in itself did not become unlawful because it was likely to be attacked and interfered with. Since that decision, there has been no further doubt as to the law. I remember at that time I thought it was rather inconvenient, as these difficulties were likely to arise in many places, and, if I recollect right, we sent down a force to protect the original meeting against attack. The law, however, was settled beyond doubt, and I hope, after this Debate, the point will not have to be raised again. I attribute nothing to the Magistrates, except a want of clear understanding of the laws laid down. I do not understand what was the ground of the Magistrates' alarm at Northampton. I am reminded of the story of the man on board ship, who, when a breeze sprang up, asked the captain if there was any fear, and received the reply, "Yes, a great deal of fear, but no danger." If the Publican Party and the Temperance Party agreed among themselves to discuss this matter there was no reason in that why the Magistrates should have apprehended a breach of the peace. There seems to have been an unfounded fear on the part of the Magistrates. This need not be discussed as a Party question; but I hope the discussion will make it clear to Magistrates that if a body of people call a lawful meeting it does not become unlawful because some other body choose to threaten to disturb it.

*(6.16.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): It is scarcely necessary for me to intervene at any length, because I am pleased to find myself for once in entire agreement with the right hon. Member for Derby. Before reminding the House that there was no need to make this a Party question the hon. Member for Northampton might have waited until there was some indication of an attempt to make it a Party question; and the only way in which it could be made such would be by suggesting that Her Majesty's Government, or the Home Secretary, were in some way responsible for this act of the local Magistrates. There is, however, no ground for the suggestion that, either directly or indirectly, the Home Secretary or anyone representing the Government had anything to do with the meeting, or in any way endorsed what has been done. The interruptions of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. J. E. Ellis) seemed to indicate an idea that the Home Secretary was at fault because, on the spur of the moment, he was not prepared with more precise information, but this implies a control of the Home Office which does not exist. As to the state of the law, I understand, as I have formerly stated in the House, that for 40 years the law has been that a meeting called for an illegal purpose, or attempting or threatening to do illegal acts, or causing terror among, or giving reasonable grounds of terror to, persons in the neighbourhood, is an illegal meeting. The passage from the judgment of Mr. Justice Field is practically to the same effect. According to Hawkins's Pleas of the Crown, any meeting whatever of a great number of people, attended with such circumstances of terror as may endanger the public peace, or raise fears among the King's subjects, may truly be called an unlawful assembly. I do not know what may have led to the advice given at the time the right hon. Member for Derby was Home Secretary, but I entirely agree with the right hon. Gentleman's exposition of the law, that a lawful meeting does not become unlawful because certain persons express an intention of interfering with it. No ground such as that would make a meeting unlawful; and it is a mistake to be under any such apprehension. Nor does a meeting become unlawful because a Secretary of State, or a Magistrate, or a Public Authority thinks fit to call it so. It depends upon the character of the meeting; it depends upon the real facts of the case, and not upon the opinion of any one individual. In my opinion, taking the facts as stated by the senior Member for Northampton, the proclamation issued was an unlawful proclamation. There were no circumstances to justify the Magistrates in issuing such a proclamation. Whatever might have been their own view of the law, there were clearly no circumstances to justify the issuing of the proclamation.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I did state, quoting from a newspaper, that the Magistrates did have certain evidence submitted to them on affidavit or otherwise.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I have no information on that. But on the statement of the hon. Member for Northampton there was no justification for the issue of the proclamation. Somewhat unnecessarily the junior Member for Northampton introduced the question of there being some distinction in this matter between the law of England and that of Ireland. I know of no such distinction in the law [An hon. MEMBER: Or the practice]—nor in the practice. The law was correctly laid down by my right hon. Friend the Attorney General for Ireland, on the 9th of June in the present year, when he stated that hon. Members who thought otherwise must have in their minds the Crimes Act of 1882, and not the existing state of the law, and that under the present system of coercion, as it is styled, in Ireland the law of public meeting is absolutely identical with the law of public meeting in England. I wish simply to enter my protest against the argument used, which does not bear upon the action of the Northampton Magistrates.

(6.22.) MR DILLON (Mayo, E.): From an Irish point of view it is not to be regretted that this incident has arisen. I have no doubt the Northampton Magistrates in this instance have been led to adopt the course they have taken, and which is now condemned on both sides of the House, simply by studying the answers given in this House by the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and by noticing the fact that, across the water in Ireland, where so many things are so much better done than in this country, the law is held to be by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Executive that it is absolutely within the discretion of Magistrates to proclaim a meeting or not. The Northampton Magistrates naturally thought they were justified in prohibiting this meeting, and possibly expected the same degree of support from the Home Secretary as the Magistrates of Ireland receive from the Chief Secretary. Therefore, I think it is not at all a bad incident, both from the fact that it has given the people of this country a slight touch of what goes on in Ireland, and because it brings into high relief the contrast between the way in which Irish Members are met when they make complaint of arbitrary acts of this kind, and the tone and temper with which similar complaints are met when they are raised in respect to Magistrates in England, who are independent of the Executive, by an English Member. I have no doubt, and never had a doubt, notwithstanding the sneer of the Attorney General that the law in Ireland is exactly the same as the law in England, with regard to this matter. I have no intention of transgressing the Rules of Order by referring to the state of things in Ireland, but as the Attorney General introduced the question I may be allowed to say that what we complain of is not the law but the administration of the law. What we complain of is that we do not get the benefit of the law in Ireland, whereas in this country, from the tone of the Home Secretary and the Attorney General, it is extremely likely that English people will not again very soon be treated in this manner. At the same time, in referring to what has occurred at Northampton, I feel bound to say that I do not take the same roseate view of the situation as right hon. Gentlemen opposite. They gladly welcomed the appeal of the hon. Member for Northampton not to treat this as a Party question, but, although I have not been in Northampton recently, and am not acquainted with local details, I cannot think there is a total want of connection between the fact that the borough Magistrates are supporters of the Government and the fact that the meeting was to be held in opposition to Government policy, and upon what is an extremely sore point to the Government. I must say I think the hon. Member for Northampton has done good public service in bringing this matter under the notice of the House when we consider that it may not be an isolated act, but part of a policy; for did we not see in this Metropolis determined efforts made to break up the procession, and put obstacles in the way of the meeting held in Hyde Park about a fortnight ago, and the same thing, as I am informed, has been done on other occasions. I consider it as part of a policy, an attempt, at a very great distance, and in a feeble way, to imitate the policy of the Irish Executive, by using the power of the Executive in favour of one Party, and in trying to prevent a public expression of opinion against the Government policy, and I think right hon. Gentlemen will find that by the attempt to introduce the methods of Ireland into this country they will not assist their Party and smooth the passage of their Bill in this House. It seems to me a strong and instructive illustration of the truth of the old adage, "Evil communications corrupt good manners." It will be found impossible to carry on a system of persistent repression of public meeting in Ireland and persistent suppression of the right of free speech there without affording people in authority in this country the temptation to meet popular excitement here in times of political crisis by a similar evil action.

(6.30.) MR. LABOUCHERE: As my object in moving the Motion has been entirely fulfilled, I now ask leave to withdraw the Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

LOCAL TAXATION (CUSTOMS AND EXCISE) DUTIES BILL.—(No. 244.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): Mr. Speaker, before we proceed to enter upon the Orders of the Day I think it only right to refer briefly to the very grave and important observations which fell from you a few minutes ago in answer to the hon. and learned Member for Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy). Sir, we cannot be indifferent to any expression of opinion which falls from the Chair on matters of constitutional importance, especially when such opinion is expressed for the guidance and information of the House. It will be the duty of the Government most carefully to consider the observations which fell from you, Sir, in answer to the questions addressed to you; and, in order that we may have time to do so, we do not propose to proceed with the consideration of this Bill this evening. On Thursday I propose to state to the House the course which the Government will take with regard to those provisions of the Bill to which your attention was drawn this evening.

Committee deferred till Thursday.

HOUSING OF THE WORKING CLASSES ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 284.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's), rising amid cheers, said: I hope I may interpret that cheer as indicative of a general acceptance of the measure of which I am about to move the Second Reading. I do not think that any lengthy recommendation will be necessary of a Bill dealing with the amendment of the law relating to the housing of the working classes. There is a general consensus of opinion that the amendment and consolidation of the law with reference to the housing of the working classes is required, and there is no doubt that a considerable complication of the law on this important subject exists. Even if the law itself were in a satisfactory condition, the fact that the law can only be discovered after a careful study of many Statutes would be a sufficient justification for the Government to undertake the consolidation of the law. The next Bill on the Paper is the Housing of the Working Classes Acts Consolidation Bill, and the Government might have contented themselves with the consolidation of the law, leaving its amendment to be dealt with afterwards. There is much to be said from that point of view; but, on the other hand, most hon. Members will admit that it is much more satisfactory for the Government to present an Amendment Bill at the same time as a Consolidation Bill. If the House gives its assent to the Second Reading of the two Bills, then the most convenient mode of dealing with the question would be to refer both Bills to a Grand Committee, with the instruction that they should be consolidated at once. Looking to the fact that the law is complicated, and to the technical nature of the discussion which will be raised, the machinery of a Grand Committee would be much better adapted to deal with the Bills than a Committee of the whole House. A number of hon. Members specially interested in the matter will be placed on the Committee. I think there is a general concurrence of opinion that the existing law is most difficult, complicated, and obscure, and, if for no other purpose, it is urgently required that the procedure under the Acts now in force should be greatly simplified. To show this I will indicate the mode of procedure under Torrens's Acts from 1868 to 1885, and the procedure proposed by the Bill before the House. Under the former Acts the Medical Officer of Health reported to the Local Authorities if he considered any premises dangerous to health and unfit for human habitation. This Report was referred to the surveyor or engineer, who, in his turn, reported as to the cause of the evil and the remedy for it, and as to whether or not it was possible to put the premises into a fit condition for human habitation. Copies of both Reports had to be laid before the owner of the premises, who might object before the Local Authorities. Supposing the objections were overruled, there was an appeal from the Local Authority to Quarter Sessions, and if the decision there were in accordance with the decision of the Local Authorities, plans and specifications of all the work suggested by the Medical Officer and the surveyor or engineer had to be prepared; and then, again, the owner was allowed to raise objections before the Local Authorities and Quarter Sessions. It is evident that all this machinery has the effect of enormously delaying any action with regard to unhealthy dwellings, and provides a loophole through which many owners of insanitary dwellings escape. It cannot, therefore, be wondered at that the Acts existing are, to a large extent, inoperative. The Bill proposes a much simpler method of procedure. It is made an absolute duty of the Medical Officer of Health to report to the Local Authorities any premises injurious to health and unfit for human habitation; and it is also made the absolute duty of the Local Authorities to order proper periodical surveys to be made of their district, with the view of seeing that the Medical Officer of Health fulfils his duty. In explicit terms the Bill imposes upon the Local Authorities the duty of seeing that there are no unhealthy dwellings in their localities. When it is ascertained that there are dwellings unfit for human habitation, there will arise under the Bill no question of the interference of surveyors, or of the provision by the Local Authorities of plans and specifications of what is wanted to put the premises into repair. The Bill assumes that the owner is wholly responsible, and if the house is declared to be injurious to health and not properly habitable, the owner is bound to find out himself what is to be done, and to do it within a limited time. If the repairs are not undertaken within this limited time, the house may be demolished. Another question dealt with by the Bill is that of obstructive buildings. Some doubt has arisen as to the meaning of the words "obstructive building" in the Artisans' Dwellings Act of 1882. The Bill before the House considerably extends the meaning of the words, and further, gives powers for the forming of schemes which will be intermediate between the larger schemes of the Cross Acts and the smaller schemes of the Torrens Acts. Many areas are not large enough to be dealt with by the Cross Acts, and are too large to be dealt with under Torrens's Acts. The Bill proposes that a Local Authority, when buildings have been declared unfit for human habitation or obstructive, may proceed to take measures, not only for dealing with the obstructive buildings, but to make a scheme taking in some of the surrounding dwellings with the view of the clearing away of courts and alleys, and bringing light and air into the localities so as to make them more fit for human habitation than would be otherwise possible. There is a point in the Bill which I think will render it peculiarly acceptable to hon. Gentlemen who represent London constituencies. Great complaints have been made of the unwillingness of Vestries and District Boards of Works to put in force the law with regard to dwellings of this character. I do not think it necessary either to condemn or defend the action of such bodies, but in a town like London every district is interested in the good health of every other district, and the Central Authority ought to have the power to act if they are satisfied that the Local Authorities are neglecting their duty. Therefore, where it is shown to the London County Council that Local Authorities are neglecting to deal with unhealthy areas within their localities, the County Council will have power to take over the duties of the Local Authority. This power has been asked for by the London County Council for good and sufficient reason, as I think, and we are glad to take advantage of the existence of a body representing the whole of the inhabitants of London and to charge them with this particular duty in connection with the various areas which constitute the Metropolis. The Government have also endeavoured to deal with the question of compensation in the Bill. A good many efforts have been made to reduce the amount payable to owners of property which is to be removed because of its unhealthy condition, and I venture to think there is not a Member in the House who will not welcome any fair and reasonable scheme which will cut down to a minimum the money payable to owners of property who grossly neglect their duty in regard to their property. Of course, I draw a wide distinction between this kind of property and houses taken, not because they are in an unsanitary condition, but because they are required in order to make other parts of the district inhabitable. I will, of course, give every reasonable consideration to the case of owners whose property may be required for the improvement of a locality, but I will have no mercy on those owners who allow their property to get into such a condition as to be a danger to the health of a locality. By Clause 15 it is provided with regard to compensation that the arbitrator is to take evidence on three points, first, as to whether the rental of the premises has been enhanced by reason of their being so overcrowded as to be dangerous or injurious to the health of the inmates; secondly, as to whether the premises are in a state of defective sanitation or are not in reasonably good repair; and, thirdly, whether the premises are unfit and not reasonably capable of being made fit for human habitation. I think it will be found that the Government have gone as far as they possibly can in drawing a line in regard to the question of compensation, but I may add that if hon. Members can suggest additional words which will better carry out this object we shall be prepared to accept them. We have also made some provision with the view of reducing the cost of arbitration, and we further provide for the payment to tenants of a reasonable sum, with a view of enabling them the better to obey the order to remove from the condemned and unsanitary premises. We have also thought it right to impose penalties on owners who take part in deliberations with regard to premises in which they are interested. It is, undoubtedly, a great scandal that men should be allowed to decide questions of the kind in such circumstances. I think I have said enough to show that the Government have approached this subject with a view to simplifying and insuring the operation of the law, and I hope the House will reasonably consider the proposal to refer the Bill to a Grand Committee. In this way we hope to make the law more operative, and to take precaution that, as far as London, at any rate, is concerned, the Local Authorities shall be made to do their duty by empowering the higher authority to step in where the Local Authority is in fault. I beg, Sir, to move the Second Reading of this Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Ritchie.)

*(6.55.) SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I have to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on the introduction of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman has said that the law is difficult, complicated, and obscure, but, what is worse than all, the law is practically inoperative. The evil which arises from the defects in the law affects not only great communities like London, but also rural districts. I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman proposes to amend the law as well as to consolidate it. But I think it is to be regretted that this Government, who have been wasting the time of the House in the consideration of the question of the endowment of public houses, should not have earlier brought before the House a Bill which is likely to be of so much more advantage to the community at large. The proposal of the right hon. Gentleman to refer the Bill to a Grand Committee appears to be the quickest way of getting the Bill forward at this period of the Session. I do not think the Bill ought to stop at the demolition of unhealthy houses. There ought to be some provision in the Bill to force the owners to put up other houses, as I think people ought not to be driven from the districts in which they live. This is especially necessary in rural districts, because it is most undesirable that people should be driven from rural districts into the already over crowded towns. We want to keep them in the country. There ought to be some power compelling the owner where insanitary houses are demolished, to put up other houses in their place, in order to keep the people in the same locality; and I am sorry to see that the clause for the demolition of insanitary houses is not accompanied by some such provision. In some cases the owners of these bad houses prefer to see them demolished, because they say it will not pay them to repair. If cottages are reported to be unfit for human habitation, it should be the duty of the Local Authority to order the building of proper dwellings, either at the public cost or at the expense of the owner. The sum of £350,000 has been mentioned very often of late in this House, and there seems to be considerable difficulty in disposing of it. I would suggest to the Government that they could hardly do a more popular thing than to make it the nucleus of a fund for the better housing of the poorer people in the rural districts as well as in the towns. With regard to obstructive buildings, I think the Government are taking a wise and beneficial course in asking for power to remove obstructions; in most cases, the obstructions are not to be got rid of by little peddling and tinkering arrangements such as have had to be resorted to in the past. The proposal of the Government will be very valuable in decreasing the mortality of the districts in which it is applied. It will enable the authorities to deal with blocks of insanitary dwellings—rookeries as they are called, and which are the centres from which disease spreads. In the crowded parts of the Metropolis, and of other large towns, the mortality is considerably greater than in the parts of towns where there are more open spaces. What we want for the benefit of the younger growing population are open spaces. We want playgrounds for the children nearer the blocks of buildings in which they dwell. Under such a scheme as sketched out in a few words by the right hon. Gentleman a great and salutary reform might be effected in this direction. I hope in the discussion of this Bill in Grand Committee other points may be incorporated which will make this a great measure for the well-being and sanitary improvement of the condition of the people.

(7.2.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby):

I wish to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on the serene atmosphere in which we find ourselves on this Bill. We are really like storm-tossed wayfarers, struggling through clouds and darkness, and thunder and lightning, and, at last mounting the hill, finding ourselves under the blue sky. Of course, we shall do what we can to assist the right hon. Gentleman to carry this Bill, and, if it needs improvement, to improve it. This and similar measures are useful Bills to occupy the attention of the House of Commons and of the country, and I would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that he should give the preference in what remains of the Session to measures of this character rather than to those of a more controversial nature. I have no objection to controversy myself; I rather like it. But there are times for all things, and the month of July being a hot month is not suited to controversy. When you want to have highly controversial measures it is more convenient to take them in the early part of the Session. Therefore, I hope the Government, in the re-consideration of their position, will remember that besides this there are other measures which are not of a controversial character, but largely beneficial to the country, to which they might devote their energies. That is a course I have long advised. There seems a favourable opportunity of taking that course, and I hope it will be pursued. I have nothing to say upon this Bill except to give my assent to the proposal it makes. I do not imagine that it raises any great conflict of opinion. It is a subject upon which many Gentlemen on both sides of the House have had large experience, having taken great interest in it for many years. They may be able to offer the Government assistance and suggestions of various kinds, and which I have no doubt will be gladly accepted. In that manner I hope a most useful measure will be passed that will be of benefit to all classes of the community.

(7.10.) SIR R. LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): Sir, I desire to join the two right hon. and hon. Gentlemen who have just addressed the House, in congratulating the Government and my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board in particular, on the Bill which he has introduced with so much ability and clearness. Though the Bill interests all classes of the community, it is especially interesting to Metropolitan Members. There is no part of the country, I suppose, which will derive greater benefit from this measure than will London, where there are "rookeries," the unsanitary condition of which is such that the people living in them have no fair chance of thriving. I join with the hon. Member opposite in especially calling the attention of the Government to the importance of providing under this Bill for the establishment of open spaces or playgrounds for the children of the poor in the more crowded parts of the Metropolis. That is a question which has long attracted the attention of all who live in the Metropolis and who care for the well-being of the people in it. I would venture to suggest to my right hon. Friend that it would be well, for the purpose of elaborating the provisions of the Bill in this and any other particular, if he would consent, whenever this Bill comes to be referred to the Standing Committee on Law, to add to the Committee some of those Metropolitan Members who are especially interested in this question.

*(7.15.) EARL COMPTON (York, W. R., Barnsley): I should like to say, on behalf of the London County Council, of the Housing of the Poor Committee of which I am Chairman, that we welcome the action of Her Majesty's Government with regard to this question. I daresay the House is not aware that the County Council, after due deliberation, approached Her Majesty's Government, and placed before the Home Secretary their views with regard to Torrens' Act. They were received, and their arguments were listened to, and, so far as I can judge, the suggestions then made have been adopted and put into the Bill. Therefore, I wish to express thanks, on behalf of the County Council, for the action taken by Her Majesty's Government. It must be evident to those who have studied the question of dwellings for the poorer classes in London and throughout the country that there exists a kind of chaos in the law which cannot be described. I am well aware that it is usual to complain that the Vestries and Local Authorities have neglected their duty, and that that is the reason why this question has become a burning one. Although I have taken some part in the abuse of certain Vestries and Local Authorities, I have never held them up to public censure, for I cannot blame them for not understanding the very complex law on the subject. I am extremely glad that this Bill is going to be submitted to the Standing Committee on Law. It is much the best plan the Government can pursue, and both the Amendment Bill and the Consolidation Bill should be before that Committee. It would be extremely difficult for the Committee to incorporate the Amendment Bill into the Consolidation Bill until the Amendment Bill has been passed by the House.

*MR. RITCHIE: I have prepared the Consolidation Bill, which will be submitted to the Committee with the Amendments in the Amendment Bill included. The Grand Committee will first have the Amendment Bill, and then it will have the Consolidation Bill.

*EARL COMPTON: I think that will be an excellent plan; but I would point out that until the Amendment Bill is passed, I do not see any particular necessity for passing the Consolidation Bill even this Session. Until we are quite satisfied as to the Amendment Bill, I do not think it would be practicable to pass the Consolidation Bill. The effect of the Amendment Bill is practically to amend Torrens' Act. It does not touch Cross's Act at all. Torrens' Act has been left rather on one side for a long time. The reason of that was that the Local Authorities in trying to enforce it found difficulties. Appeals were carried against them, and nothing was done, and the Act has been more or less a dead letter. I am personally of opinion, having looked into this question, that if we can get this Amendment Bill slightly altered, we shall be able to deal with every small unsanitary area throughout the whole of London within a short space of time. The right hon. Gentleman alluded to the subject of appeal to Quarter Sessions, and that was one of the subjects brought before the Home Secretary, and it will have to be decided in Grand Committee. In my opinion, the appeal should be to the County Councils, and not to Quarter Sessions, and when the County Council is the Local Authority under the Act, that appeal should be to the Local Government Board. But the important part of this Bill is Clause 2, as to buildings unfit for human habitation. One of the most difficult questions medical officers have to deal with is the definition of the phrase "unfit for human habitation." They have, first of all, to obtain proof that there had been fever or death before they can condemn a building. What I would suggest as a more convenient definition is "unhealthy dwelling." I noticed that that phrase was used by the right hon. Gentleman throughout his speech.

*MR. RITCHIE: That will appear in the Sanitary Law Amendment Bill. The Consolidation Bill and the Amendment Bill will also have some similar definition.

*EARL COMPTON: I hope the right hon. Gentleman will bring forward the Sanitary Law Amendment Bill as soon as possible, and that he will pass it this Session. I am sure the House will be glad to have it so; but Amendments will be required in this Act under discussion, in order to include dwellings which are, or are liable to be, injurious to health. I see, with regard to the Medical Officer of Health, the words allude to the Medical Officer of Health of the district. I think it would be advisable, for London, that "Medical Officer" should mean either the Medical Officer of the County Council or of the district. I wish to point out that this will not be a final solution of the housing of the poorer classes of the Metropolis. I agree that the Bill is a step, and a valuable step, forward, and that it will do an enormous amount of good that has been sought for years past. I am glad to hear the decided views of the right hon. Gentlemen with regard to offenders, not only those who have made a profit out of the poorer classes of property, but the landlords. There are landlords who look well after their tenants in villages, but who neglect their property in London and the large towns. I should be glad if we could bring home to these landlords the enormity of their sin and the evil which they have inflicted upon the poorer classes. I do not wish such offenders to be merely fined. I should like to see one of them imprisoned for three or four weeks, for one of the greatest sins a responsible man can be guilty of. I again thank the right hon. Gentleman for having brought in this Bill.

*(7.20.) MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): Sir, I noted that the noble Lord said he wished to lock up the unfortunate landlord.

*EARL COMPTON: Not unfortunate.

*MR. BARTLEY: Fortunate, then; though they would not be very fortunate if they were locked up. No doubt some of these men are trading on the misery of the people—are crowding them into unhealthy dwellings and are making large profits. But those who have studied the habits of many of the poorer classes must know that a large amount of the unsanitary condition of the houses they occupy is due to a want of education and knowledge amongst the people themselves. What I am afraid of is that if it goes forth to the world that the responsibility will rest solely with the landlord, you will really, to a certain extent, undermine the interest and personal action of the tenant in respect of maintaining healthy conditions of living. It is difficult to induce these persons to make use of sanitary appliances in the best possible manner. I remember going over a block of property and finding that not only had the sanitary appliances not been made use of, but had been disarranged and put out of order. What I am afraid of is that if you make the penalty on the landlord too severe you destroy the active interest of the tenants in their surroundings. I believe in many parts of London the present state of affairs is most unsatisfactory, notwithstanding the enormous strides of the past few years. But what I wish to point out is that, after all, the sanitary condition of the people depends not entirely on the action of the landlords, nor of persons who are described as house farmers, but also upon the better education of the people, and upon their improved ideas. I should be extremely sorry if any legislation sought to impose the sole responsibility upon the landlord. We should do our utmost to induce the people themselves to improve their sanitary condition, and so elevate their mode of living.

*(7.25.) MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.) : Sir, the London Liberal Members, of whom I am one, will not pass this Bill altogether without Amendment, though we think it is more than might have been expected from the right hon. Gentleman, who used to think that everything turned upon vices in administration. We think the Bill will be a useful step in social reform. We hope that it will be amended after discussion in Committee. I suppose arrangements will be made whereby in Committee Metropolitan Members will have an opportunity of making suggestions. On that understanding we are thoroughly in favour of the Second Reading of the Bill. We hope in Committee we shall have the attendance of a certain number of lawyers on both sides of the House, because I do think a great improvement could be effected by a simplification of the procedure under the different Acts for the housing of the working classes. My hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries, has made a suggestion which would be valuable if incorporated in the Bill. It is notorious that bye-laws have not been framed under the Sanitary Act of 1866 in many parishes and divisions of the Metropolis. I do not think in this Bill there is any provision as to that point. I do not think the County Council obtains, under Clause 6, powers to make the Local Authority draw up bye-laws under the Sanitary Act. That would naturally come into the Sanitary Law Amendment Bill, and, therefore, it is most important that the Committee should have all these Bills before them at the same time. Nobody recognises more than we do the immense importance of uniformity of administration and unity of control in London. That is what we are wanting. The County Council has hardly been able to do anything for want of power; they have no power to give their Medical Officer of Health, one of the ablest throughout the length and breadth of the land, the supervision over Local Authorities which he demands. I believe a good deal could be done in this Bill to reduce the cost of action. Something would be accomplished if this clause passed into law, to which the right hon. Gentleman alluded and which would prevent some scandals in the administration of the Artisans' Dwellings Act. Still, that would not be sufficient. I can conceive other cases than those enumerated in the clause. I will point out one—it does not contemplate the increased profit to be made by using a house for immoral purposes. There are a great many cases in London which do not fall under the present law, and in which, when the property-owner is bought out, he puts in his pocket money which does not properly belong to him. I hope we shall have no repetition of cases like that of the black spot in Whitechapel, where it was impossible to buy out the owners in consequence of the enormous sums they were able to make because they were putting illicit gains into their pockets. I admit it would be difficult to insert words that would exactly meet these cases; but I think that, with the assistance of the legal ability that will probably be represented on the Committee, we ought to be able to reduce the costs, which is really the great point at issue. The Local Authority will not move as long as they find that 50 per cent. of their expenditure is thrown away, or, worse, goes into the pockets of the owners of unsanitary or evil property of some kind or other. I quite sympathise with some of the District Boards in London, in their unwillingness to do so, though I admit they have shown lamentable apathy in some cases. I believe the Mansion House Council will be prepared to submit to any Committee a good many valuable suggestions, and I have no doubt, considering the valuable work done in the Metropolis, such suggestions will receive due attention. I do not fancy any provision of the Bill will do more good than that which prevents members of Local Boards voting on those bodies when their interests are at stake. I think it may be difficult to carry it out; but it is conceived in the right spirit, and will, I hope, prevent some of those disgraceful scenes which have taken place both in the Metropolis and in the country. I would suggest that all the Bills should be submitted to the Grand Committee, and that, at the same time, there should be a fair representation of the London Members on the Committee. I would particularly urge that my noble Friend (Earl Compton), who can represent the London County Council in this matter as no other man can, inasmuch as he is the Chairman of the Housing of the Working Classes Committee and should have a place on the Committee. I join in the congratulation which has been offered to the Government, and I do hope that, when these Bills come back to us from the Committee, we shall have some opportunity of carrying them through their final stages.

(7.34.) Mr. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I am delighted these Bills have been introduced, and I am glad to fall in with the arrangement that they should be referred to a Grand Committee. The Consolidation Bill must necessarily be of great utility to all those who have studied this question. Those who are interested in the subject have hitherto had to ramble over a series of Statutes, extending back for 40 years, and many of them overlapping one another, so that it has been very difficult to ascertain what the law on the question really is. Consolidation, however, is not all that is required, and we are pleased to receive the Amendment Bill. I agree with a great deal that is to be found in this Bill, and especially in the part which deals with those persons who have allowed their property to get into an unsanitary condition. For my part, I do not want to subject to penalties landlords who have attempted to do justice to their tenants and whose tenants have neglected the sanitary condition of their houses. The men we want to get at are those who obtain large portions of property in the Metropolis, and simply neglect to do any repairs whatever, having only one object in view, namely, to extract the highest rent they can out of the unfortunate individuals who are compelled to inhabit the houses because they happen to be near their places of employment. These Bills do not do all that is required, and, whilst we accept them as a very good instalment of what is required, we must guard ourselves against any supposition that they do all we think necessary to meet the difficulties of the question of the better housing of the people in the Metropolis. If you want to grapple with the question in a broad and general manner, you must find some means of getting the necessary finance to carry out the improvements, and I do not think it can be done by throwing any more burdens on the unfortunate ratepayers. You must find other sources of revenue. No measure can comprehensively meet the requirements of the case that does not tap sources of revenue that are untapped at the present time—I mean, of course, by dividing rates between owner and occupier and making the owner pay some of the rates for this particular purpose. The hon. Member for North Kensington (Sir R. Lethbridge) made a suggestion as to the provision of playgrounds for new buildings. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ritchie) whether something cannot be done in the case of huge blocks of dwellings for providing playgrounds, other than the concrete playground that is generally just a mere forecourt. I have gone over many of these dwellings on a hot summer evening, and have been able to see the unfortunate position in which the people are placed. There is nothing but bricks, and mortar, and concrete, without a bit of green to relieve the eye except such as may have been provided by the people themselves in the shape of window gardening. I think that, wherever these barracks are erected, the companies who erect them ought to be called on to provide something in the way of playgrounds. A man when he comes home has no where outside his house where he can sit in the hot weather, and he is, therefore, driven elsewhere to seek rest and comfort. There is a great moral feature in this question; and I would submit to the right hon. Gentleman that he should make provision for dealing with it on the Grand Committee. But, under any circumstances, I think we should all desire to make the measure as perfect as possible.

*(7.42.) Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): This is about the most satisfactory Bill that the Government have introduced this Session, it is gratifying that Members on all sides are able cordially to support it. We, on this side, are especially able to do so, as the Bill embodies many points that we have consistently urged. It will affect London infinitely more than any other part of the United Kingdom, and therefore I strongly support the suggestion that London Members on both sides should be fully represented on the Grand Committee. The hon. Member for the Ilkeston Division (Sir W. Foster) regarded the measure from a country point of view, and expressed a fear that by bringing about the demolition of working men's cottages in our villages a large part of our rural population would be driven into the towns. There are, however, provisions in the Bill, as I understand it, which enable the Local Authorities to exercise their discretion in the matter of erecting new working men's dwellings when unsanitary ones are demolished. Therefore, from a London point of view, we not only cordially support this Bill as improving the dwellings of the working classes in London itself, but we also cordially endorse it because we believe it will tend to keep the agricultural population in the country districts instead of driving them into the towns, where their presence has a tendency to bring about overcrowding and a reduction of wages. The principle of the Bill is to give greater power to representative County Councils, as well as to throw greater obligations on them—and I may say it was gratifying to hear the words of cordial appreciation in which the right hon. Gentleman spoke of the work the London County Council has already done in this matter of housing. He can rely upon it that when the opportunity arises, they will do a great deal more in the same direction. We hear a great deal said in disparagement of the London County Council, and constant protests raised against adding to its duties, so that we were glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman's expressions of approval, and his declaration that larger powers should be conferred upon them in the future. One of the chief advantages of this Bill is that it will do a great deal to improve the dwellings of the working classes and to get rid of unsanitary dwellings. It will also impose a penalty on Vestrymen who vote in respect of those questions in which they have a personal or pecuniary interest. I think it is high time that such men should be entirely prohibited from taking any part in the discussion and settlement of these questions. In addition to those points, there is the great and vital question of compensation—a question of "compensation" on which the Opposition can, at least on this occasion, agree with the right hon. Gentleman. This Bill goes farther on this point than any other measure has ever gone. In future, where compensation has to be paid, it will only be assessed and paid on what ought to be the normal rent of the dwelling, and not on the excessive rent obtained through overcrowding. But I agree with my noble Friend (Lord Compton) that this Bill cannot be in any way regarded as a final settlement of the question, because, in addition to compensation, there arises the important question who is to pay when compensation is given. The Bill, indeed, raises, without attempting to settle, the question of the incidence of taxation in reference to the ground landlords and others interested in property in London. So far as the Bill goes, we thank the President of the Local Government Board for it, and we consider that we shall be in a better position to 'urge our views on the subject of the incidence of taxation, now that these minor questions will have been cleared out of the way.

*(749.) CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks., N.): I have very great fear, lest this Bill, which is evidently intended to be productive of great good, should in the rural districts be fruitless. I am sure, if that proves to be the case, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board will regret it as much as we shall. There is no authority in those districts behind the Sanitary Authority—no power to compel the Sanitary Authority to put their powers into execution. In the case of the Allotments Bill power was given to the Sanitary Authority, who did not put it into operation, and the right hon. Gentleman was obliged to bring in an amending Bill to give an appeal to the County Councils. Well, I will ask the right hon. Gentleman to insert in this Bill a power to enable the County Councils to put pressure on the Local Sanitary Authority if it neglects its work. In our rural districts this is a great question. In Buckinghamshire, for instance, I know of a case where a man and wife and their five children are living in a two-roomed cottage, and the reply made to every attempt to remove them, both by the Local Authority and the Magistrates is, they have nowhere else to go to. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman, in view of such cases as these to give the County Councils power to require the Local Authority to take action. Then it sometimes happens that the members of the Sanitary Authority are the owners of houses in a disgraceful condition, and, of course, in such a case the Local Authority does not wish to put its powers into force. I know of a case of this kind—I think in Winslow—where the owner of houses which have been reported on again and again is the Chairman of the Sanitary Authority, and under one pretext or another the matter has always been allowed to slide. I would urge the right hon. Gentleman, therefore, to see that someone who is interested in the condition of the labouring classes in our rural districts is put on the Committee to whom this Bill is to be referred.

(7.55.) MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I certainly sympathise with the wish expressed by the hon. and gallant Member who has just sat down, that the country districts should be adequately represented on the Committee to whom the Bill is referred. I, of course, am a Metropolitan Member, and regard the matter from a Metropolitan point of view. Without dwelling on the circumstances under which a Bill detested by the working classes has given place to this measure, which will so considerably advance their interests, I will deal with the plan of the Government itself. I consider that enormous advantage will result from the consolidation of these Acts, and as to the amending portion of the proposal, though I regard it with some satisfaction, my satisfaction is dashed by the fact that the Bill does not contain all it should. The Bill contains some excellent proposals—some being identical with the proposals contained in the Bill produced by the Liberal Members for London. I am glad that the Bill contains proposals dealing with the important point of compensation, because, after all, the question of finance is the key of the position. The main difficulty which has been felt in carrying out the Artisans' Dwellings Act has been the cost incurred, and in the community being required to pay a most exorbitant price for the property necessary to be acquired. I remember that the right hon. Member for West Birmingham a few years ago made investigations into a large number of clearances in various towns, involving an aggregate expenditure of between £2,000,000 and £3,000,000. The right hon. Gentleman found that, with regard to the cost of the property so acquired, the community had paid no less than 17s. per square yard, whereas it was calculated that the real commercial value of the property was only 10s. per square yard. But cases have occurred in the Metropolis in which large and exorbitant prices had been paid for property which had substantially become public nuisances. In one case, that of the Bell Lane area in Whitechapel, the Committee of the County Council recently reported as established to their satisfaction, beyond a doubt, that some owners had deliberately allowed their property to go to rack and ruin in the hope that it would be purchased by the community under these Acts. I rejoice, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman has recognised these evils, and has endeavoured to remedy them. But he has not gone far enough. There is an important omission in the Bill—the failure to alter the incidence of the cost. Parliament has gone as far as it reasonably can in piling up rates on the occupier, and the right hon. Gentleman ought to have taken steps, where large blocks are concerned, to see that the burden is shared by the owner. While joining in the chorus of congratulation which has been offered to the right hon. Gentleman, I hope that the Grand Committee to which the Bill is to be referred will carry the reforms much further than is proposed in the Bill.

(8.0.) MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I must express my gratification at the introduction of this Consolidation Bill. One of the reasons why the Acts have not been put in operation in various parts of the country is the inability of the Local Authorities to construe them. The simplification of the law is in itself a great mending of the law, and there I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that we on this side of the House will do all we can to secure the passing of this Bill. There is one clause of the Bill to which attention has not yet been called; it is a clause of the very first importance, namely, Clause 18. I imagine there is a mis-print in the description of the clause. The marginal title is "Compensation to weekly tenants for expenses of removal." I am very happy to say there is not the same restriction in the clause itself, for the clause provides that if the house, or part of the house, of a tenant whose contract of tenancy is for, less than a year is required by the Local Authority a reasonable allowance on account of the expenses of removing may be made to the tenant. I think many persons will be grateful to the right hon. Gentleman and to the Government for bringing in a clause to prevent injury being done to persons who are forcibly as it were removed from their tenancies. Some hon. Members have referred to the difficulties of clearing the rookeries of London and other great towns. The difficulties in regard to such clearances have been very small indeed. Numerous areas have been cleared in London and in other towns within recent years. The difficulty has never been to clear the areas, but to provide other dwellings for the people. That is just the very point on which the right hon. Gentleman has done something and will do something to remedy the evils complained of. All the clauses are steps in the right direction. Some of my hon. Friends have referred to the fact that these proposals are only steps. I am not altogether dissatisfied with them as steps. So much will have to be done presently with regard to this question that it would be a false step on the part of the Government to attempt too much at the present time. Considering the size and population, we need some special arrangement with regard to the housing of the poor in London. One of the reasons why the Acts have not been carried out in the past is the condition of the leasehold system. The right hon. Gentleman could not deal with the leasehold system in this Bill with any chance of carrying his proposal this Session, and, therefore, I am content to see the leasehold question left over until a future Session, or possibly until a future Parliament. But, after all, I hope this Bill will be amended in some directions by the Committee to which it will be referred. I presume it will be perfectly competent for the Committee to extend the scope of the Bill, although I hope the Committee will not do any thing to prevent the possibility of the Bill becoming law. I welcome this as a step in the right direction, and will give the Bill every assistance, even though the passing of the Bill may give some kudos to Her Majesty's Government. (8.10.)

(8.39.) MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg) rose—

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

(8.42.) MR. WADDY: I desire, in the first instance, to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman upon having to pilot a Bill as to which he will not meet with that opposition or obstruction of which we have heard so many lamentations during the Session. I congratulate him upon a piece of useful legislation, which will commend itself to the House. The Bill has a very good and great object, and appears to be extremely well drawn; but I cannot help thinking there is one want in it, namely, a want of sufficient provision for the origination of complaints. In large towns, whenever there is a state of things that calls for remedy there is pretty sure to be a complaint, public comment, and application of remedy; but it frequently happens in the country that those who ought to be the first men to start an inquiry under the Acts are the very persons who are largely interested in the maintenance of the status in quo. Now, I venture to suggest that the arrangements which are made here, though desirable, so far as they go, are not quite sufficient. I am not going into anything of the nature of a clause criticism, but it will be observed that under the Bill, before the Local Authority can act, an official representation has to be made to them by their officer—a man who probably owes his position, in the way of personal and private practice, to the very people it would be his duty to attack. The Medical Officer of Health, who has to make an official representation as to the insanitary condition of any property, will probably have his most lucrative private practice among the people who may be the owners of the property over which he ought to exercise supervision, and which he might be called upon to condemn. There ought to be some provision for putting the law into operation whether the Medical Officer of Health does his duty or not.

*MR. RITCHIE: The hon. and learned Member will observe that under Clause 10 it is specially provided that the Report of the Medical Officer of Health for any county is to have the same effect in any district as the Report of the Medical Office of Health for that district.

MR. WADDY: I am fully aware of that, and, moreover, there is a subsequent provision with regard to anybody sending a Petition or representation, but I am very doubtful whether that will meet the case. I am not speaking in any spirit of antagonism to the provision, for I am extremely anxious that the Bill should go through and receive such improvements as may be desirable in Committee. I would point out that both the Medical Officer of the county and of the district, who may in many instances be the same person, are not quite sufficient. I am doubtful whether the Medical Officer of either district or county, singly or jointly, would be able to take the necessary action in some cases, and I would therefore suggest that there should be power to obtain a report from an independent person appointed by the Local Government Board to investigate all complaints and put the Act in motion. How far in the long run this may be found necessary I am not prepared to say, but it seems to me there is some little want in the Bill here with all its varied excellencies to ensure that where mischief exists it shall not escape notice and remedy. I wish the right hon. Gentleman good speed with his work, which, I am sure, will do a great deal more good sanitarily and morally than the extinguishing of a great number of licences.

*(848.) MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): There are a few questions I desire to ask, but first I wish to express my satisfaction, as a county Member, with the 13th clause, which, I understand, largely extends the powers of Rural Sanitary Authorities, and gets rid of two or three stages of procedure, and I wish to express still more strongly the satisfaction that all Members with only the most superficial acquaintance with the subject must feel at the compensation provisions in Clause 15. In relation to this clause I wish to ask a question. Its object is to prevent owners of unhealthy premises to make a profit out of allowing houses to fall into decay and become unfit for human habitation. I take that to be the pith of the clause. I notice that by the 32nd line of the 3rd schedule that the 4th section of the Act of 1885 is struck out, and the question I wish to ask is this. The 4th section of the Act of 1885 is the section which says that the owners of any premises who are required by the Local Authority under the Act of 1868 to execute any works or to demolish any premises shall cease to have the power to require the Local Authority to purchase such premises. I admit I have but a brief acquaintance with the Bill, but I should like to have an explanation whether the 15th clause does really cover all the cases as to which this 4th section of the Act of 1885 was directed, whether it absolutely bars owners from the power of forcing Local Authorities to purchase their premises. With regard to this Bill and also the Consolidation Bill, to which I understand the opening remarks of the right hon. Gentleman also had reference, I much regret that the Government have not seen their way to have a more complete clearing of the decks and more thorough-going legislation. The Rural Sanitary Authorities are, as a rule, disinclined to exercise the limited powers conferred upon them, and the complexity of the two Bills will furnish them with an excuse for inaction. The 7th section of the Act of 1885 declared the duty of Local Authorities to enforce all sanitary laws and put them in force as occasion arose, to secure the proper sanitary condition of premises within the area of their jurisdiction. But that Act became a dead letter in country districts from the fact that there was no proper power to compel Local Rural Sanitary Authorities, the Boards of Guardians, to carry out the sanitary powers they have. That is the cardinal defect of the whole of this class of legislation. The President of the Local Government Board may take credit for passing the Local Government Act of 1888, and I really think this question ought not to have been touched without bringing it within the sphere of the legislation of 1888, without investing County Councils with those sanitary powers with which it was sought to invest them under the original proposals of 1888. The right hon. Gentleman may remember that some of us made earnest protests against the withdrawal of the schedule, and offered to sit any length of time for the purpose of investing County Councils with control over unsanitary dwellings and unhealthy areas in the counties. I wish to insist as a County Member on the fundamental defect of this legislation, that we have these County Councils, the obvious authority standing over the Rural Sanitary Authorities, who might put the whole machinery in motion for making villages healthy and carrying out sanitary improvements, and yet these County Councils are excluded from taking action. There is one comment I would make both upon this Bill and the other Bill, which is not technically before the House. The first and second parts of the Consolidation Bill are of very great value; but it seems to me—I do not know how far it can be carried out—but it seems to me a great pity that the rural districts are excluded from those parts dealing with unhealthy areas and unhealthy premises. One further question I should like to ask. The Bill fixes the interest on loans at 4 per cent.; and I should like to know whether that conflicts with the power given under the Act of 1885 to the Public Loan Commissioners to lend money at £3 2s. 6d. per cent. No Bill of this kind can be satisfactory which does not supply, especially for rural districts, a better financial basis for carrying out a thorough programme of sanitation. It would be well if a substantial source of revenue could be set apart for this purpose. I should suggest that part of the Probate Duty or part of the Inhabited House Duty might well be applied to these purposes. While offering these criticisms, I express my thanks to the Government for what is done by Clauses 13 and 15 of the Bill.

(9.0.) MR. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): There is no desire in this part of the House among any of my Friends to continue discussion beyond the present point. I am very glad to see that, amid the clash of opposing interests and conflict of Party opinion, this House is able to deal with the conditions of life of the most miserable—the poorest—of our people. No doubt, as the right hon. Gentleman has said, this measure affects London in particular, and to an extent incomparably greater than the rest of the country. It affects the poorest of the people of London, and it deeply affects the social condition of England, and more particularly of the Metropolis. Everyone who knows anything of the conditions of the housing of the great masses of the population, and of the miserable and un-Christianlike condition of the masses of the population, must be impressed by the necessity that some action should be taken as soon as possible by this House to deal with the evil. I congratulate the President of the Local Government Board on the introduction of the Bill. But why does not the right hon. Gentleman go to the root of the matter, and give a right of action by the tenant against the landlord or owner of unsanitary property? Metropolitan Members on this side of the House have no desire to overload the Bill with Amendments. While we feel that it falls short of the necessities of the case, we believe that, as far as it goes, it may be made a useful measure. It will be our endeavour to assist the Government as far as we can in making it a useful and workable measure. There are two points, however, which, though they have been previously referred to, I wish to impress on the right hon. Gentleman. The first is that of re-erection, the provision of accommodation for those people who are turned out of unsanitary houses. One of the greatest difficulties in dealing with the question of unsanitary dwellings has arisen through the failure to provide this accommodation adequately; in fact, it has contributed to overcrowding in many parts of the Metropolis. I would strongly recommend the right hon. Gentleman to accept, in Committee, at any rate, the principle of the 1st section of the 8th clause of the Housing of the Working Classes (Metropolis) Bill, introduced by myself and others, and which provides that no houses shall be pulled down except on the score of safety unless provision shall first have been made by the County Council, to the satisfaction of the Local Government Board, for housing decently all the occupants. We desire that re-erection shall go on pari passu with pulling down. The other point of importance I wish to refer to is that of legal examinations. That question has been dealt with in a Bill introduced by myself and my colleagues, and also in a measure introduced by the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. R. T. Reid). In the 7th section of the Housing of the Working Classes (Metropolis) Bill there are provisions whereby the cost of acquiring unsanitary property may be very considerably reduced. There is no doubt that the series of arbitrations which have to be gone through under the existing law is a very great cause of the cost of acquiring such premises. The 16th clause of the Bill meets the question to some extent, but not sufficiently; and I hope the Government will be prepared in Committee to accept some modification of the clause, with a view to make it of a more operative character. Attention has been frequently drawn to the importance of making others than the ordinary ratepayers bear a share of the legal expenses, and I am sorry the point has not been considered by the right hon. Gentleman. I am aware of the difficulty of the problem, but I am certain that the housing of the poor of the Metropolis will never be adequately dealt with until the question of who is to pay the cost is also considered—until property which now escapes is made to contribute towards the local rates. I state this as the mature opinion of those who act with me on this side of the House, and, while welcoming this Bill, I say it will not be a solution of the question, because it does not deal also with the question of local rates. With these remarks, and having warned the Government that this question is not settled by this Bill, I give my hearty support to the measure; and I am sure my colleagues of the Metropolis will join me in doing all that is possible in facilitating its adoption.

*(9.12.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I think the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board has reason to be satisfied with the tone in which the Bill has been received, and I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will have assistance from both sides of the House in endeavouring to make it a useful and an efficient measure within the limits laid down by the right hon. Gentleman himself. I think he may rest satisfied that if the Bill goes to a Grand Committee upstairs it will be received in the spirit in which it ought to be received, and that we may hope to make it a good and effective measure. As to the first part of the Bill amending the Torrens' Acts, I have always been of opinion that from those Acts there is more to be hoped for than from Lord Cross's Act. I have always thought that if the provisions of the Torrens' Acts were efficiently worked, they could be made effective without great cost to the Local Authorities. Hitherto the obstacle to the working of those Acts and Lord Cross's Act has been the fear entertained by the Local Authorities of the expenses involved, and I am glad, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman has done something in this Bill to grapple with this difficulty. I had at first some doubt as to whether it was wise to give so great an appeal to the London County Council; but after this discussion, I am obliged to admit that I think the course proposed is a wise one. I am not sure that it will not render some of the Local Authorities unwilling to exercise these duties, and make them inclined to leave to the London County Council the whole of the work; but, on the other hand, there are patent and strong arguments in favour of giving an appeal to the London County Council, and I think we should risk the danger I refer to. With regard to the other part of the Bill, that which deals with the Artisans' Dwellings Act, although the Amendments of the right hon. Gentleman are in the right direction, I do not believe that they will give full effect to those Acts. The real difficulty in working them is the enormous expense of compensation, due in part to the legal costs, and in part to the large compensation which the arbitrators are in the habit of giving, and also the large compensation to which persons are entitled under the law as it now stands. I am bound to say the Amendments do not go far enough as to materially reducing the cost, and I am afraid we must look forward to very little work being done in the future as in the past. My own impression is that the matter must be dealt with in the future in some larger and bolder spirit. We must regard these clearances of unsanitary areas more in the nature of town improvement schemes than clearances for the purpose of forming sanitary areas. We must take example by Birmingham and other large towns, and re-consider very carefully the whole question of compensation with respect to improvements of this kind. I must refer to the familiar subject of the Betterment Clauses. It will be necessary to incorporate, in schemes of this nature, the principle of betterment, under which a property will be made to contribute in proportion to the increased value attaching to them from improvements. However, I do not think it would be wise to raise this question in connection with this Bill. It will have to be left to be dealt with hereafter in a broader and wider scheme when the House will have more time at its disposal. It would, perhaps, be a mistake to encumber the present discussion by raising the point. The main improvement which will be effected will be under the first portion of the Bill. I am satisfied that it will be possible to effect considerable improvement, and quietly and without much expense to promote a more efficient action of the Local Authorities in more closely applying the law as it now stands and will be amended by the Bill. I agree with the last speaker that we shall have to consider the whole question of the incidence of taxation, and I hope that that subject will not be lost sight of by the right hon. Gentleman, whom, meanwhile, I beg to thank for introducing this Bill.

(9.18.) MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I desire to join in thanking my right hon. Friend for the Bill, which will bring the law into a more intelligible state. At present it is almost impossible to obtain a clear grasp of the whole subject. On one occasion I myself endeavoured to master the Statutes bearing on this matter, and I found that it was necessary to obtain a knowledge of 30 Statutes dealing with the question, and that even then I should not have exhausted the list of Acts which would have to be consulted. It must be clear to everyone that a law which is contained in 30 or 35 Acts must be practically inoperative. From my experience of different towns, I believe the problem in the largest towns—putting London aside for the moment—is by no means insoluble. I believe that the unsanitary areas are by no means large, and that at no great cost these areas can be brought into a sounder and more sanitary state. One danger I fear—the trusting too much to rates, and thus driving away private enterprise. We know that in the matter of education the application of the rates in some instances has driven away voluntary effort, and I trust we shall not expect too much assistance from the rates in the matter of workman's dwellings; for if we do we shall drive away private capital, and not have that increase of improved houses for the poor which everyone desires to see. This question is by no means simple. It has many sides, and we should not rely on the public purse alone. We shall act wisely, I believe, if we look to private enterprise to do for dwellings for working people that which in other branches of the business of the country is done far more efficiently by that means than by recourse to the public funds. I rejoice that there is nothing said about the incidence of taxation, for that is a most complicated question, the interests involved being so many and diverse. My object in rising was to thank the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board for what he has done and to assure him that his efforts will be welcomed by all who have at heart the interests of the working classes.

(9.25.) MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I congratulate the Government on having departed in this Bill from the evil practice of omitting all reference to Ireland in beneficial Acts of Parliament. The Bill will be a most valuable improvement in the law relating to this subject, and will probably prove more or less effective in securing the objects for which it is brought in. The Bill, however, proposes to repeal the 4th section of the Act of 1885, and I think a very strong case will have to be made out before we repeal that section. I take some objection to the Bill, because it patches up and amends an expensive and troublesome system. If it were practicable to introduce it, I should very much prefer some Bill which would once for all abolish the existing system, and provide something more simple and rapid, and less expensive. I admit that when you come to deal with the question of property and the transfer of land, that object is very difficult to obtain, but, nevertheless, I think that something should be done towards this object. May I make a suggestion on that point to the right hon. Gentleman? We have in Dublin more than one company for the improvement and provision of artisans' dwellings. These companies are ordinary limited liability companies; but by their Memoranda of Association the members agree to take no greater dividend than 5 per cent., and I think it would be well to give to such companies a certain locus standi to take on themselves compulsory power to acquire insanitary dwellings, and deal with the sites on commercial principles. These companies have reserve funds, and would, no doubt, be more than willing to apply those funds to the purchase of unsanitary sites in the way I mention. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board whether he could not devise a system, under which, with certain safeguards, these companies could be allowed a locus standi. The Bill throws on Local Authorities the duties connected with the acquisition of land, and I do not see why that duty should be thrown upon them, if you can, by means of a Bill of this kind, get those who would be willing to undertake the duty. The second point I desire to mention is the difficulty of making any system of this sort self-working. In the districts where improvement is most wanted you will find the owners of the unsanitary property get themselves elected to the Local Board, where they can bring such influence to bear as to impede the working of these improvement schemes. I know instances where they have combined to prevent anything being done. I submit that the solution of this question is very easy. I deny altogether that a man has a right to make a profit out of what is a danger to the public. I deny that he has a right to crowd human beings in the most unsanitary and frightful dens, and risk the spread of infection for the benefit of his own pocket. I recollect in one district in Dublin, happily acquired by the Corporation, where out of three houses there was an average of 20 cases of typhus fever every year. I submit that the solution of the difficulty is to deprive the owner of the power of making profit out of such a condition of things by inserting a clause which will make it a good defence on the part of the tenant to a demand for rent that the house is not fit for habitation. You in that way deprive the landlord of his profit. You compel him for the sake of his own pocket to repair the premises. All you want is not any arbitrary or harsh method, but the interposition of the Courts of Law—I mean the County Courts and the Justices Courts. I do not make that suggestion as an alternative to the Bill; I do not believe it would be a proper alternative. But I think you will find that, under the Bill, the question of expense will always be before the authorities, and that will prevent them 99 times out of 100 taking action; but if the rent is not paid because of the unsanitary condition of the property, then it immediately becomes the interest of the owner to put it into a proper state of repair.

**MR. RITCHIE*: I hope the House, with whose indulgence I speak, will permit me to express my gratitude to hon. Members in all parts of it for the extremely kind and cordial reception they have given the proposals of this Bill. It is not the least satisfactory point of the case that the hon. Member for South Kilkenny has, with regard to the provisions dealing with Ireland, also expressed himself on the whole in favour of the proposals of the Government, believing they will be productive of considerable good to Ireland. There are hon. Members who very much desire that the Bill should go further, and I greatly appreciate the attitude which they have taken up with regard to this Bill. I know there are a great many hon. Members who desire that other questions of great interest affecting the dwellings of the working classes should be dealt with, but they have recognised, and no one more fully than the hon. Member for Bethnal Green, that it would be undesirable to complicate this simple question with many difficult problems. For instance, the question of the division of rates between the owner and the occupier, the question of betterment, and many points of that description, are extremely interesting and most important. Hon. Members recognise that an attempt to have dealt with questions of that kind would only have resulted in our being unable to deal with this part of the subject. It has been recognised, and with great force, that whatever is to be done for the better housing of the working classes should be done quickly, rather than that we should wait for some great general reform in connection with the rates and with the incidence of taxation, which remain to be dealt with, and perhaps in the remote future. Now I will proceed to deal with some of the questions put to me. The hon. Member for North St. Pancras was rather anxious that the Committee should have before them the Bill dealing with sanitary reform in the Metropolis. The reform and consolidation of the public health and sanitary laws in the Metropolis formed part of our programme at the commencement of the Session. And one of the first duties which I set myself in the beginning of the present year was to draw up a Consolidation Bill. But I thought it advisable that we should have the advice of the various Local Authorities in the Metropolis, as well as of the London County Council, and I, therefore, sent round to the whole of the Local Authorities throughout London our proposed Consolidation Bill for the Metropolis. Unfortunately, the replies were a very long time in being returned. There were matters requiring very much consideration, and I do not mean to complain; but it is not long since we received the last of the representations made by the Local Authorities, and we have hardly had time to draw up and amend our Bill in sufficient time to put it before the Grand Committee. I think it would be unfortunate if there were to be any delay in dealing with the Consolidation Bill and the Bill for the amendment of the Sanitary Laws of the Metropolis. I have not entirely lost hope that I shall be able to deal with the question this Session, and I hope the House will not consider that we are in any way departing from our engagements because of the delay caused by the Local Authorities taking a long time to send in their replies. It was suggested by the noble Earl (Earl Compton) that we should not press the Consolidation Bill this year; but I should be greatly disappointed if this Bill did not come out from the Grand Committee both amended and consolidated; and whatever may be the composition of the Committee to which these Bills are referred, I can assure the House no effort will be wanting on the side of the Department to put the Bill in such a position as will enable both branches of the subject to be dealt with, so as to present to the House for their consideration the entire Bill amended and consolidated. It has been urged upon me that the Metropolitan Members should be fairly represented upon the Grand Committee to which these Bills are to be referred. I myself, as a Metropolitan Member, am most anxious that this should be so, because the measures will affect the London more than the country districts. I must, however, point out that the nomination of the members of Grand Committees does not rest with the Government, but with the Committee of Selection of this House, who, I have no doubt, will make a fair selection of members to serve upon it. The hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Captain Verney) has reminded me that this is a question which is not solely applicable to the Metropolis and other towns, but the hon. and gallant Member knows that we are taking steps in this Bill with a view of doing what we can for the rural districts. It is, perhaps, to be regretted that the House took the course it adopted with regard to the Allotments Bill, whereby it almost deprived the Government of any power to set up the County Council as the authority over the smaller towns and the rural districts. We were strongly urged on that Bill not to make the County Council a Court of Appeal from the Local Authorities in those districts in regard to allotments, and it is, therefore, upon this House that the responsibility devolves. Of course, it will be a matter for the Committee to consider whether some modification may not be made in this principle as affecting the rural districts. There are some minor points that have been referred to in regard to matters of detail which I will not now deal with, because I consider they will be much more effectively discussed in Committee. In conclusion, I have only once more to express my cordial thanks to hon. Members on both sides of the House for the kind and cordial reception they have given to this measure, and to express a hope that with their assistance it may, with such Amendments as the House may determine, be speedily passed into law.

*(9.50.) MR. STANSFELD (Hali-fax): I think the House will be satisfied with the introduction of these measures, and with the spirit in which they have been brought forward by the right hon. Gentleman. We have heard from him that he has experienced great difficulty in regard to the question of giving an appeal from the Local Authorities to the County Councils. I wish to say in regard to that question that I have always been in favour of an appeal to a higher authority where an appeal is necessary, because I hold that that is a material part of the Local Government structure, but I do not place too much reliance on appeals. I am disposed to place far greater reliance on the efficient performance of their duties by the Local Sanitary Authorities in dealing with these matters. We are, I think, agreed that the existing Sanitary Authority is not an entirely satisfactory Authority. The right hon. Gentleman knows the reason why. The reason is that its sanitary functions are subordinated to the execution of its Poor Law functions, so that the sanitary functions occupy the second instead of the first place. What is wanted is that there should be areas constituted under Local Government Authorities, whose first duty would be to attend to the sanitary conditions of their districts. For this purpose we must have District Councils, and on this subject we on this side of the House, and I hope also those on the other side of the House, are exceedingly anxious for the introduction of a measure to complete the Local Government Act of 1888. I trust and desire that before long we may proceed with a measure constituting these District Councils, and I venture to say that no measure would be more favourably received on this side of the House. With regard to the Consolidation Bill, two opinions have been expressed on this side of the House. For myself, I agree with the opinion that the Consolidation Bill ought to be regarded as of the first importance, and I do not see in the tone and temper of the House any reason to apprehend difficulty in the incorporation of both Bills—the Consolidation and the Amendment Bill—in one measure. Undoubtedly consolidation is practical amendment, because the law has become so difficult to understand, administer, and apply that consolidation has become a matter of absolute necessity. I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on the introduction of these measures, which I have no doubt will be to some extent improved by being submitted to a Grand Committee.

*(9.59.) MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): There are one or two matters to which, without detaining the House at any length, I desire to call attention. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board has said that dealing with this subject in a necessarily incomplete way, it is not desirable to enter upon the discussion of principles which many Members on this side of the House would gladly see introduced. There is, however, one point within the limits so laid down to which I should like to call attention. In Clause 8 of the Amendment Bill a provision is introduced for the simplification of the mode of levying expenses incurred under these Bills. Hitherto such expenses might be levied by various rates. Henceforth they can only be levied by one rate. The clause aims at an evident improvement, but in its present form, perhaps, tends rather to jeopardise a valuable provision of the later Acts, which I think might, with advantage, have been applied to all the sets of provisions for the bettering of the housing of the working classes. It is well-known to the House that the principle of betterment has already been applied in one part of the legislation on the subject of the housing of the working classes—I mean that part which deals with obstructive buildings. Under Section 48 of the Consolidation Bill, if the demolition of an obstructive building adds to the value of the neighbouring buildings, part of the expense may be cast by the arbitrator on the owners of those buildings. That is an application of the principle of betterment which I think simpler and better than that contained in the clause dealing with betterment in the London Bill recently discussed in this House. Having taken some pains to gather the effect of American legislation on the subject, I may say I think the mode in which the betterment principle is applied in the section I refer to is more in accordance with American precedents than was the rather curious proposal of the London

County Council. I cannot, however, in the least, see why this provision should be applied only to obstructive buildings. By the Amending Bill the Government proposes to apply the rating provisions hitherto applicable only to certain classes of improvements under the Artizans Dwellings Acts to all improvements under the Acts now to be consolidated. Might not the principle of betterment in the same way be applied generally by the very simple means of making the provision in Section 48 of the Consolidating Bill applicable, not only to obstructive buildings, but also to unhealthy areas, and all other nuisances removed under these Bills? In many cases the deterioration in the value of surrounding property, caused by the existence of unsanitary houses, is extremely large; and surely in such instances it would be well that some part of the expense of removing those houses should be put on the owners of the surrounding property. I understand, from the Memorandum attached to the Consolidating Bill, that it is not anticipated that it will be necessary to insert in the Amendment Bill any provision dealing with the question of registration of charges under the Land Charges Registration Act, 1888. I venture to express the opinion that the same reasons which weighed with the Court in determining that charges under Section 150 of the Public Health Act could not be registered under that Act will apply in the case of charges under the Bills we are now discussing. In each case the charges are not the result of agreement, but are imposed by authority. It seems to me, therefore, to be desirable that some provision for the registration of these charges should be inserted in this Bill.

HOUSING OF THE WORKING CLASSES ACTS (CONSOLIDATION) BILL.

(NO. 285.) SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Ritchie.)

*(10.7.) MR. CHANNING: I cannot agree with some of the remarks that fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) as to the way in which the principle of consolidation is carried out in this Bill. I think it would have been far better if we had had a great many of the old Acts put into the waste-paper basket, and have had them replaced by a much simpler measure. The first part of this Bill deals with unhealthy areas, and the second part with unhealthy dwellings. These two parts contain a great deal of useful machinery, which would enable much good to be done in rural as well as in Urban Sanitary districts, and I must protest against the exclusion of the rural districts from participation in the benefits of many of these provisions. I allude especially to the provisions in regard to the question of compensation where land is taken compulsorily. In Urban Districts land can be bought without any extra value being added in respect of compulsory purchase, and that should be extended to Rural Districts also. I think the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ritchie) is losing a great opportunity in not extending those provisions to the Rural Sanitary districts. Part of the Act of 1885 is very rightly introduced into the third part of the Bill; and in the 56th section we find that the expression "cottage" may include a garden of not more than half an acre, providing that the estimated annual value does not exceed £3. It really is monstrous to say that we have not unhealthy homes and areas in the villages of England. Anyone acquainted with the condition of many villages in the Midlands must know that in that part of England—and I believe the same may be said of Dorset and Wiltshire—there are some very unhealthy areas to which the first and second parts of this Bill might very well be applied. The question is, why Rural Sanitary Authorities should not have the same advantages as Urban Sanitary Authorities in regard to the compulsory purchase of land for clearing away unhealthy buildings. I really think this is a blot in the Bill, and that the right hon. Gentleman has lost a valuable opportunity of providing facilities for the removal of the rookeries which are to be found in a great many of our villages.

*(10.14.) MR. RITCHIE: The hon. Gentleman will observe that the Bill is purely a Consolidation Bill, and not an Amendment Bill at all. It merely puts into one Bill the various enactments which now deal with the subject. The matters to which he has referred may be very fairly considered in connection with the Amendment Bill, but are hardly relevant to the present measure.

(10.15.) MR. JAMES ELLIS (Leicestershire, Bosworth): I should like to emphasise what my hon. Friend has said. It is undoubtedly the case that in many places in the provinces there are blocks of houses which ought to be swept away. They are chiefly the productions of speculative builders.

*(10.16.) SIR WALTER FOSTER: There is no power vested in Rural Sanitary Authorities to obtain land compulsorily for the purposes referred to, and I would put it to the right hon. Gentleman whether it would not be possible to consider the matter, with a view of removing this grievance in the other Bill? It is equally important in rural as in urban districts that we should obtain the best sanitary areas for the people; and I trust that the flaw having been pointed out, the Government will give us a promise to deal with the matter at some future stage of the Bill.

*(10.17.) MR. RITCHIE: If the hon. Member will read Clause 13 of the Amendment Bill he will find that the proposals in the Bill are, to some extent, applied to rural districts. There is no reason why the provisions applying to Urban Sanitary districts should not be applied to rural districts, and the matter will, no doubt, be considered by the Select Committee.

(10.18.) MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): Might I ask whether the Standing Committee on Law, to which this Bill is to be referred, will undergo some alteration with a view to the consideration of this Bill? There will, probably, be upon that Committee an excess of Members who were principally concerned in the Light Railways Bill of last Session. On this occasion I trust there will be upon it a considerable number of Irish Members representing Irish urban districts, seeing that this Bill will affect the cities and large towns of Ireland—where it is to be hoped it will have considerable effect. I hope that in considering the question of the constitution of the Committee the claims of the Irish Members to adequate representation will be considered.

*(10.20.) MR. RITCHIE: This is a matter for the Committee of Selection and not for me; but, no doubt, due consideration will be given to all the interests concerned.

(10.20.) MR. M. J. KENNY: I would remind the right hon. Gentleman that the claims of Scotland will also have to be considered, as the Bill will affect many districts in Scotland, rural as well as urban.

Bill read a second time, and committed to the Committee on Housing of the Working Classes Acts Amendment Bill.

Ordered, That it be an Instruction to the Committee, that they have power to consolidate the two Bills into one Bill.

ALDERSHOT ROADS BILL.—(No. 298.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*(10.22.) THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (MR. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): The object of this Bill—which is one of very small scope—is to give power to divert certain roads and tracks which have become dangerous from their proximity to rifle ranges at which it has become necessary to stop shooting until the diversion can be effected. I have been in communication with several Members respecting the provisions of the Bill; and the right hon. Member for Bradford (MR. SHAW LEFEVRE) has requested that a plan showing exactly what is proposed to be done shall be exhibited in the Library of the House. This request will be complied with. The Bill does not deal with a very extended area of land; but it is necessary that rifle practice should continue over the area affected, and that the public should be protected from the long range firing. It is impossible in a Bill of this scope to explain the exact changes which are proposed. They will form matter for consideration in Committee. I propose to move that the Bill be referred to a Hybrid Committee, so that if any individual thinks he is aggrieved he may have the opportunity of being heard by counsel or otherwise. I will not detain the Committee further, but will simply move that the Bill be read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Brodrick.)

*(10.25.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: This Bill is of a very exceptional character, because it proposes to stop up roads and footpaths over many thousand acres of land. I do not say at present whether this is right or wrong, but certainly it ought not to be done without great consideration in the interests of the public; it is sought to be effected without that public investigation in the locality which would be deemed necessary in other cases. For the present, however, I shall be satisfied if the changes are shown in the plan to be exhibited in the Library, and if the Bill is referred to a Hybrid Committee, before whom individuals interested can be heard without the necessity of appearing by counsel.

(10.27.) MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke): It seems to me that the stopping of these footpaths must obviously be to the interest of the public, seeing that they are not safe to people traversing them by reason of the rifle shooting. But I should like to know who is to keep up the new roads and footpaths when they are established. If they are to be used exclusively by the military, I think they ought to be kept up at the expense of the War Office. If, however, they are going to be thrown upon the Local Authorities, care ought to be taken that they are properly made up before they are accepted.

(10.28.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I was glad to hear the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford, because they entirely justify the action I have thought it my duty to take, on several occasions, in refusing to allow the Bill to be taken after midnight. I have taken that course more than once, holding that the Government should not expect to be allowed to take important business after midnight when they have taken all the time of private Members before midnight. I am not going to oppose the passage of the measure, because I think it will probably be in the interest of the public. I cannot, however, accept the proposition laid down by the hon. Member for Basingstoke, who says it is in the interest of the public to stop the footpaths for the reason that if they used them they might get shot. It seems to me a most extraordinary doctrine that we should stop up footpaths because certain gentlemen, military or otherwise, want to shoot at long ranges. But I presume these alterations have in view the arrangements of the Rifle Association as well as those of the regular Military Authorities. It is impossible to criticise the proposals of the Government until we have the plan before us, and I am glad the hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill has promised to place a map in the Library. I think, however, that attention ought to be called to the exceptional power that is taken in the Bill to suspend occasionally existing rights of way. That seems to me a very novel proceeding which the Committee ought to carefully examine into. Then there is the clause which deals with compensation for the stopping up or the diversion of rights of way. The Board of Agriculture is to hold an inquiry and award such compensation as it may think just out of money to be provided by Parliament. I should have thought the President of the Board of Agriculture had his hands full already; but whether that is so or not, I object to the proposal to do away with the open inquiry in the locality which usually takes place when there is any question of the stopping up of public rights of way, and to place the matter in the hands of officials in any one of the Departments of the State. Where rights of way are in question, the Local Authorities, such as the County Councils, ought to be represented, and have their say. However, these matters may very properly be left to the examination and consideration of the Select Committee. I hope the hon. Member in charge of the Bill will see that the Committee is so comprised that it will give a fair hearing to all parties interested.

(10.32.) MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I feel obliged to make a few comments on this piece-meal legislation. There are ranges in other places besides Aldershot. I think it would be far more business-like for the Government to bring in a Bill giving the Crown power to take land, and to pay for it in the ordinary way. I utterly fail to see why persons whose rights are taken away by the Crown or the Government should be sent to a State Board, while persons whose land is taken by a Railway Company can have recourse to the law. Why has the machinery of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act been thrown overboard, and this perfectly new and undefined machinery adopted?

(10.35.) MR. BRODRICK: The hon. Member has, I think, overstated the change proposed to be made. The Board of Agriculture merely replaces the old Land Commission, and takes over the duties of that Board. In reply to my hon. Friend (Mr. Jeffreys), the roads proposed to be made are award roads of 1826, and the Highway Boards are quite ready to take them over.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee of seven Members:—Four to be nominated by the House, and three by the Committee of Selection.

ELECTORAL DISABILITIES (NAVAL, MILITARY, AND POLICE) BILL.

(NO. 146.) COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

*(10.36.) MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea): I beg to move the Instruction which stands in my name. The Bill seeks to remove disabilities in the case of certain classes only. My Instruction would extend the principle of the Bill to its logical conclusion, and if it is adopted, the Committee will be enabled to afford relief in the case of, railway servants, merchant sailors, artisans, and others, who are at the present time in many cases disqualified.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to insert clauses in the Bill to remove the disabilities attaching to voters who have been absent from their qualifying premises under any contract of service or in the execution of a public duty.—(Mr. Whitmore.)

(10.37.) MR. CHANCE: I should have thought that on a Bill of this importance the right hon. and learned Gentleman in charge of the measure would have vouchsafed some explanation. Personally, I do not think the Instruction goes far enough or meets the whole difficulty. I object to the entire framing of the Bill. The difficulty which exists under the present franchise is that any householder must, to qualify himself for a vote, be in occupation of the premises for the whole of the qualifying period. While voluntary absence for six, seven, or eight months does not disqualify a man, absence on duty—the absence of a policeman or a sailor who has signed articles, even for one day—disqualifies a man for a whole year. The simplest way of dealing with the question would have been to make it an amendment of the general law, and get rid of this absurd doctrine that compulsory absence for 24 hours is a bar to the franchise. A great many people are subjected to disability, and I fail to see why only some men should be singled out for exceptional favour. Some explanation is necessary before the House can wisely permit the Second Reading to be taken.

*MR. SPEAKER: This is not the Second Reading. The question is, whether this Instruction should be given to the Committee.

MR. CHANCE: I desire to know why the Irish Police, for instance, should receive this favourable treatment, while other persons with far greater interest in the locality should be omitted from consideration. The Irish policeman is liable to be shifted from one end of the country to the other, and under this Bill it would be possible for one to qualify in a county where the election was pretty close—one of the divisions of Tyrone, for example. All that is necessary is that he should be there on the 20th of July, 1890, and the 20th of July, 1891. Why are seamen omitted from consideration by the Bill? Everyone knows that seamen are compelled to sign articles in the Merchant Service, and that they commit an offence if they absent themselves from service. It is held, however, that absence for a single week in a coasting steamer would be a disqualification. It seems to me absurd to bring in a Bill dealing with policemen and military, and to leave out of consideration seamen who are absent under articles.

*MR. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. and learned Gentleman to speak to the Instruction before the House.

MR. CHANCE: May I point out that I am showing that certain classes of men have been omitted from consideration?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I accept the Instruction.

MR. CHANCE: Yes; but you will allow discussion. There is another question which I do not think the Instruction raises, and that is the question of the right of a voter to vote at a polling booth which is not in his own polling district. That right is reasonably given by the Bill to two classes of people, and I suggest to the Mover of the Instruction that his Instruction ought to be widened so as to give the right to other classes of persons, such as engine drivers and railway servants, who may find it difficult to be in their own polling district on the polling day. There is a third class of persons whom the Instruction ought to include, and they are the persons who have renewed—

*MR. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but I must point out to him that the Instruction only refers to persons who are absent under any contract of service or in the execution of their duty.

MR. CHANCE: I am arguing that the Instruction ought to be widened. I think the Instruction ought not only to remove the bar to the right to vote, but should give facilities to vote, such as the Bill affords to two classes of individuals. Other persons ought to be afforded quite as great facilities for voting as policemen and soldiers. I submit that, under the Instruction, it would not be open for the Committee to make that alteration, and I hope the hon. Member (Mr. Whitmore) will re-consider his Instruction or will at least inform the House he is not adverse to an Amendment of the Instruction which would make the matter clearer and enable persons to get not only one advantage, but all the advantages which the Bill proposes to give.

*(10.49.) SIR R. WEBSTER: If the hon. Member for Kilkenny had been present at the Debate on the Second Reading he would know that this Bill has been introduced at the request of the Revising Barristers in various parts of the country, who think it very hard that persons away on duty for four months should lose their vote. On the Second Reading the hon. Member for Chelsea suggested that the Bill should be extended to all contracts of service, and, on behalf of the Government, acquiescence with that view was given. Amendments have been put upon the Paper to carry out that intention. If seamen come within the words I have put down, namely, "in the performance of any duty of his office, employment, or service," they will be included in the Bill. It has been suggested that railway servants ought to have some special privileges. So far as railway servants have to be absent from their homes for the qualifying period, they will be included in the Bill. Then it is suggested that, in addition, there should be facilities for these men to vote at places other than their own polling districts. I have made some inquiry, and I have found there is no practical grievance. It is not desirable to extend the power of voting at other polling places more than is absolutely necessary, and I am informed that railway men will, as a rule, be able to vote some time between the hours of 8 and 8.

*(10.51.) MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): The hon. and learned Gentleman says there is no practical grievance as regards railway men. He is mistaken. Numbers of railway servants are unable to vote in consequence of being sent away before the day of election, and being unable to return to their homes until after the day of polling. I see great practical difficulty in dealing with the matter: but it ought to be possible; and might, if we could provide that all elections should take place on the same day. In that case there would be no difficulty in enabling railway servants to poll in constituencies in which they happened to be at the time of the election; their ballot papers being transmitted to their own constituencies.

(10.53.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I consider the Bill is a very useful one, and therefore it is one to which I should not like to see any strenuous opposition made. As far as it goes, it accomplishes a very desirable object, but, at the same time, it is necessary to point out that the measure would never have been necessary but for the decision of the Queen's Bench in England in the case of "King against Mitchell." That decision as regards soldiers and sailors was distinctly dissented from in Ireland by the Irish Court of Appeal; but, in order to promote uniformity in the franchise in the three countries, the Irish Court were with great reluctance bound to follow the English case. The result has been a state of things in Ireland which even the Instruction of the hon. Member for Chelsea does not meet. In a recent case in Ireland, as regards sailors, there was the most unnatural construction of the law that perhaps any Court ever gave. The Irish Judges have declared that if a sailor takes passage on the night mail from Belfast to Barrow-in-Furness, or from one little coasting station in Ireland to another little coasting station in Scotland or England, under articles by which he can be compelled to go on board under the Merchant Shipping Act, he is disqualified.

SIR R. WEBSTER: That is dealt with in the Bill.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Yes, under the Bill he may be absent for not more than four months from his home.

SIR R. WEBSTER: The four months applies to all persons. It is not thought right to give a greater extension to one class of men than to another.

MR. T. M. HEALY: A pure fallacy. If a man lets his house furnished during the summer, and occupies it during the rest of the year it is considered a very hard thing that he should lose the franchise. That man, however, puts another family into his house. The sailor, on the other hand, continues to pay his rates and taxes, and his wife and children remain in possession of the premises. The two cases are wholly different, and I suggest that the four months' analogy which has been imported into the law, is an entirely false one. Why should the man who returns home within the four months retain the franchise, whilst the man who is absent for five or six months loses it? The real test ought to be constructive occupation of the premises. If a man, through his wife and family, remain in occupation of the house, he ought not to lose his vote. This is a seafaring nation. The English people owe their greatness and potentiality to their seafaring character. I hope the Government will recognise that four months is a pernicious limit and will re-consider their decision. I welcome the change in this Bill, although I believe that from a Party point of view it may injure us in Derry, where the Militiamen, who are mostly Nationalists, are generally shipped to some place in the South of England when the day of election comes. Let us try to come to an agreement on the Bill by providing that where a man remains in constructive occupation of his premises, and is, as Gilbert would say, "a pure and blameless ratepayer," he shall not lose his vote by reason of absence from home. I therefore propose to add to the words of the hon. Member for Chelsea—

Mr. T. M. Healy

"Or in other cases where the voter, notwithstanding his personal absence, has been in constructive occupation of the qualifying premises."

You have not in England that keen watch kept upon the register—that attack upon it which obtains in Ulster. In Derry and Belfast you may find men watching the Police Courts with the sole object of discovering those persons who, being charged with drunkenness, are imprisoned because they cannot pay the fine. One consequence attaching to this imprisonment is the loss of the franchise. It may be that the House may take up a hoity-toity, virtuous attitude, as the House sometimes does, and say there should be no sympathy with drunkards; but it should be observed this depriving a man of the franchise is not because he happened to be drunk, but because he has not 5s. to pay the fine and prevent imprisonment. The rich drunkard goes about his business, and enjoys his franchise; but the poor man must go to prison until his friends raise the money to pay his fine, and for this he loses his electoral right. This is one of the cases the Bill does not cover. If we are going to deprive a man of the franchise for little lapses of this kind, that is reducing the franchise to an absurdity. It is an odious state of things, and not to be tolerated. In England the view of the Revising Barristers is to extend the franchise so far as possible within the law; but in Ireland the case is wholly different, and the object of the Revising Barrister is to cut the throat of the franchise. The Revising Barristers in Ireland are nominated by the Lord Lieutenant, and of the 20 appointed last October 18 were Tories. These men make a shambles of their Judgment Seat; you can see them with the chopping block at hand looking out for the head of every Nationalist in Ulster. You may tell from the name of a man whether he is a Nationalist. The O'Mahoneys, the Murphys, the Donovans, and such like, you may rely are Nationalists. But when you light upon a man with the name of Blenkinsop or something of that kind in the North of Ireland, then you may safely put him down as a Tory. Any man with knowledge of the country knows the politics of a man as he comes up in these narrow divisions, and the partisan action of these Revising Barristers has become a scandal in Ireland. The Amendment I propose is to add at the end of the Instruction—

"Or in other cases where a voter, notwithstanding his personal absence, has been in constructive occupation of the qualifying premises."

*(11.5.) MR. SPEAKER: I do not think that would be in order. The Bill is to exempt from disqualification to be on the register those persons of three classes who are disqualified by reason of absence, namely, the Military, Naval, and Police Forces, acting under authority, and to provide that absence under such circumstances should not be a disqualification. The Instruction now proposes to extend this to other persons who might be acting under contract of service; but I do not think it would be in order to attach to that provisions as to occupation, the lodgers' franchise registration, or other matters connected with the franchise, but apart from the purpose of the Bill.

(11.6.) MR. T. M. HEALY: It is perfectly true, Sir, that the Bill deals only with the Naval, Military, and Police Forces; but the Amendment which the Government have accepted proposes to remove the disability also in the case of those absent from the qualifying premises under any contract of service; and my suggestion is that the disqualification should be removed where persons have been absent generally, provided they have had a constructive occupancy through their wives and families.

*(11.7.) MR. SPEAKER: I apprehend from that no Instruction would be required. I think that an Amendment providing that a contract of service—compulsory service, compelling absence from qualifying premises should not be held to disqualify—would come within the scope of the Bill, and if within the scope of the Bill, would be in order.

(11.7.) MR. T. M. HEALY: Of course, Sir, if you rule that I should be in order in moving my Amendment in Committee, that will quite satisfy me.

(11.8.) MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): I do not understand from your views, Sir, that this Amendment would be in order, but, that on the contrary, it would be altogether outside the scope of the Bill, and so could not be taken into consideration in Committee. In respect to the Amendment, I submit as a point of order that it is really a new Instruction, and not an addition to the Motion we have now before us, and so, in any case, notice of it should appear on the Paper.

(11.8.) MR. STANSFELD (Halifax): On the question of order, Sir, I presume we are entitled to alter the title of the Bill and its contents?

(11.9.) MR. R. WEBSTER: May I point out that the Bill does not in any way affect or alter the law as to the qualifying occupation, but simply proposes that where there is a qualifying occupation absence under a contract of service shall not disqualify.

*(11.9.) MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): May I ask whether commercial travellers and coachmen would come under the exemption from disqualification?

MR. R. WEBSTER: Yes, if under a contract of service.

*MR. SPEAKER: That is the whole point, absence from qualifying premises under contract of service.

(11.10.) MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg): The Government have agreed to accept the Instruction by which the scope of the Bill will be largely extended beyond the original intention, and I wish to extend it so as to meet such cases as that of railway servants in the locomotive service. These men—and the number is large—leave home on long railway journeys before the poll opens and return after the poll has closed. I would ask the Attorney General if he can see his way to introducing in the Bill a provision to meet such cases as these, where, by the requirements of their occupation, men are prevented from the exercise of the franchise because they cannot attend the poll. Then there is another class on whose behalf I make an appeal, Non-conformist ministers. They are under contracts of service of a very important character, which practically disqualify them from the exercise of the franchise.

I speak more particularly of the Wesleyan Body, though my remarks may apply to other Nonconformist ministers. The rule in the Wesleyan Church is that the minister shall stay three years in the district to which he is appointed, and then he is transferred, perhaps, to the other end of the Kingdom. Those changes of residence disqualify, and I would ask is it not possible to arrive at some arrangement by which these men, who may be counted by the thousand—men of education such as it is desirable to have on the register—may exercise the franchise under their terms of service?

(11.12.) MR. STOREY (Sunderland): There is another class of men for whom I desire to say a word. The Bill provides that a policeman absent on duty may record his vote in a booth other than the one to which, as an ordinary voter, he should go. Now, in boroughs such as Sunderland, there may be 60 or 70 polling booths, and as many Returning Officers and clerks. These officials, as a matter of fact, have no means of voting, because they cannot leave the booth where they are employed. Unless the Mayor is in sympathy with a Returning Officer, and appoints him to a booth where he can register his vote, these electors are deprived of the opportunity of exercising the franchise at all, unless, indeed, by a hurried drive in a cab, they can contrive to do this.

MR. TOMLINSON: I rise to order, Sir. The Bill, I submit, does not affect the right to vote, but the right to be on the register.

*MR. SPEAKER: The point is that members of the Naval, Military, and Police Service are not to be disqualified by reason of enforced absence under contract of service, and the argument is that other classes absent under authority should not be precluded from voting, and the question is whether some means may be devised enabling such persons to vote.

MR. STOREY: I am obliged to you, Sir, for making my meaning clear to the hon. Member. By way of bringing the matter to an issue, I propose to add, when the present Amendment is disposed of, the words—

“Or are unable to vote at their polling place, owing to the execution of a public duty.”

Mr. Waddy

*MR. SPEAKER: The Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Longford is not in order; does the hon. Member move now?

MR. STOREY assented.

Amendment proposed, to add to the proposed Instruction, the words—

“Or are unable to vote at their polling places, owing to the execution of a public duty in connection with the election.”

(11.18.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I think if the hon. Member had had an opportunity of looking over the Bill, he would have seen that, without the necessity of any Instruction, he could move his Amendment to Clause 3. The Instruction has reference to Clause 2, and this clause provides that the Revising Barrister shall not strike off the register soldiers and sailors who happen to be absent on the Public Service, and the Instruction is to extend that provision to other kinds of Service referred to in the Debate on the Second Reading. What the hon. Member for Sunderland desires is that there should be means to enable persons other than constables, who may be absent on the polling day, to record their votes in other than their own district. I believe that this would be in order on Clause 3, but, in any case, it is clear that it does not apply to this Instruction, which has reference to removing disqualifications to being on the register, not to prevention from voting.

(11.20.) MR. STOREY: That is just what I cannot understand. [Cries of “Spoken.”] I ask permission of the House to point out that this is a Bill to remove the disabilities of persons in the Naval, Military and Police Forces, and this is dealt with in Clause 2.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: As to the register.

MR. STOREY: But suppose they are registered, how does Clause 3 deal with any other persons than those dealt with in Clause 2?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir E. CLARKE, Plymouth): It is another subject.

MR. STOREY: Do I understand that, notwithstanding that Clause 2 deals with naval, military and police duties, it is the opinion of the Attorney General, which I hope may be fortified by the ruling of the Chair, that I shall be enabled to move, on Clause 3, that the ability to vote in other booths than their own shall also be allowed to civil persons or others than those in the Naval, Military and Police Services persons engaged in the conduct of elections?

*(11.23.) SIR R. WEBSTER: It is not for me to express an opinion, but I should have thought, subject to the ruling of the Chair, that it would be open to the hon. Member when we are dealing with Clause 3 to put down such an Amendment. At any rate, it has nothing to do with the present Instruction.

(11.23.) MR. STOREY: On a point of order, Sir, I would ask whether I should be in order, on Clause 3, in moving the Amendment I have put into your hands?

*(11.24.) MR. SPEAKER: The former part of the Bill deals with qualification for the register. Clause 3 will confer the ability to vote to men so qualified under the Bill if, in the execution of duty, they are in other polling places than their own. Under the circumstances, I think it might be competent for the hon. Member to raise the point on Clause 3.

(11.25.) MR. COURTNEY: With great respect, I submit it is a point upon which I do not find myself able to agree with the Attorney General.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I daresay I am wrong; I only stated my own opinion.

MR. COURTNEY: Clause 3 enables a constable who is sent on duty to a particular booth to vote at that booth, although it is not his polling place; but he does so, being sent by superior authority he cannot resist, and he is unable to record his vote except under the permission this Bill gives him. Returning Officers and clerks voluntarily accept their duties; they are not under a contract of service which requires them to undertake particular duties. Clause 2 effects the removal of the disability which rests upon a man through absence from qualifying premises through duties under his contract of service, and ensures his being placed upon the register. Clause 3 deals with the special position of constables who, when on duty, are permitted to vote at the nearest polling place. Without enlightenment I do not now possess, I do not see how the Amendment connects itself with this clause, or how in Committee it could be extended in this way. An Instruction would be necessary to effect this, and it should be a new Instruction, not an Amendment to the present one. It is new matter entirely, to be dealt with at the proper time and after notice.

*(11.26.) MR. SPEAKER: Then arises this difficulty: There will be no opportunity of putting down notice of an Instruction. The other Instructions are out of order; the hon. Member cannot move an Instruction now without notice, and the present Instruction being disposed of, I leave the Chair, and the hon. Member will be shut out from his opportunity of moving.

*(11.28.) MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): To give an opportunity for clearing up the matter, I beg to move the adjournment of the Debate. We have, as Liberals, no objection to this increase of voting power to soldiers, seamen, and police, but we insist that whatever increased ability you give to these classes shall be extended to all, and with this I understand the Attorney General agrees, from the words of an Amendment he has given notice of to Clause 2, for he proposes to introduce the words "performance of any duty of his office or employment," striking out words which restrict and limit. That, no doubt, enlarges the scope of the Bill in the direction we desire on this side. The other Instructions are out of order, but it is important that uncertainties should be cleared up, so that when we get into Committee we shall meet with no difficulty in moving Amendments that shall give to all other persons equal facilities to those that are to be extended to soldiers, seamen, and police, or others under "contract of service." There is no mention of "contract of service" in the Amendment of the Attorney General to Clause 2; he says, "performance of any duty of his office or employment." If these words are embodied in the Bill it is only reasonable that facilities for ability to record the vote should be as much included as facilities to get on the Register. Our contention is that Wesleyan ministers, commercial travellers, railway guards, engineers, and others should have equal facilities for voting with the Army, Navy, and Police.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Debate be now adjourned."
 —(Mr. Winterbotham.)

*(11.30.) MR. CAUSTON : I second her Motion of my hon. Friend. I do it because I think this is a tinkering bit of piecemeal legislation, and I hold that the Government ought to have a further opportunity of considering this Bill. I can quite understand its being brought in by a private Member for private purposes ; but I cannot understand the Government introducing this incomplete Bill, after the speech of the Solicitor General at Westminster a short time since, when he said—

“He hoped it might be in the power of the present Government to deal with the subject of registration. He had always said in the House of Commons and on the platform that when Parliament had made up its mind as to the particular class of persons who should enjoy the franchise, it was their duty to see that it was rendered as easy as possible for every individual belonging to that class to obtain and keep the privileges.”

I well know that on the question of registration the Government are divided. The Solicitor General speaks one way at Westminster, and almost at the same time, at Hull, the Chancellor of the Exchequer is saying that a Registration Bill “would mean a new distribution of political power once more tinkering with the Constitution,” and “attempting once more to pick our Constitution to pieces.” I repeat that this Bill is only tinkering with the subject, and I hope we shall be supported in the Motion for adjournment.

*(11.33.) SIR R. WEBSTER : I hope my hon. Friend will not persist in that Motion. The hon. Member who has just spoken has not heard this Debate——

*MR. CAUSTON : I have heard every word.

*SIR R. WEBSTER : There have been from all sides of the House speeches in support of this Bill. I brought it in at the request of Revising Barristers from many parts of the country.

MR. STOREY : Not from the North.

*SIR R. WEBSTER : I expressed my willingness to accept this Instruction, in consequence of a pledge given during the Debate on the Second Reading, and I hoped that it would meet the wishes of hon. Members.

(11.34.) MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.) : I support the Motion for adjournment. I differ from the statement of the Attorney General, that the Government are fulfilling the promise made on the Second Reading Debate.

If my memory serves me aright, during that Debate the Government promised to allow the Bill to be so extended as to meet the case of all classes of society, and not merely those originally mentioned in it. Now, we are in somewhat of a difficulty. The Chairman of Committees has frankly told us that he should, in Committee, consider himself bound to the original clauses, and that he would not be able to admit the Amendments we desire to have accepted. If the Government agree to the adjournment they will be able to bring up an Instruction of their own, which will apply to persons who are at present debarred from voting by their calling on the day of polling, and who are in identically the same position as the soldier, the sailor, and the policeman.

(11.36.) MR. CONYBEARE : I am in favour of the Bill and of the Instruction, on the broad principle that I am in favour of universal suffrage. If it be extended to women, I shall be the better pleased. There seems, however, to be a considerable amount of doubt as to where we now stand in respect of this particular Instruction ; and I think that, under the circumstances, the Attorney General can hardly resist the Motion for Adjournment. There is a great question as to how far we are committed, and as to whether it will be possible in Committee to introduce Amendments for the purpose of carrying into effect an Instruction which the Government have declared themselves to be in favour of accepting. If the Government accept the Motion for Adjournment, they will have time to consider the very reasonable protest which has been made on this side of the House. Of course, we know that the Tories would be the last Party in the world to do injustice to any class of people, and, therefore, I am not without hope that the Attorney General will accept this Motion. I am rather fogged about this business. I have listened attentively to what has gone on, especially with reference to one class of persons, I mean the Wesleyan ministers.

*MR. SPEAKER : Order, order ! The question before the House is the Motion for Adjournment.

MR. CONYBEARE : I did not intend to travel beyond the limits of that Motion. I can only say that if the Government accept this Motion for Adjournment, they will be able to give consideration to the case of the special hardship on Wesleyan ministers. Wesleyans form a not inconsiderable portion of my constituents, and I do, in their interests, urge the Attorney General to accept this Motion. I should like the Attorney General to tell us frankly upon what reasonable ground this Resolution for Adjournment can possibly be resisted. Can the Solicitor General, with all his deepness, get up and pose as an arbitrator between the Chairman of Committees and yourself, Sir?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is travelling beyond the scope of the Debate. The Question is that the Debate be now adjourned.

(11.42.) MR. WADDY: We are distinctly told—and we have to thank the Chairman of Committees for this information—that the particular class of persons whom we are desirous of bringing under the operation of this clause cannot be so dealt with by means of this Instruction, and that it will be necessary to alter the Instruction. I, therefore, submit that it is desirable that the Debate should be adjourned. I have no desire to obstruct this Bill. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Members opposite cry, "Oh, oh!" Possibly they know a good deal more of my mind than I do myself, and certainly if one may judge from their votes they know more of it than they do of their own mind. We are anxious to accept this Bill, but we want to extend its scope, and that cannot be done unless this Motion for adjournment is agreed to. Its acceptance would enable the Government to formulate such an Instruction as would ensure to all classes the right which we wish them to have. I earnestly hope that my hon. Friend will press his Motion, if necessary, to a Division; and if the Government refuse to agree to it I warn them that it will make the subsequent progress of the Bill a great deal more difficult.

(11.45.) SIR E. CLARKE: It has been asked why the Government object to this Motion for an adjournment. It is because the Government are anxious that a practical step should be taken in the direction of pressing forward a Bill, with regard to which both sides of the House are united. No one can object to the Instruction which is now under discussion, and which has been brought in in consonance with the promises made during the Second Reading of the Debate.

(11.46.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): I cannot altogether agree with what has fallen from the hon. and learned Gentleman as to what occurred in the course of the Debate on the Motion for the Second Reading of this Bill. I do not remember that any desire was then expressed that the widening of the scope of this Bill should be confined to any particular class, as is done in this Instruction, which undoubtedly confines its operation to persons in particular circumstances, and persons who are absent from home under orders from other people.

SIR E. CLARKE: Those are the only people who under the law can be disqualified.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: That is a satisfactory definition if, as I understand the hon. and learned Member, no one is deprived of the opportunity of having his name placed on the Register in consequence of absence from home except those who are under orders from other people. Then I think we shall be satisfied, and if that is the legal decision no more is to be said on the matter. I am anxious that this matter should be clearly defined, and that all the persons whose cases have been referred to by my hon. Friend should be covered in this Instruction.

(11.50.) MR. T. H. BOLTON: I think an adjournment would afford the Government an opportunity of considering whether the scope of Clause 3 could not be enlarged, so as to give facilities to other classes of persons to vote. If the Government will bring in a clause of enlarged scope I am sure that it will receive full support from this side of the House. I appeal to the Government to give us this opportunity of enlarging the operation of the Bill. I am as anxious as anyone that the Bill should pass.

(11.52.) MR. STOREY: The Solicitor General seems to think that this Bill is supported by Members in all parts of the House. I can tell him frankly that, for my part, I do not agree with the Bill, at all. To use a northern vernacular, I think it is a silly little Bill.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That is not the Question before the House.

MR. STOREY: I beg your pardon, Sir. I did not understand—

*MR. SPEAKER: The Debate has been considerably strained. The Question really before the House is the Motion for adjournment.

MR. STOREY: Very well, Sir; I will address myself to that. We ask for an adjournment because Clause 3 does not enable us to secure for others than soldiers, sailors, and policemen these voting facilities. The Chairman of Committees insinuated, in a delicate manner, that if in Committee we propose this Amendment he would have to rule it out of order. That leads me to say we are placed between the devil and the deep sea. I do not use the word offensively. Of course, we may get rid of the former individual, but we cannot get rid of the deep sea, and I submit that this adjournment is necessary to enable us to get the Instruction amended. I do not stand so much upon the case of Dissenting ministers, nor do I rest my argument upon the case of the railway guards. I ask the Attorney General whether, under his Instruction, a policeman at the door of the polling booth will be able—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I have already told the hon. Gentleman that he is not in order. The Question before the House is the adjournment of the Debate.

MR. STOREY: I will not trouble the House further. I do not think it would be possible to amend the Instruction at this minute, and, therefore, I support the Motion for the Adjournment, so that the Government may itself draw up an amended Instruction which will cover the case of soldiers, sailors, and policemen, as well as the other classes to whom reference has been made.

(11.59.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I hope it will not be necessary to force this to a Division. Seeing that it is now just upon 12 o'clock, I think the Government might agree to this Motion.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! It is only one minute to 12, and as the Debate must stand adjourned at midnight, I think possibly it will be agreed on all sides that there is no necessity to divide upon this Question.

Question put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Thursday.

BARRACKS [CONSOLIDATED FUND.]

Resolution [20th June] reported.

"That it is expedient to authorise the charge on, and issue out of, the Consolidated Fund of any deficiency which there may be in the moneys provided by Parliament for the payment of the principal and interest of any sums borrowed by the Treasury, under the provisions of any Act of the present Session for building and enlarging barracks and camps in the United Kingdom and in certain Colonies."

Resolution read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

It being Midnight, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed to-morrow.

NEW LICENCES (IRELAND) BILL.

(NO. 249.) COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I wish to ask whether the Government have decided on any action in relation to the Motion I made last night? I should like to know how soon they hope to put down Amendments to my Bill? I would suggest that it is only reasonable that we should know as early as possible what their Amendments are to be.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): I may inform the hon. Member that if he will put down his Bill for Monday the Government will be prepared with their Amendments.

Committee deferred till Wednesday 2nd July.

STRIKES BILL.—(No. 174.)

Order for Second Reading read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

OFFICE UNDER THE CROWN (VACATION OF SEATS) BILL.—(No. 136.)

Order for Second Reading read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

House adjourned at ten minutes after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 25th June, 1890.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

DIRECTORS' LIABILITY BILL.—(No. 300.)

Bill, as amended, further considered.

(12.35.) MR. MURPHY (Dublin, St. Patrick's): I beg to move at the end of Clause 3 to add—

“Or unless he proves with respect to every such incorrect or misleading statement that it was in reference to some matter or thing which was known to one or more of the other Directors and not disclosed to him.”

The object of this Amendment is to provide that, in the event of misleading statements having been made by individuals which were not disclosed to the Directors generally, an individual Director to whom such statements were not made known should not be damnified. I submit that this is a reasonable protection to persons who are induced to become Directors, and unless such a provision is made I do not see how any individual is to protect himself against a false representation.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 4, at the end of Clause 3, to insert the words “Or unless he proves with respect to every such incorrect or misleading statement that it was in reference to some matter or thing which was known to one or more of the other Directors and not disclosed to him.”—(Mr. Murphy.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

(12.39.) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): No doubt the case to which the hon. Member alludes may be a hard case, but I think that every Director before he gives his name to a prospectus is bound to do something to ascertain the truth of the statements he is putting forward. Even if he is not personally guilty it is better that he should suffer than that the public should be defrauded. If these words are inserted a Director will simply plead ignorance. I take it that a man who gets £200 or £300 a year for the mere use of his name should not be absolved from the consequences of any misleading effect which the use of his name may have had, so far as the public are concerned.

(12.40.) MR. WARMINGTON (Monmouth, W.): I hope the hon. Member will not press the Amendment. He must have forgotten what the provisions of the Bill are, and that they require every Director, before giving the sanction of his name, to have made every reasonable inquiry and examination. Surely, in regard to a statement made in a prospectus with a view to obtaining money from the public, it is not too much to require that those authorising it shall have made reasonable inquiry before they allow their names to go forth.

(12.41.) MR. ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I, for one, must oppose the Amendment in every possible way, on the ground that it would legalise the very thing which the Bill is intended to prevent.

*(12.42.) MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I also think that the words of this Amendment would afford too much protection to a careless or even a fraudulent Director. It would open the door to endless fraud, for a Director would not only take no steps whatever to obtain information as to the misleading statements in the prospectus, but might even, if a substantial man, take care, by making an agreement with his impecunious colleagues on the Board, that the statements should not be disclosed to him, with the effect, if this Amendment were assented to now, of his being thus enabled to evade all liability for them.

(12.43.) MR. MURPHY: I beg to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*(12.44.) MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): I have placed the following Amendment upon the Paper—to add at the end of Clause 3 the following words:—

“(c.) In this section the word ‘expert’ includes any person whose official position or special knowledge gives authority to a statement made by him, and the expression ‘misleading statement’ means a statement which is so made as by suppression of fact or ambiguity to create a false impression.”

A general concurrence of opinion has been expressed that some Amendment in this direction is required, in order to provide some legal definition of the word “expert,” which has never received any judicial interpretation. In order to meet some formal objections which have been suggested to me, I propose to leave out the word "position," and to substitute the word "professional" for "special," and to move the Amendment in that modified form. As to the second part of my Amendment, the expression "misleading statement" is equally without judicial interpretation, and the fear is that every Director would be at the mercy of any discontented shareholder, who would say that he had, in fact, been misled by the prospectus, and that therefore it must be considered to have been misleading.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 14, at the end of Clause 3, to insert, as a new Sub-section, the words—

(c.) "In this section the word "expert" includes any person whose official or professional knowledge gives authority to a statement made by him, and the expression "misleading statement" means a statement which is so made as by suppression of fact or ambiguity to create a false impression."—(Mr. Tomlinson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(4.48.) MR. WARMINGTON: I think it would be a matter of convenience if my hon. Friend would consent to divide the Amendment, seeing that different considerations apply to the first part from those which apply to the second. If my hon. Friend will, in the first place, move his Amendment down to the words "by him" I will not personally make any objection to it, as it seems to me that it may be a guide as to the definition of the liability.

*(4.49.) MR. TOMLINSON: I am quite willing to divide the Amendment, as suggested. I, therefore, beg leave to withdraw it, with the view of moving the first half down to the word "him."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 14, to insert the words "In this section the word 'expert' includes any person whose official or professional knowledge gives authority to a statement made by him."—(Mr. Tomlinson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(4.50.) SIR R. LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): I certainly regard this Amendment as a very important one, and a very serious doubt occurs to me with regard to the propriety of passing it. When the subject was under discussion some time ago there was a distinct pledge given to the House by the President of the Board of Trade that when the Bill was taken into another House those in charge of it would take care that a definition of the word "expert" should be inserted, so as to meet the objections which have been urged in this House. I would suggest to my hon. and learned Friend that the words originally placed on the Paper, "official position or special knowledge," would be preferable to the amended version which he now proposes. I do not think that the words "official or professional knowledge" are broad enough to meet the objections which are made to the use of that very indefinite word "expert." Personally, I should like to retain all three phrases—"official," "special," and "professional." I think that all three are needed in order to give the full meaning of the word "expert," and I would venture to suggest to my hon. and learned Friend, and to the hon. Member in charge of the Bill, that the real meaning to be assigned to the word "expert" is of such vital importance that it would be advisable to have a conference with the President of the Board of Trade on the subject.

*(12.52.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire): We have discussed this question seven or eight hours already, and voted upon it three or four times. I therefore think the time has come when the House should arrive at some definite conclusion. It does not seem to me that the Amendment will do either good or harm, for it simply includes in the Bill that which the Court itself would have introduced by way of construction.

(12.53.) MR. WARMINGTON: In answer to the objection of the hon. Member for North Kensington, I may say that the President of the Board of Trade has already considered these words and has assented to the form in which they are moved.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: I desired to convey no imputation whatever upon the good faith of the President of the Board of Trade. On the contrary, I am satisfied that whatever pledge he has given he will fulfil.

(12.54.) MR. J. M. MACLEAN (Oldham): I cannot see that there is any objection to the Amendment, and I think it is only right we should let the House of Lords know what we mean by the word "expert."

Question put, and agreed to.

Another Amendment proposed, at the end of the last Amendment, to insert the words—

"And the expression 'misleading statement' means a statement which is so made as by suppression of fact or ambiguity to create a false impression."—(Mr. Tomlinson.)

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

(1.0.) The House divided :—Ayes 37 ; Noes 97.—(Div. List, No. 155.)

*MR. SPEAKER : I would suggest to the hon. Member for Longford that the Amendment which he has upon the Paper might be better proposed in the form of a sub-section of Clause 3, otherwise notice would be required for a new clause.

(1.3.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): The object of the Amendment I am about to move is one that I trust commends itself to the promoters of this Bill, and I hope it will be agreed to. We know that the modern so-called boom in shares began with the Guinness boom, in connection with brewery shares, in October, 1887. That boom was greatly stimulated by the Conversion Scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The public invested in those shares since the date which I propose to appoint in this section. In 1888-9, the Chancellor of the Exchequer passed an Act requiring a certain amount of Stamp Duty on every £100 worth of shares. Therefore, if this Bill is to do anything to meet the difficulties in the way, and to capture fraudulent promoters, it ought to date from the year 1886. What is the good of locking the stable door after the steed is stolen? What good will it do to shareholders in Allsopp's to know that in future it will be impossible for a man in the position of Lord Hindlip to do what he did in connection with these shares? The Conservative Party have now declared themselves strongly in favour of the brewery interest, and all their money is invested in brewery or distillery shares. I suggest that it is vital to the general body of the public, in whose interest the Licensing Bill was introduced, that the Amendment should be adopted in order to prevent swindling by fraudulent promoters, largely in connection with these brewery shares. The matter is not confined to brewery shares. The Conservative Party is largely a warlike party, and we know very well that in connection with the Hotchkiss Gun, the Gatling Gun, and the Nordenfeldt Gun, and a number of other public companies, the grossest frauds are being perpetrated. I venture to say, since the days of Adam, if Adam was connected with company promoters, no greater fraud has been known to the public than in connection with the Gatling Gun Company. All these companies are shadowed forth to the public as companies that have paid an enormous interest, and anybody who will read their prospectuses will see at a glance that if this Bill is passed it is, as I say, locking the stable door after the steed has been stolen. I should ask, what satisfaction is it if I invested my money, say in Lord Hindlip's brewery, and he has pocketed his three millions, to find, when it comes to wanting the money back, that, as J. Gould said when he was asked to turn up the money that he had got in connection with the New York frauds, "it had gone where the woodbine twined." That is exactly the position of so large a number of the gentlemen connected with company promoting. I am happy to say that my losses have been very slight from the whole of them. So my action in this matter is purely disinterested. I view the matter from a very practical point of view. Take water gas. It was boomed to the world as a tremendous commodity which would knock out of time the electric light, and coal gas, and every other illuminant. £5 shares went up to £20, and then suddenly dropped, and everybody concerned got about £2 for their £5. Ought not the gentleman connected with that fraud to be unearthed? I suggest that it is a very remarkable piece of legislation, which proposes, after all the wrong and mischief has been done, to say that in the future only, forsooth, shall the remedy be applied. Then there was the leading case of Warner's Safe Cure. The £10 shares went up to £50 before the dealers in them knew where they were. And Mr. Warner and his gang of American sharpers plundered this country in the most marvellous American manner. When companies of this class are allowed to do this sort of thing, there must be something rotten in the state of Denmark. The hon. and learned Gentleman who is promoting this Bill has put down an Amendment to earmark his intentions, and to provide that the Bill shall only deal with all future swindles. It is a remarkable course for the hon. and learned Gentleman to pursue. I suppose the reason is that he has read so much of the doings of Warner and Lord Hindlip Allsopp, and all that class of persons, that he decided that, in future, persons in the peerage, who are connected with the brewing interest, shall be punished, and that the Peers in the past who have committed frauds on the public are to go scot free. That, in my opinion, is to take a course which cannot commend itself to the common sense of the House. I really think it is a remarkable state of facts that the English public do not turn and rend these company promoters, whose iniquity steams every day in the financial and leading newspapers. And to think that a Peer of the realm should pocket £3,000,000, and then, when it comes to be examined how many pounds he has allowed to remain in the company, it is found that only a paltry few thousands are invested, the remainder of the £3,000,000 being invested in Goschen or Government Stock. That is not a credit to the commercial status of this country. The fact that this gentleman and his friends are not torn to pieces by the indignant public shows the very remarkable state of numbness to which the public have been reduced by this system. If there is a class who deserve protection it is the class gulled by these circulars. I must say the fact of Members of Parliament lending their names to this system of company promoting is little less than a scandal, and this House, if it goes on, will become little less than a sty of guinea pigs. Of course, a Member of Parliament ought to be allowed, like any other man, to follow any business he chooses, but what I condemn is that the "M.P." should be blazoned forth and used as a bait to trap the unwary. The widow or the investor down in the country, when they see the respected name of their Member, or of some Member of the Tory Party, just made a Peer because of his connection with hops, published in association with some company, are inspirited with confidence, and invest their money. If Members of Parliament lend their names to public companies, the very name Member of Parliament will become almost as odious as the name Deputy has become in France. We know that in France a Bill was introduced to prevent Deputies lending their names to such companies. I do not know whether the Bill has been passed into law, but at any rate it has had a most salutary effect on the French community, and most of the crawling guinea pigs have been sent about their business by the electors. Of course, a number of these companies may be perfectly sound, and I believe a number of them are; but what I contend is that the great office to which we are elected in this House should not be turned into a simple connection with the promotion of companies. I see strings of Members of Parliament, dozens of them, connected with public companies. If you turn to the directory of Directors, you will find whole strings of Peers and Members of Parliament whose names are connected with these companies. Therefore, I say that what ought to be dealt with is this question of promotion in the past. It is not sufficient to deal with this evil as if it was a future evil. The mischief is done. The Conversion Scheme of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer let loose £100,000,000 for the purpose of investment. Guinness's boom opened the eyes of shareholders to investments offering the chance of 15 and 20 per cent. We ought to deal with the evil as one which commenced upon a given date. It would not do to go back to the days of the Glasgow Bank, or any case of that kind. There is a particular time which, in my opinion, ought to be taken as the starting point of fraud, and on this ground I beg to move the Amendment in the form which you have suggested, Sir, from the Chair.

Amendment proposed, at the end of the last Amendment, to insert the words—

"Provided always, that this Section shall apply to any prospectus or notice issued since the first day of October, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-six."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(1.20.) MR. WARMINGTON: I cordially concur in the observations of the hon. Member for Longford, but, at the same time, I must explain my position in this matter. In Grand Committee I gave an undertaking that the action of the Bill should be prospective, and I believe I am bound, so far as I can, to insist that the Bill should be prospective. I have an Amendment on the Paper, however, promising that the Bill should come into force as soon as possible, and I propose that the Bill shall apply to notices and prospectuses issued after 1st of October, 1890. I am afraid, therefore, I shall not be able to support the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member, but must ask the House to allow the Bill to stand as it is, with prospective action, and to come into force as soon as possible.

(1.22.) MR. ISAACSON: I cannot possibly see how the measure can be made retrospective. But if it only takes effect from 1890, I feel sure that it will do a great deal of good. I read a calculation the other day that in five years something like £180,000,000 had been absolutely wasted, or, I may say, the public have been defrauded out of that enormous sum by bogus companies. I am extremely sorry that Members on both sides of the House should lend their names to companies day after day. I should have thought the Members of the Government would have had enough to do to attend to the business of Parliament, and I do think they ought not to take these offices. I remember some time since the Honduras Loan was brought out for 8s.

*MR. SYDNEY GEDGE (Stockport): I rise to order. The point is that this Bill should be retrospective from the 1st October, 1886.

MR. ISAACSON: I do not say the hon. and learned Gentleman is connected with a case of that kind, and I should be very sorry indeed to say so. The only thing I feel is this, that the public ought to be protected, and this Bill does not go far enough to protect the public in the matter of loans. This Honduras loan was brought out at 107, and it dwindled down to 13, and the man who brought it out had to leave the country.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member must confine himself to the retrospective character of this Amendment.

MR. ISAACSON: I am anxious to obey the orders of the Chair. I do not see how this Bill is to be made retrospective without filling the Law Courts, and giving employment to some 150 gentlemen of the long robe.

*(1.26.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: I could wish for many reasons to vote with my hon. and learned Friend, but to adopt this Amendment would be a departure from the usual course of legislation. I believe there is no instance, or, at any rate, the instances are very rare, in which penal legislation has been made retrospective. Besides, if you antedate its operation why stop at 1885? Why not carry it back 10 or even 20 years? The one safe ground to take is to make the measure prospective.

*(1.27.) MR. J. M. MACLEAN: The right hon. Gentleman has pointed out the weak spot in the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman. The Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Longford is apparently directed against one or two companies to which he has strong objection.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Two or three hundred companies.

*MR. J. M. MACLEAN: The hon. Gentleman particularly specified Allsopp's, and he reproached this side of the House for investing all their money in brewery shares. I have never had a brewery share; therefore, I can speak impartially. The hon. Member throws all the blame on the Directors. He goes a good deal further than even the Bill, which proposes to make the liability of the Directors unlimited. That is a serious matter enough. But the hon. Member would allow no Member of Parliament to be a Director.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I have no objection to his being a Director; but I object to the "M.P." being used for the purposes of advertisement.

*MR. J. M. MACLEAN: That would hardly make any difference. Everybody knows whether a man is a Member of Parliament or not, and to take away the "M.P." from his name would be of very little consequence. But I would point out that the hon. Member himself has a good deal of private business, and yet he finds time to attend to business in this House very effectually. Members who are lawyers and physicians pocket fees for the advice they give. Why should Members of Parliament, with their business knowledge, be prevented from going into these companies. Why should a Member be denounced as a guinea pig because he takes fees for attending to the business of public companies? Nobody reproaches the lawyer or the physician for pocketing his fees. No doubt we should all like to be born millionaires, and then we should be like some of the hon. Members below the Gangway opposite, who have such a vehement antipathy to Directors. Some hon. Members habitually speak of Directors as criminals.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The question is solely as to the retrospective action to be given to the Bill.

*MR. J. M. MACLEAN: I would point out, with great respect, that the hon. and learned Member was allowed to make a very strong attack on Directors generally, and especially on Members of this House who happen to be connected with public companies, and I claim very respectfully the right to say a word or two in justification of the action of Members of this House, who give their leisure time to the direction of companies. Throughout this discussion hon. Members have spoken of Directors in the freest terms. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir G. Campbell), for instance, habitually speaks of Directors as sinners. [Cries of "Order."]

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is out of order in addressing himself to the general question of the conduct of Directors. The question before the House is whether the provisions of this Bill shall be made retrospective.

*MR. J. M. MACLEAN: I will not say anything further on that point, but I thought that if it was my duty to correct the false impressions that were conveyed by the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Longford. He was loudly cheered when he denounced Directors generally. He seemed to work the House up to that state of mind which reminded me of a sentence of Macaulay's—

Mr. J. M. Maclean

"We know no spectacle more ridiculous than that of the British public in one of its periodical fits of morality."

*MR. SPEAKER: I have already called the hon. Member to order on the ground that he is transgressing the rules of Debate. I must ask him to pay attention to the ruling of the Chair.

*MR. J. M. MACLEAN: It is difficult to restrain one's indignation at the attacks that have been recklessly made by the hon. and learned Member for Longford upon the reputation of perfectly innocent people, and it is rather hard that hon. Members are not permitted to reply to them. With regard to the hon. and learned Member's proposal to make the operation of the Bill retrospective, and apply the Bill to Companies already in existence, I may say that in the cases to which the hon. and learned Gentleman has referred the shareholders were as much to blame as the Directors. People, we know, go down on their knees and entreat Directors to make them an allotment, and then, if anything goes wrong, they turn round and abuse the Directors, expecting to get their losses back again. That is a thing which the House should thoroughly apprehend. This is not a question that concerns the public at large, but merely the shareholders and Directors in particular companies. I should be sorry to see the Bill made retrospective to all companies. There are a thousand millions invested in these companies, which are successfully carrying on some of the great industries of the country, and the men who direct them deserve thanks instead of being held up to reprobation as criminals.

(1.35.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I do not differ in any way from the sentiments which have been expressed by the hon. and learned Member for Longford, but I am not going to follow the hon. and learned Member in his remarks, because you, Sir, evidently are of opinion that some of the points he raised ought not to be discussed in this Amendment. I imagine that the hon. and learned Member in making those remarks, had in view the justification of his proposal that the House would adopt what, I admit, would be the rather exceptional course of making the provisions of the Bill retrospective. I do not think there is very often much blame attaching to the class of Directors. The question before the House is, whether we should be justified, on account of the blame which attaches to some Directors, in adopting this course, which is extremely unusual in English law. I, myself, must lie under the imputation of the hon. Member for Oldham, as I am suffering from one of the periodical attacks of morality, and I think it is a very good thing that the House of Commons has taken this matter up. I have voted steadily in favour of the most stringent provisions of this Bill, because, I think, it is high time that the public should be protected against the schemes of unscrupulous persons. In my opinion, the position of Membership of this House is often grossly abused, and is used for the purposes of advertisement. I do not, however, wish to do or say anything, or to make any imputation, against anyone who may happen to be a Member of this House, and who may happen, in the regular course of his life, to be a Director. That, I think, is a circumstance no one can condemn, but what I do condemn is the use of Membership of this House to advance the interests of Directors of companies. The question is whether we should, in the present Bill, do that which really would amount to what was called in the olden days a "Bill of Attainder," which had a retrospective action. I think that in doing that we should be departing from the usual course of legislation in these matters. It would be taking a very grave view of what is, unquestionably, a very grave subject. I hope that the Bill, as it stands, will be sufficient to restrain the practice complained of, and which I hope the great majority of the House are disposed to condemn. Although I am very much disinclined to vote against my hon. and learned Friend in this matter, I trust that, upon consideration, he will not press his Amendment, which certainly would almost be a solecism in legislation of this kind.

(1.40.) MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I should be most willing to support the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for Longford, for making the provisions of the Bill retrospective, if the hon. and learned Member will consent to those provisions relating back to 1881, so as to include the case of the Irish Land Purchase Company, of which Mr. Charles Stewart Parnell was the Chairman.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): What company does the hon. Member say?

MR. T. M. HEALY: What did Mr. Parnell get out of it? Did he ever receive a farthing fee?

(1.41.) MR. W. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Newington, W.): I do not know whether, if the Amendment is pressed to a Division, the right hon. Gentleman opposite intends to vote for it.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I said I objected to it.

MR. COOKE: I regard the Amendment as being open to the greatest possible objection. People expect to carry on their businesses according to the law existing at the time those businesses were started, and no business at all would be started if it were considered possible that laws of a totally different, and of a destructive, character could be established after the business had been commenced. That is the real and fundamental objection to the Amendment. However objectionable may have been the conduct of certain promoters and Directors, few people would desire to produce so disastrous a state of things as would be brought about if this Amendment were to be accepted. After all, we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that the tendency of modern times is in the direction of large industries being carried on by means of companies. It is quite possible that in the transference of a business from a private individual to a company, the individual obtains more for his business than it is worth. But after all, it is the active principle of business to sell what you have for more than it is worth. If you say that principle you will destroy the main-spring of human industry. I do not believe that the hon. and learned Member for Longford, from the tone of his remarks, is in earnest in moving this Amendment, and probably, having made his caustic remarks upon hon. Members who are Directors, he will be satisfied and withdraw the Amendment.

*(1.40.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): I hope that the hon. and learned Member for Longford will be satisfied with having raised this interesting discussion, and will withdraw his Amendment. Your ruling, Sir, renders it impossible for me to enter into the question of whether the greater portion of the losses which have occurred to investors during recent years have been due to the dishonesty of Directors or the folly of shareholders. Hon. and learned Members from Ireland will be aware that this is a branch of law I have had a great deal to do with in that country, and I must say my experience has led me to the conclusion that there is scarcely any branch of the law which could be more usefully dealt with for the protection of the general public. I say this without any invective against Directors or statement as to how these unfortunate losses have occurred. The result of my experience—such as it has been—is this, that the public require additional protection in this matter, and, therefore, I think our thanks are due to the hon. and learned Gentleman who has introduced this Bill. But, having come to the conclusion that the general investing public require protection, I must say I object to the highly penal provisions of this measure being made retrospective. Having decided to attach penal consequences to a certain course of action on the part of Directors, you should proceed with your legislation in the ordinary way, and not adopt an exceptional—and more than that, an unprecedented—course of legislation in this particular instance. Very properly the provisions of the Bill are highly penal. But this very consideration creates an insuperable objection to the proposal in the Amendment, for there is no parallel for legislation of this kind being made retrospective. I trust the hon. and learned Member will rest satisfied with the discussion he has raised and will not press his Amendment.

(1.46.) MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I think those who oppose the Amendment proceed on a complete misapprehension as to its scope. Obviously, if it created a new moral obligation, we should all vote against it, and I am sure my hon. and learned Friend would never make such an unjust proposal; but the Amendment does not propose to create any new obligation whatever. I am sure the right hon. and learned Gentleman who has just addressed the House would not for a moment urge that, up to the present, Directors have been morally entitled to mislead the public, and to lend their names to prospectuses, and father statements which they knew—or ought to have known—to be untrue. They have always been, at least, morally bound to act with prudence in investigating the statements they have been asked to give to the public, and all this Bill proposes to do is to render them liable to attach some money meaning to that responsibility. It creates no new responsibility, but merely gives an effective means of enforcing the responsibility which has always existed. As to its being unusual to pass retrospective legislation, this House constantly passes Bills which affect contracts already entered into between private persons. And I would point out that the Bill does not propose to give a criminal remedy against a fraudulent Director, but merely a civil one; and why should hon. Gentlemen opposite object to such a remedy as that being enforced against rogues and thieves, for that is the only class of people who will be prejudicially affected. Your criminal legislation has been made retrospective on other occasions, notably in 1887, when you created artificial criminal offences in Ireland; why, therefore, should you not legislate retrospectively against fraudulent Directors?

*(1.50.) MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: I challenge the hon. Member who has just sat down to point to a single case in proof of his assertion that we have passed measures dealing retrospectively with offences in Ireland. It is true there has been retrospective legislation in regard to contracts. Retrospective action with regard to contracts has been adopted in two instances—once with regard to the Ground Game Act and once with respect to the Irish Land Bills. In both instances it was objected to by large parties in this House, and in the latter case was only adopted under the pressure of strong necessity in the case of the Irish tenants. I do not think we need go so far as to say that those who would be affected by these clauses would be necessarily rogues and thieves. As the clauses are drawn many men might be brought under them who had simply been careless. When the Act has been passed notice will have been given to Directors as to the matters which it makes illegal.

It is a very different thing to say a man shall be criminally responsible in face of a law which directs attention to his responsibility, and to say he shall be criminally responsible for carelessness for which at the time he could not be made responsible, and in reference to action committed in good faith. It is proposed that the clause shall affect prospectuses or notices issued not after the passing of the Act, but after the 1st of October, 1886. The earlier parts of the clause, however, relate to the time when the Act comes into operation; and, therefore, if the Amendment be adopted, we shall have a clause which is not couched in Queen's English, or even in Parliamentary English, and which is nonsensical on the face of it.

(1.54.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I entirely agree in principle with this Amendment, and have not the least objection to put down wicked acts, but I cannot concur in the desirability of making the clause retrospective. An enormous number of Gentlemen inside and outside this House have followed the profession of "guinea-pigging," and I am afraid if this Amendment were passed we should have a panic in the country, and the Kingdom would be almost depopulated.

(2.21.) MR. WARMINGTON: I beg to propose to substitute "October" for "January" in line 16. I wish to make the Bill to come into operation on the 1st of October, 1890.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 4, page 2, line 16, to leave out the word "January," and insert the word "October."—(Mr. Warmington.)

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. WARMINGTON: I now beg to move to omit "one" after "ninety."

Amendment proposed, "To leave out the word 'one.'"

Question proposed, "That 'one' stand part of the Bill."

(2.23.) SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: As I have an Amendment on the Paper that deals with the same point, it may expedite the progress we desire to make if I explain now why I put the Amendment down and why I do not propose to move it. The Amendment just moved fixes a certain date on which this Bill is to come into operation. It seems to me that it would be of advantage to the public interest, and especially to the interest of those great undertakings which are now in the hands of Limited Liability Companies if that date were somewhat postponed. It seems to me that the result of this Bill will be to effect a very great change in the status of future Directors of Limited Liability Companies. I am sure those who promote the Bill have the very best intentions, namely, the protection of the public. But the great danger in the case of Limited Liability Companies arises not so much from the action of fraudulent Directors as from that of fraudulent promoters, who are not touched by the Bill. The provisions of this Bill make such a great change in the responsibility of honest Directors who really act up to their lights and with the utmost honesty of intention, that I think it will be very difficult in the future to induce any men of position and reputation, who have anything to lose, to become connected with or responsible for the issue of new companies. It is undoubtedly a fact that large amounts of capital have already been laid out in the preparation of perfectly sound enterprises that would come into being if nothing happened to prevent them during the next few months or the next year. These schemes, I maintain, will in all probability be hopelessly ruined by the introduction of this Bill, because those noblemen and gentlemen who have allowed their names to be connected with them will undoubtedly withdraw from all association with them, and consequently it will be impossible to put the enterprises before the public. I think that this Bill may be described as a Bill for placing the future of limited liability in the hands of guinea-pigs and men of straw.

*MR. SPEAKER: The Amendment is to omit "ninety-one" for the purpose of inserting "ninety." The hon. Gentleman is hardly entitled to go into the matters he is dealing with.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: Of course, Sir, I do not contest your ruling, but the point I wish to put before the House is that if a very early date be assigned for the operation of the Bill, it will imperil a large number of perfectly sound and legitimate enterprises that have been prepared for submission to the public because of the danger that must result to gentlemen who have allowed their names, or have intended to allow their names, to be associated with the prospectuses about to be issued. I submit that this may possibly be regarded as a reason why a very early date should not be fixed for the coming into operation of the Bill. I do not propose to move my Amendment, as I do not wish to obstruct the House in coming to a decision; but I urge these facts as a reason why the hon. Member should not fix too early a date for the coming into operation of the measure.

*SIR R. FOWLER (London): I am glad to hear the announcement that my hon. Friend does not intend to propose his Amendment. I am not very much in love with the Bill, for reasons I hope to state hereafter, and I have, therefore, voted on many occasions with my hon. Friend beside me. I think the hon. Member opposite has fixed very properly on the 1st of January, 1891, because I think, if the Bill is to become law, it would be a great mistake to defer the time at which it is to come into operation.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: The date now proposed is October, 1890.

*SIR R. FOWLER: I am sorry to hear of that alteration. It changes my view of the matter. At the same time if the date fixed were October, 1891, that would allow a large number of companies to be brought out, and would lead to things that might be very prejudicial.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. WARMINGTON: Then I have to propose an Amendment at the desire of the President of the Board of Trade. I have submitted it to the right hon. Gentleman, and it has his approval.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the last Amendment, to insert the words "and shall only apply to prospectuses and notices issued after that date."—(Mr. Warmington.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(2.31.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I think this Amendment most objectionable. We have heard from influential Members of the House what their objections are to the retrospective action of the Bill, and the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Warmington) has delivered himself of the opinion that it would be a hardship upon promoters and Directors to make the action of the Bill retrospective, but what does he now propose to do? He is going to give a kind of scapegoat period between the months of June and October within which frauds may continue. This Act would naturally take effect immediately after the Queen's Assent, but there is to be a close time for fraudulent Directors up to October, 1890. Well, I object to a close time for swindlers. Promoters, Directors, and everybody else have had long advertisement that this Act is about to be passed; but so tender is the hon. and learned Gentleman for those whom this Bill is to punish, that he proposes to allow the flow of a flood of felony between now and October. A more remarkable proposal I have never heard; it is a condemnation of the hon. and learned Gentleman's own Bill. I can understand his objection to my proposal to make the Act retrospective, but here he is branding his own Bill as a measure that is really not much wanted. He says, in effect, there is no need of hurry about it after all, and these poor guileless promoters should have time to run their merry rigs a little longer. I am amazed that the hon. and learned Gentleman should cast such a slur upon his own legislation, practically justifying the opposition of hon. Gentlemen opposite. "You are right," he says. "The Bill is objectionable, and there should be ample scope and verge enough" for these operations up to October 1 next, and this is assented to, practically, without debate. I suppose this is to allow the development of schemes now in process of incubation. Is this to be tolerated? Are we to wait for months, so that fraudulent proposals and prospectuses now, perhaps, in the printers' hands, can be put before the public? Really, I think this Bill has had from its own parent the most severe stab it could receive. Apparently the view of the hon. and learned Gentleman is that there should be a close time for fraud. You may commit a fraud on September 30, but not on October 1. Hon. Gentlemen opposite may date their prospectuses September 30, but not later.

MR. JOHNSTON: Does the hon. and learned Gentleman attribute to Members on this side the circulation of fraudulent prospectuses?

MR. T. M. HEALY: The hon. Gentleman is quite mistaken. I say anybody can issue a fraudulent prospectus on September 3 and is not to be struck at by this Act; but if he dates it October 1, then he renders himself liable to punishment. The hon. Member for South Belfast does not carry into public life that geniality we all recognise in his private capacity. He suggested a moment ago the Bill dating from 1881, but the case he put is of a wholly different character to those we have in contemplation in passing this Bill. The company formed for migration purposes was one from which no Director derived a penny. The Directors were mistaken perhaps, but they drew no fees; but this Bill does not touch such a case; it strikes at false and misleading statements issued. But I rose to protest against the suggestion that there should be a close time for fraud. I say the moment this Bill becomes an Act, let it come into operation. I deny that this is a Bill so unjust and harsh in its operation that any interval should be allowed.

*(2.36.) MR. BARING (London): I very much regret the introduction of words suspending the operation of the Bill until the 1st October. I think it should run from the passing of the Act, and all the more because we have heard from my hon. Friend near me that there are sundry noblemen and gentlemen who are considering whether their names shall appear on prospectuses now in preparation.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: Not within my knowledge.

*MR. BARING: I thought my hon. Friend spoke of what he knew; but it seems he spoke of what he did not know. I think, looking at the serious nature of the evils with which the Bill is to deal, we ought not to give them what has been called a close time, but as soon as the Bill becomes law it should be enforced. I could not agree with the proposal to make penal legislation retrospective; but when we make penal legislation, it should come into force with the passing of the Act.

(2.37.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I quite agree, in that view. I am against a close time of any description, whether for Directors or for hares. Certainly I cannot conceive any possible argument by which a measure of this kind, if it is justifiable at all, should not take effect as soon as Parliament has given assent to it. As I said before, in opposition to the retrospective Amendment, that it was a departure from Parliamentary usage, so I say in opposition to this Amendment that it is equally a departure from Parliamentary usage without justification.

*MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the House that, as amended, the clause runs thus:—"This Act shall come into operation on the 1st of October, 1890."

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will it not be competent for us to vote against the clause as amended; and, the clause being struck out, the Act would come into operation at once?

*MR. SPEAKER: No; the proposal that the clause stand part of the Bill is made in Committee.

(2.38.) MR. SETON-KARR (St. Helen's): Are not the words now before us consequential upon the decision of the House that the Bill shall come into operation on October 1, and are they really necessary? The Bill does not apply to prospectuses issued before that date, or what is the meaning of the clause? If we have already passed the words declaring that the Bill shall come into operation on October 1, naturally the Bill cannot apply to prospectuses before that date.

*(2.38.) MR. SPEAKER: The House has passed the clause that this Act shall come into operation on October 1, 1890, and the Amendment now proposes that the Act shall only apply to prospectuses and notices issued after that date. The point is how to deal with notices issued between the passing of the Act and the date for the operation of the Act.

(2.39.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I assume, undoubtedly, that prospectuses issued meantime will be covered by the Act, but legal procedure can only be taken after October 1. Undoubtedly, as the clause stands, all bogus and improper prospectuses come under the Act as soon as it passes; but these proposed words will prevent that.

MR. SETON-KARR: It seems to me that the Amendment is the natural consequence of what the House has accepted, and the hon. and learned Member's interpretation makes nonsense of the Bill. The Bill cannot apply to prospectuses issued before October 1, when we accept that is the date of the operation of the Act.

*(2.40.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: As I understand it, the Bill comes into operation on October 1, and, that being so, no prospectus issued before that time would come within the operation of the Act. For operative purposes there is no Act until that date. It seems to me that the words proposed by my hon. and learned Friend are not required, and I really do not know why they are introduced. Can the right hon. Gentleman opposite give us any possible reason?

*(2.40.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): Of course, I cannot give a legal opinion. I expressed my view that the liabilities under the Bill should not attach to notices issued before the passing of the Bill. My right hon. and learned Friend near me informs me that the words are not necessary, and I do not see why they should be introduced.

*(2.41.) MR. MADDEN: It appears to me that the House, having fixed the 1st of October as the commencement of the legal consequences that follow under the Act, the Amendment expresses the exact position and the legal consequence of fixing the commencement of the Act at that date. The words add nothing to the meaning, but, on the other hand, they are absolutely harmless.

*MR. BARING: I rather wish to have words inserted applying the Act to prospectuses and notices issued between the passing of the Act and October 1.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: I submit, Sir, that after your ruling any further discussion is really little better than obstruction.

MR. WARMINGTON: I do not myself think the words are necessary, and I am quite ready to withdraw the Amendment.

(2.42.) MR. CHANCE: As bearing upon the present position, I may mention that the date of the issue of the prospectus is not the vital point, the date of subscription is the root of the action. If the Bill is allowed to go through as it now stands, the result will be that a person who subscribes to a company after this date, the promoters having issued their prospectus the day before the date, will have no action. The subscription gives the right of action, but there is no word in the Bill as to date of subscription; it is only provided that the Act shall come into existence on a certain day. It seems to me it would be well to have this matter defined in some better manner. We had better understand clearly whether the date of the prospectus, or the date of the subscription is the vital date in respect to the commencement of the action.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(2.43.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I now propose to add after the word "ninety" these words: "But this Act shall apply to all prospectuses and notices issued after the passing of this Act." The object these words would effect would be that, while no legal procedure can be adopted to punish promoters of a fraudulent character between now and October, yet the moment October arrives the legal machinery of this Act comes into operation for the punishment of anything of a fraudulent nature which may have taken place in the interval between the passing of the Act and that date. I am obliged for the suggestion to the hon. Member for the City (Mr. Baring.) He is a great authority on financial matters, and I am quite sure he will lend the weight of his authority to protect us against this close time for fraud, and to prevent the launching of dishonest schemes now on the stocks.

*(2.44.) MR. SPEAKER: The House has agreed that the Act shall come into operation on October 1, 1890, and that operation refers to prospectuses and notices. What the hon. and learned Member now proposes amounts not to a limitation, but to a contradiction of what has already been agreed upon by applying the Act to all prospectuses and notices issued after the passing of the Act.

MR. CHANCE: On a point of order, Sir. There is a difficulty as to the date upon which the Act shall come into operation, whether it shall be the date of prospectus or the date of subscription for shares. Perhaps the Attorney General for Ireland can explain that.

(2.45.) SIR W. HARCOURT: To contradict a provision previously laid down is of course not allowable; but, as I understand, the hon. and learned Member wishes to make an exception. Now, if we could not fix a date, and afterwards make an exception to it, we should not be able to legislate at all. We must fix a general date, though we may choose to make certain exceptions. If the hon. and learned Gentleman puts in the words "Except as to prospectuses and notices," &c., that would show that the reference is to a portion of these proceedings and not to the whole. Proceedings may not be instituted until October. We know there are cases continually where, in order to prevent evasions of an Act, you have to put in a clause to provide that there shall be no violation of the Act while discussion is going on. So here we shall be stultifying ourselves before the public if we pass an Act in a form allowing impunity to promoters during the months of July, August, and September. What possible reason is there for allowing such a thing? It is possible, I submit, to make exceptions, and I think we ought to do it here to maintain our credit for common sense.

*(2.47.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The argument of the right hon. Gentleman is addressed to a point which has already been decided. He desires that the Act shall come into force immediately on its passing, but the House has decided it shall come into force on October 1. If we were now to put in words to provide that prospectuses issued between the passing of the Act and October 1 should render the issuers liable to the penalties provided that would be anticipating the date already fixed, and would be directly contrary to what has already been done.

(2.48.) MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): I was about to urge the same point. It is not a question of policy or prudence or good sense. If it is nonsensical, fortunately there is another branch of the Legislature where it can be put right. It is a matter of order; the words have been passed declaring the Act comes into operation on October 1, and the words of the Act are to be read as if spoken by the Legislature on that day.

SIR W. HARCOURT: There may be exceptions.

MR. COURTNEY: The gist of the Bill is Clause 3, which declares that certain statements shall be followed by certain consequences. It is further declared that the Act shall come into operation on October 1, and the proposed Amendment is a direct contradiction, declaring that the operation shall be immediate.

(2.49.) MR. SEXTON: Could my right hon. Friend move his Amendment as regards prospectuses or notices, not as regards both? Directed to both it would be a contradiction, but not to the one or the other.

*MR. SPEAKER: The proper time to raise the point would have been when the hon. and learned Gentleman moved October 1, 1890, as the date for the operation of the Act. To say now that the operation of the Act shall be from the date of its passing will be to virtually contradict what has been passed by the House. I am afraid there is no remedy at this stage.

(2.50.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I appreciate entirely, Sir, the force of what you say; and I will, on the Motion for Third Reading, move the re-committal of the Bill to omit this clause, and I presume that in this I shall have the assent of the President of the Board of Trade.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be set down for Third Reading on Wednesday."—(Mr. Warmington.)

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to give notice that, on the Motion for Third Reading, I shall move to re-commit the Bill in order to strike out the entire clause, and this will have the effect of making the Act speak as from the day it receives the Royal Assent.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill to be read the third time upon Wednesday next.

ORCHARDS RATING EXEMPTION BILL.
(No. 177.)

Bill, as amended, considered; read the third time, and passed.

PHARMACY ACT (IRELAND) (1875)
AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 241.)

Bill, as amended, considered.

MR. SEXTON: I regret to move the Adjournment of the Debate; but, under the circumstances, I hope it will be accepted. It will be observed that all the Amendments to the Bill stand in my name—

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member should formally move an Amendment before I put a Motion for Adjournment.

Clause (First election of representatives of chemists and druggists to council).—(Mr. Sexton.)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."—(Mr. Sexton.)

MR. T. M. HEALY: I am surprised that the hon. Member for South Belfast, with whom I thought we had a perfect understanding, should wish to proceed with the Bill now. We assented to the Bill passing Committee, making a pro forma Amendment in order that there should be a Report stage, with the object of coming to an agreement between the chemists and the Pharmaceutical Society. Of course, it would not be right to refer to private conversation in reference to a public matter; but we did understand that the hon. Gentleman was willing to postpone the Bill, and it was our influence secured the passage of the Bill through Committee. We are not hostile to the Bill; we only desire to give effect to an arrangement which we hope may be arrived at with the Pharmaceutical Society—to reconcile conflicting interests. It is with that object that I now move the adjournment.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

*MR. MADDEN: I hope my hon. Friend will accept the Motion. There are only a few remaining points of difference to be settled between the parties referred to, and, in fact, time will be saved by a present postponement. I hope that the points of difference will become fewer in the interval, and when the Bill comes on again, an arrangement will have been arrived at, and there will be no opposition to this useful Bill becoming law.

MR. JOHNSTON: It is but a reasonable proposition, and I accept it.

Question put, and agreed to.

Question proposed, "That the consideration of the Bill be resumed on Monday."—(Mr. Johnston.)

MR. SEXTON: I would observe that the Bill is entitled to a certain priority of position if set down for a private Members' day; but on Government days it will be blocked by the 12 o'clock Rule. I would, therefore, suggest that it be taken on Wednesday next.

MR. JOHNSTON: I am quite willing, but I thought it was the wish of hon. Members to take it on Monday.

Debate adjourned till Wednesday next.

INTESTATES' ESTATES BILL.—(No. 59.)

Bill considered in Committee, and reported without Amendment; read the third time, and passed.

HARES PRESERVATION BILL [LORDS].

(NO. 187.) COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 2.

*(3.12.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I desire to move the Amendment which stands in my name, and, in doing so, desire to say that I have no objection to the preservation of hares in the close season, but I think it is rather strong action for the House of Commons to enact that any farmer who kills a hare during a close season for the protection of his crops should be guilty of a criminal offence. My Amendment would protect the farmers from this hardship, while destroying the interest of the poacher and trader in the killing of hares during close season. The farmer has no means of defending his crops against the ravages of these creatures except by killing them; and surely it is unreasonable that his doing so in close time should be a penal act. I have no sympathy with poachers and dealers who kill at this season for purposes of profit, nor do I think that sporting interests should weigh against the practical interest of the farmer. Kindliness to dumb creatures I recognise; but it is a sentiment that does not apply to circumstances where these creatures are preserved to the loss of the farmer in order that, in the coursing season, they may be run down and killed under circumstances of the greatest cruelty. I think the desired object will be secured by taking away the incentive to kill during the close season for purposes of profit; but I hope the commonsense of the Committee will recognise the justice of allowing the farmer to take the necessary steps to protect his crops from the ravages of these animals.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 12, to leave out all the words after the word "shall," to the word "or," in line 15, and insert the words "sell, offer for sale for money, or any other consideration whatever, any hare or leveret."—(Mr. Eslemont.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'wilfully kill' stand part of the Clause."

(3.16.) COLONEL DAWNAY (York, N.R., Thirsk): I can assure the Committee that, so far from wishing to overthrow the principle of the Ground Game Act of 1880, the promoters of the Bill wish to affirm that principle and to secure to the farmers the privilege granted by that Act, which is now in danger of vanishing altogether. Since the Ground Game Act of 1880 hares have been slaughtered in season and out of season, so much so that in many parts of the country they have almost become extinct. Parliament has passed laws to protect sea birds, singing birds, and even coarse fish; and yet the hare, which is a valuable article of food, and the most defenceless of all British wild animals, is slaughtered all the year round, and at a time when it is totally unfit for food, and when the death of a doe hare involves the lingering death by starvation of one or two leverets. In the market towns of England, Scotland, and Ireland one may often see in the spring time exposed for sale a doe hare dripping with milk or big with young, and by her side wretched leverets no bigger than rats. It is to stop this barbarous cruelty and this wanton waste of food that this Bill is brought in. I hope the Amendment will not be accepted, because, if it is, the Bill will not be worth the paper it is printed on.

(3.18.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I waited with interest to know the opinion of Her Majesty's Government on a question affecting the sport and agriculture of the country, and I find the Government represented on this occasion by the Attorney General, and I suppose he is prepared to answer for both. It would have been interesting to see the Minister for Agriculture here, but I suppose his presence is inconvenient, because in 1880, on the Hares Bill, he spoke very strongly, and voted against this very proposition. With every respect for what my hon. Friend says, the Bill does contravene directly the principle of the Act of 1880, which is that the occupier of the land shall deal as he chooses with the ground game for the protection of his crops. Hares are very destructive animals, and the Bill would protect them just when their ravages are at the worst.

SIR H. SELWIN-IBBETSON (Essex, Epping): No.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Can the right hon. Gentleman maintain that hares do no injury to growing crops from March to July? I have the greatest respect for the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman on agricultural matters, but I can only suppose he can maintain such a proposition on the assumption that all the land in Essex has gone out of cultivation. To say that hares do not commit ravages upon crops in these months is to make an assertion every farmer would laugh at. What, too, becomes of all the recommendations that farmers should turn their attention to raising vegetables? It is the very period when hares ought not to be preserved. I can give an authority for that in the person of a former colleague of the right hon. Gentleman. In 1880, Colonel Ruggles-Brise, a gentleman of great experience in agriculture, proposed that the occupier should be allowed to kill rabbits at all seasons, and to kill and take hares during the months of February, March, and April. The proposal of Colonel Ruggles-Brise was not to allow hares to be killed at other times, but in the months of February, March, and April, because this was the period in which hares are most destructive to the crops of the farmer; and in his speech on that occasion he declared his opinion that a close time for hares was not necessary. On the same occasion the Minister for Agriculture spoke, and he said if ever the operation of farmers were to undergo a change and market gardening should prevail all over the country, which he did not believe would ever be the case, the objections to the Amendment would be reasonable; but he thought it was undesirable to apply to the whole Bill that which should only apply to exceptional cases. Mr. Rodwell, another Representative of the Eastern Counties, and, as many hon. Members know, a great sportsman, expressed an opinion that it was impossible to fix any close time for hares. After that proposal, another was made almost similar to the proposal before the House now, and the present Minister for Agriculture spoke strongly against this proposal and also voted against it. Lord Elcho, the present Lord Wemyss, put the case in a nutshell when he said—

“If this is a Bill for the preservation of sport, nothing is more reasonable than a close time; but if it is a Bill to promote good husbandry, there should be no close time.”

That Amendment was defeated in 1880 by 148 to 58, the right hon. Gentleman and his County Member friends voting in the majority. It is idle for my hon. Friend to say the Bill is not intended to contravene the Act of 1880; it is intended to overthrow it root and branch. The Preamble of that Act gives occupiers the right to protect their crops against the ravages of ground game, and it is in the spring time when crops are coming up that the gnawing down by these animals is most injurious. The desire of country gentlemen to promote the multiplication of hares is interesting, for it shows that agriculture is very flourishing; that crops are so good and prices so high that more hares to eat the crops are desirable lest the farmer should become too prosperous. We have a Conservative Party in Office which has the agricultural interest of the country at heart, and a Minister specially charged with the care of that interest. Why, Sir, they brought under our notice the question of bi-metallism; they then introduced a Tithe Bill for the farmers and country gentlemen; and, in the third place—

Sir W. Harcourt

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I rise to a point of order. I have to ask you, Sir, whether the introduction of the subject of Bi-metallism and the Tithes Bill has anything to do with a measure to provide a close time for hares?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am only using these matters by way of illustrating my contention than the only practical measure of relief for the agricultural interest introduced by Her Majesty's Government this Session is a Bill giving a close time for hares. This, no doubt, is a measure that will be satisfactory to the large farmers and wealthy landowners who are desirous of preserving hares for sport. They say there are too few at present, and it is desirable that they should have more. But I may be allowed to say a word or two for another class who are not rolling in wealth. I allude to the small holders—the men you profess to have so much interest in and to desire to protect. Although the great owners and large farmers may be overwhelmed with prosperity—although the farmers of Lincolnshire may be longing for more hares, I must remind the House that, although the Minister for Agriculture has said that market gardening is a thing to be looked down upon, and that it would never extend largely in England, we on this side differ from that opinion, and both hope and believe there will be a great extension of this industry, to which the ravages caused by ground game are a source of very serious injury. The whole of a market gardener's crops may be destroyed by hares, and consequently the question is a serious one. It is, therefore, from this point of view that the Bill ought to be regarded. The question of a few hundred pounds more or less may not be a matter of great importance to the great Lincolnshire farmers, but the question of a few shillings may be the means of determining whether a small holder can maintain his allotment or not. It is upon this issue that the Bill must be judged. In point of fact, everybody knows that this Bill is not one which is really intended to affect the interest of agriculture. It is a sportsman's Bill—

THE CHAIRMAN: I would point out to the right hon. Gentleman that we are not discussing the Second Reading of the Bill, but an Amendment dealing with the question of selling hares.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Very well, Sir; I will reserve what I have to say on that point until the proper time has arrived. But I may remind the Committee that there really has been no Second Reading Debate on this Bill at all. The Bill has been pushed—I might almost say smuggled—through the House in the small hours of the morning, and if Bills of this kind are to be passed without any discussion on their merits it will not increase the confidence with which they are regarded. With regard to the question of selling hares, that is directly connected with the subject of the food of the people. The selling of hares depends upon the supply, and I, for one, absolutely deny the statement that there is anything like a scarcity of hares in this country. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Members who deny this should state their reasons. I may inform the Committee that when in the North, not many months ago, I was at a place where there had been a big day's sport, and there was a good deal of talk about the number of pheasants they had killed. I said, "I do not want to know anything about the pheasants; tell me about the hares. How many did you kill?" They told me 338.

THE MARQUESS OF CARMARTHEN (Lambeth, Brixton): Will the right hon. Gentleman state where this occurred?

SIR W. HARCOURT: Yes, at Lord Durham's. But I should not have mentioned the name had it not been asked for. The question is, are there sufficient hares in the country or are there not? I remember saying to a friend of mine "What! do you think of killing upwards of 300 hares in a day?" and he replied, "Well, we can all do that." I say, therefore, if you can all do that, what nonsense it is to say the hare is an extinct animal. You cannot go and kill 300 hares in a day, and your position as to hares is ridiculous. I have inquired also of a great many friends of mine who indulge in sport in a moderate way, who tell me there is no difficulty round Windsor and in the neighbourhood of London in getting as many hares as they want. I will tell you what this Bill is for, and everybody here knows it. It is because at present the tenant farmers of England do not produce sufficient hares to supply the coursing meetings. As regards the insufficient supply for other purposes, I absolutely deny the statement. In the neighbourhood where I live I asked a gentleman whether he found a scarcity of hares, and his reply was, "Not at all." It is only where the preservation of ground game is seriously abused that the tenant farmers take advantage of the Ground Game Act, and destroy the hares. You may buy as many hares at the poulterers as ever. I know quite as much about the poulterers' shops as hon. Members opposite, as I have made it my business to study this subject scientifically. There is a large poulterer in London with whom I deal, and through whose means I have eaten through all the hares of Europe. I can tell my hon. Friend opposite that he may buy as many hares as he liked. I have bought a large hare, weighing 12lbs., for 2s. Surely that is cheap food. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Members say "Oh." It was a Russian hare. I will not affirm that it was very good, but it was nourishing. It is nonsense to say you must be able to eat up the crops of the small gardeners and allotment holders in order to provide food for the people, when it is a well-known fact that foreign hares come into our markets from America, Belgium, Russia, Austria, and Hungary by hundreds of thousands, and they are just as good hares as our English hares. ["No!"] Well, that is a matter of taste. I have eaten Russian hares, Austrian hares, and Hungarian hares, and they are exactly the same as the English hares. Therefore, all this outcry about the food of the people is sheer nonsense, and everybody knows it.

COLONEL DAWNAY: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon, but he has mistaken our point. We say that the killing of doe hares in milk, and when unfit for food, is brutality, and our aim is to stop that brutality by means of this measure.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Brutality! That, it seems, is the only point the sporting gentlemen care about. We can all understand the kindly heartedness which sees a hare torn to pieces by greyhounds for sport—the humanity of those who hear the screams of the wounded hare at the cover side, and yet are shocked at the brutality of shooting the animal. To my mind, one of the most shocking things I know of is to hear the screaming of a wounded hare, but hon. Members opposite want more hares to scream, and nothing shows this more than the interruption of the hon. Gentleman. I would ask him how many doe hares are there with young in the month of July? I wonder that hon. Gentlemen can endeavour to persuade the House to extend protection to hares on so preposterous a proposition. Do hon. Gentlemen on the other side assert that July is a month in which hares are generally with young? Everybody knows that July is the month in which we eat leverets.

COLONEL DAWNAY: Hares are bred from the end of February to the beginning of August.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Will the hon. Member say that August is a brood month for hares?

COLONEL DAWNAY: I said from February to the beginning of August, but, of course, they mostly breed in March and April.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I only wanted to see how far these sporting gentlemen would go. Everybody knows the phrase "Mad as a March hare," and really some hon. Members in their zeal in this Bill seem to resemble March hares.

MR. WHARTON (Ripon): The Bill only proposes protection up to the 1st of July. We are not now dealing with July.

SIR W. HARCOURT: If the right hon. Gentleman the Minister for Agriculture will stand at the Table, and say June is a breeding month for hares, I shall be bound to believe him, and also to believe the Pope on a question of dogma. I say that this is not a Bill for promoting the sale of hares as food. It is a Bill for the promotion of coursing meetings, where bags of hares are turned out to be run down by dogs. I should like to hear whether the Minister of Agriculture is prepared vehemently to support this Bill. I want to hear his statement of the views entertained by the Government on the subject. For my part, I am speaking in the interests of the holders of allotments and small farms. Everybody knows that the question affecting hares differs totally from the question of rabbits—

Sir W. Harcourt

MR. CHAPLIN: I rise to order. I must ask you, Mr. Courtney, whether the speech of the right hon. Gentleman is directed to the Amendment, which is simply to insert hares that are sold instead of hares being killed. Is not this in reality a Second Reading speech?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I submit, Sir, that the question of selling hares relates to the production of hares, and, therefore, I am entitled to argue whether or not there is an increase of the hares that are to be sold.

THE CHAIRMAN: The whole argument so far has been directed to the offence of selling and not the offence of killing, and should be confined to that question.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I do not exactly understand the distinction. I should imagine, according to the old precept, "You must first catch your hare," the selling of hares has relation to the catching of hares, and the principal question is: Are there enough hares to catch in order that they may be sold. I hold that there are abundance of hares in this country for all legitimate purposes; that this Bill is a sportsman's Bill, which will inflict injustice on the small occupiers throughout the Kingdom, by depriving them of the right to kill hares on their own property, and to sell them, and, under these circumstances, I support the Amendment of my hon. Friend.

*(3.50.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): After a speech of nearly half an hour just delivered by the right hon. Gentleman, I will only detain the House a few moments, confining myself to such of his remarks as were relevant to the Amendment. I should not have troubled the House but for the somewhat sneering observations at the commencement of the right hon. Gentleman's speech. I do not see why the Attorney General should not express his opinion on this matter as well as an ex-Solicitor General or ex-Home Secretary, and certainly after the speech we have just heard I should not have the slightest objection to enter into a competitive examination with the right hon. Gentleman either in natural history or agriculture. One of the main arguments of the right hon. Gentleman has been that market gardens will spread, and that hares will eat up the produce. I think that the right hon. Gentleman might have read the Bill.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I never said market gardens; I said small holdings.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I took down the right hon. Gentleman's words myself, and I am in the recollection of those who heard the earlier part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech, in which he referred to market gardens. He quoted a speech from Hansard in which my right hon. Friend referred to market gardens. Such is the memory of the right hon. Gentleman! He does not remember what he said a few minutes ago. There is a distinct provision in the Bill that it should not apply to hares and leverets inside nursery or other gardens, and, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman's observation—

SIR W. HARCOURT: I never made it.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I cannot accept the denial of the right hon. Gentleman.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Very good. Then I say you violate the courtesy of the House.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: It is a matter of recollection to those who have been in the House during the last half-hour..

SIR W. HARCOURT: I never referred to market gardens, except so far as the words were included in the quotation. No statement of my own I gave referred to anything except small holdings.

\*SIR R. WEBSTER: I am unable to accept the recollection of the right hon. Gentleman, but I will not continue to debate the matter. The point which we are now discussing is whether or not hares are to be sold, and we have heard a great deal of useful information about the breeding time of hares. The Bill only proposes a close time up to the 1st of July, so that the right hon. Gentleman has not even read the Bill. Does the right hon. Gentleman deny that during those months doe hares are with young, and that young hares, when the mother is killed, often die a cruel and lingering death without doing good to anyone? The right hon. Gentleman has told us that he has eaten Russian hares, and that they are quite as good as English hares—and apparently they must be most nourishing food, but I do not think that in his own house, at all events, the right hon. Gentleman would eat a doe hare killed in March or April, or if he did he would not do it a second time. Then we have heard about the seeds coming up. As a matter of fact, nine-tenths of the wheat comes up in the autumn. Perhaps in his part of the country crops come up at a different time. The right hon. Gentleman says that this Bill is a direct infraction of the Ground Game Act during particular months. There might be something in his argument, but for  $8\frac{1}{2}$  months in the year the farmer is free to shoot and catch hares, and I ask, is there anyone who will deny that if the farmer wishes to keep the hares down he cannot do it in those  $8\frac{1}{2}$  months? As I understand it, there is no complaint on the part of tenant farmers at not being allowed to kill hares during the proposed close time. The right hon. Gentleman has told us of his distinguished friends who have killed large bags of hares, but the right hon. Gentleman has not given his personal experience of the agricultural counties, where there are large numbers of tenants occupying the land without large preserves. I apologise for intruding on the House, feeling, as I do, that I ought not to have addressed it, having regard to the observations of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. I hope and trust that the Amendment will be discussed on its merits, and that those topics which have no bearing upon the matter will not be gone into.

*(4.2.) SIR J. PEASE (Durham, Barnard Castle): I hope it is not difficult to discuss a question of this kind without warmth even on such a warm day. I desire to say that in supporting this Bill I am only carrying out the views of agriculturists in my own neighbourhood. It does not repeal a single word of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby's Bill. I have taken no part out of the House in the agitation on this question, but I am familiar with agriculture in my own part of the country, and I know that in the wide district of the North-Riding of Yorkshire, known as the Cleveland district, every farmer but one supports the Bill—and the exception is a coursing man who wants the power of killing hares all the year round. There are good reasons for supporting the provisions of the Bill. They will not cause the farmer any inconvenience, for with a close time, commencing 15th of March or 1st of April, he will have ample time during the period when hares ought to be killed, in which to destroy every hare that is likely to prey on his crops. I venture to say that on any farm within seven days of the 15th of March you could put down every surplus hare you are not desirous of having there. This seems to me a very simple and natural Bill, commending itself to every naturalist and every humanitarian. It is really the best compliment that could be paid to the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, because it shows that the right hon. Gentleman's Bill has worked so hardly on hares as almost to cause them in many places to become extinct.

(4.4.) SIR H. SELWIN-IBBETSON : After the speech we have just listened to I do not suppose I should have troubled the House with any remarks on the question if it had not been for the very pointed reference made to me by the right hon. Gentleman on the Front Bench opposite. I will not, after your ruling, Sir, follow the right hon. Gentleman's discursive speech, but I may say that what struck me more than anything else in that speech was that the New Forest must be a very happy hunting ground, because the right hon. Gentleman's experience of it enables him to set his knowledge of agriculture and field sports, and his views not only of agriculturalists but of small holders generally throughout the country, against the opinion of everybody else. Speaking now for a very large body of agriculturists in the county of Essex, I can say that the Bill is a very necessary one, if any hares are to be preserved. I do not wish to enter into competition with the right hon. Gentleman opposite in legal knowledge, but, seeing that I have the misfortune to hold in my own hands 1,600 to 2,000 acres of land, I think I may place my experience in agricultural matters against that of the right hon. Gentleman. The months mentioned in the Bill, which have been pointed out by the right hon. Gentleman as the months in which the greatest damage to crops will ensue, are not looked upon in that light by agriculturists generally. We have, at least, an equal knowledge with the right hon. Gentleman of the rotation of crops, and also of their growth, and we have had experience of the time when they are most destroyed, and I venture to say that the months selected by the right hon. Gentleman are not those in which most damage is done.

SIR W. HARCOURT : The months I quoted were those mentioned by Colonel Ruggles-Brise.

SIR H. SELWIN-IBBETSON : When Colonel Ruggles-Brise expressed his opinion he was speaking from the point of view of the opposition that was raised to an Amendment. Remember that the proposal of the Bill had not been tried by the country, and I venture to say that if Colonel Ruggles-Brise were now in the House, he would agree with me in the view I am expressing as to the opinion of the farmers of Essex. Agriculturists have had experience of the Act of the right hon. Gentleman, and they have come to the conclusion that that Act has practically destroyed a species of game to which farmers attach considerable importance. No doubt, in the days before the passing of that Act, farmers who looked upon hares as the property of the landlords regarded them with considerable jealousy, but now that they have the power of dealing with that property themselves they are quite as much in favour of the alteration in the law now proposed as the landlords. I confess I admired the knowledge the right hon. Gentleman had acquired from the poulterers' shops, but allow me to say that although we may have most delicious hares imported from foreign countries, there is no denying the fact that in this country the hare is practically becoming extinct, certainly all over the counties of which I have any knowledge, and I venture to say that the price of hares in the market will fully confirm that view. If the Amendment is passed the Bill will have no effect in checking the destruction of hares at the time when they ought to be protected. By this Bill you will not deprive the farmer of any opportunity he may wish to have of destroying these animals, and I am certain that the farmers of the country will infinitely prefer that the Bill should pass in its entirety than that it should be mutilated by this Amendment.

*(4.13.) MR. BARCLAY (Forfarshire): No doubt the Bill is a violation of the compromise arrived at on the passing of the Ground Game Act, when, on the one hand, the farmer obtained the right to kill hares and rabbits all the year round, and, on the other hand, certain restrictions were imposed upon his mode of killing him—which restrictions have proved very inconvenient, especially in the case of rabbits. To a certain extent I sympathise with the Bill, but I do not think there is really any scarcity of hares, though that is one of the chief arguments adduced for opposing the Amendment. I do not think that the price of hares is sensibly higher than before the Ground Game Act was passed. There is no doubt that in some parts of the country hares are now as plentiful as ever they were, or, at least, as plentiful as they should be, whilst in other parts they, no doubt, are scarce. They always were scarce in some places. It does not always depend upon the killing as to the number of hares there are in a district, but the food there is for them. The Amendment meets the case of hares being with young being exposed in poulterers' shops. Such an abuse will be prohibited if the Amendment is adopted, and I think the hon. Member in charge of the Bill would do well to accept the proposal. The Game Acts will deal with the case of poachers and unauthorised persons. If the large farmers want to preserve hares they can do so. Let them prevent poachers from trespassing on their lands; and as to the smaller farmers, I am convinced they do not want this Bill. They do not like to be interfered with by a new Game Act. I hope the hon. Member in charge of the Bill will be disposed to accept the Amendment. I think it meets the case, and will prevent hares from being exposed in shops during the breeding season. As far as the cultivators of farms are concerned, I think they have power enough to preserve hares to the extent they desire.

(4.19.) MR. CHAPLIN: I wish to say a few words in support of the very moderate and reasonable speech addressed to the House by my right hon. Friend the Member for Essex (Sir H. Selwin-Ibbetson), because I think the great majority of the House is in favour of making progress with the Bill, and of passing it into law as soon as possible. I do not intend to quarrel with the character or motives of the speech delivered by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) or to deal with the various topics he raised, although I am bound to say it offers a most tempting theme for discussion. The right hon. Gentleman questioned altogether the accuracy of my hon. and learned Friend's (the Attorney General's) recollection as to the fact that the right hon. Gentleman introduced into his speech arguments in support of market gardens. I may say I took down his words at the time, and I turned to my hon. and learned Friend, and said, "Half his argument is entirely answered by the Bill itself, because Clause 1 provides that the measure shall not apply to nurseries or other gardens."

SIR W. HARCOURT: If the right hon. Gentleman will excuse me, he will see I have put down on the Paper an Amendment to add to the word "gardens" the words "small holdings."

MR. CHAPLIN: I do not know what the right hon. Gentleman meant, but, in justice to my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, I felt bound to tell the Committee what took place. This is a Bill to provide a close time for hares. The Amendment which has been moved would, in my opinion, only have the effect of making the Bill considerably weaker than it is at present. The right hon. Gentleman supported the Amendment, he said, in the interest of the farmers, and the hon. Member who has just sat down expressed the opinion that, in the view, at all events, of the small farmers the Bill is objectionable. I do not know the grounds on which the hon. Member has formed that opinion, but I have endeavoured to ascertain the opinions of farmers of all descriptions, and I find precisely the opposite view prevailing. I believe there is a very general desire that the Bill should pass without material alteration. Farmers now enjoy the right of killing hares, and, very naturally, do not wish that they should become extinct—a consummation which does not appear to be very far distant at the present time in many parts of the country. Surely, this is a very reasonable and moderate Bill, and, whether we agree or disagree with it, I think we have a right to ask that the Amendments may be discussed in a reasonable, concise, and business-like manner, and that Members who oppose the Bill will not resort to those reprehensible tactics to which recourse is sometimes had for the purpose of defeating Bills. With reference to the argument that crops will be damaged during the proposed close time, it is enough to point out that the present Amendment would not obviate the possibility of such damage. There are other Amendments on the Paper which, I think, are very fully deserving of consideration, and to which I am sure Gentlemen sitting behind me will give full consideration. Under these circumstances I hope the right hon. Gentleman (Sir W. Harcourt) will re-consider his position and use his great influence for the purpose of inducing his friends to consider the Bill in a fair and reasonable manner.

(4.25.) MR. GURDON (Norfolk, Mid): In my part of the country I believe the Bill is supported by owners of land, occupiers of land, agricultural labourers, and even those other gentlemen who live by taking hares in an indirect way. In fact, the feeling in favour of the Bill is practically unanimous. We do not entirely agree with the limits of the close time fixed in the Bill, and I certainly should have liked to see adopted an Amendment which was placed on the Paper, but has been withdrawn, for leaving the counties to fix the close time for themselves. I hope, however, the House will accept the Bill.

(4.26.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): During the last few months I have tried by visiting various poulterers' shops in London to find out whether it is true that hares are exposed for sale when in milk. I have been told at shop after shop that such a thing is never seen, and that the credit of any poulterer who did it would be absolutely destroyed. Accordingly, if any poulterers are engaged in this practice, I think they will certainly not be a good class of tradesmen, and I think that the Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for Aberdeeen (Mr. Esslemont) ought to meet with the complete assent of Members on both sides of the House. What is the use of inserting the words, "shall wilfully kill"? If you meet poachers in the country with hares in their possession, can you say they have wilfully killed them? Some one else may have done it. What you should do is to saddle the right horse by making it illegal for a tradesman to sell a hare that is in young or has recently been in young. For my own part, I think there is a great deal too much fuss made about this matter. I can easily understand sporting gentlemen who take a pleasure in coursing—which I consider to be a very cruel sport—doing their best to promote the multiplication of hares. Practically speaking, hares are cheaper in this country than they are in Ireland. Although this very law exists in Ireland in a greater degree than you are now trying to impose it on England, hares are to-day cheaper in London than in Dublin or Cork. I agree with the remarks made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) about hares eating the green crops in Spring, and I certainly do not see why cultivators of the soil should not kill hares at that time. Hon. Members opposite will, in my opinion, do wisely if they accept this Amendment, with the exception of one word in it—I mean the word "leveret." I do not think people will expose leverets for sale when very young. If a leveret be two months old I do not see why it should not be sold or why it should not be legally killed.

THE CHAIRMAN: The question whether leverets should be included will come up for discussion subsequently.

DR. TANNER: I shall certainly oppose the Bill unless the principle embodied in the Amendment of my hon. Friend is adopted.

(4.35.) SIR J. KENNAWAY (Devon, Honiton): It is said this measure is not desired by small farmers. I come from a county of small farmers, and a few months ago I had the honour of presenting a Petition to the House signed by between 7,000 and 8,000 persons connected with the land, in favour of this Bill. Amongst the petitioners were landowners, large farmers, small farmers, and labourers. It has been asked, Why cannot those who wish to see a stop put to the shooting or killing of hares agree not to destroy hares? The fact is, that when a man sees his neighbour killing hares, he does not like to be placed under a disability not to kill them; it is hard for him to restrain himself. With reference to the speech of the hon. Member for Mid Cork (Dr. Tanner) I may point out there is an Act for the Preservation of Hares in Ireland. That Act was passed in 1879, and it enacts that any person who wilfully kills or wounds a hare between a given period shall forfeit for every such hare a sum of money not exceeding £1.

(4.37.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I will not detain the Committee at any length, but I must remind the hon. Baronet that the Irish Act which had just been passed was fully in mind at the time the Ground Game Act was passed in 1880. This is a question for small owners; the large men can take care of themselves. The hon. Baronet says he represents small holders, but he seems to have a strange opinion of the moral strength of small holders. He says small holders are anxious to preserve the hares, but they will not combine not to kill them for fear their neighbours might kill them.

SIR J. KENNAWAY: I did not say that. I said that if one man sees another killing hares it is difficult for him to restrain himself.

SIR W. HARCOURT: If one man does what he ought not to do all the rest of the Devonshire people will do so! I should be sorry to say that of my constituents. I should have thought that if one man kills hares when the rest of the farmers wish to preserve them it would be a very good thing to introduce the Irish system of boycotting, and then he would not kill hares any more. Now, the right hon. Baronet the Member for Essex (Sir H. Selwin-Ibbetson) says he has a farm of 1,600 acres in his own hands, and he makes a good profit.

SIR H. SELWIN-IBBETSON: I must interrupt the right hon. Gentleman when he puts words into my mouth which I never uttered. I imagine that I have more experience of agriculture than the right hon. Gentleman, and I have not experienced the success he seems to anticipate.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Then the right hon. Baronet does not make a profit, and he wants hares in order to make farming profitable. But that was not the point to which my remark was about to be addressed. I was about to say that I cannot understand how a man who farms 1,600 acres cannot have hares if he wants them.

SIR H. SELWIN-IBBETSON: I am sorry to again interrupt the right hon. Gentleman. I have a few hares on my own property, but I spoke in the interest and as the mouthpiece of the farmers of Essex, who at present complain that they have none.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Then the right hon. Baronet has a few hares on his own property, which, no doubt, go for the food of the people. All I can say is that if the farmers of Essex are as anxious to preserve hares as the right hon. Baronet they would have no difficulty any more than he has in preserving them if they chose. I refer to small farmers, and there is one thing which makes small farmers object to this Bill. This Bill introduces a new Game Law on small men's lands, under the pretence or justification of looking after hares in the close time. The gamekeeper will always be upon the ground of the small man. [Ironical laughter.] You may laugh, but that is the pith of the whole question, and I venture to say that I know as much about the feeling of these small owners as you do. I know that what they more dislike than anything else is the sort of warrant this Bill will give to the gamekeeper to be always upon their premises to see what they are doing, although the purpose alleged is to see whether or not they are killing hares in close time. The great advantage the small holders received under the Bill of 1880 was that they got rid of the gamekeeper [Cries of "No, no," and "Pheasants," "Partridges."] Yes, but in many places there was no question of pheasants and partridges. The gamekeeper was always on their land looking after the ground game. This Bill is a warrant to the gamekeeper to be always on their ground, and that is what the small farmers object to. I think you are making a great mistake in this matter. Under this Bill you will have to enforce penalties, and if you enforce penalties against a man for killing a hare on his own land, whether for sale or otherwise, you create an amount of discontent and disturbance in the country, of the consequence of which you can have no conception. I can understand a private Member introducing a Bill of this kind, but I cannot understand the Government taking upon themselves the responsibility of creating a new Game Law. I for one shall do whatever I can to prevent this Bill passing into law.

COLONEL DAWNAY: May I appeal to the Committee to go to a Division at once. It is quite impossible for the promoters of the Bill to accept this Amendment. I feel it would cut the heart out of the Bill. What is the use of a close time if you allow people to kill hares all through the close time?

(4.48.) MR. ESSLEMONT: I think I have received exceedingly little encouragement and very scant justice from the promoters of this Bill. I am desirous that this Bill should pass, in order that poachers and others may not make it a matter of gain to kill hares at a season when hon. Gentlemen wish to preserve hares. But I am desirous, on the other hand, that that should be made possible without outraging the feelings of those people who we ought to respect more than any others. The tenant farmer at present has a proprietary right in these creatures, and you have said that he desires to preserve them. If he desires to preserve them he will preserve them. I deny that farmers will kill hares inhumanly, and I protest most strongly against adopting this reactionary measure, and inventing the new crime suggested. Tenant farmers have enough to do to contend with the agricultural difficulty without being brought within the meshes of the law in regard to the killing of game during a certain season. My hon. Friend (Dr. Farquharson) who represents the Western Division of Aberdeenshire and myself represent 11,000 agricultural holders. There is no scarcity of hares, and these people do not want this Bill. They want to be put on their honour, as the landlord is to take fair care of these creatures in a regular and proper way. We are told there will be no destruction of crops. I am a small farmer, and I could take the President of the Board of Agriculture to a spot where, during the very months you propose to preserve hares, I had an acre and a half of barley eaten up by hares. [MR. CHAPLIN: Rabbits.] No, not rabbits. I have lived as many years amongst farmers as the right hon. Gentleman, and I know the difference between hares and rabbits. Now, it has been proved beyond contradiction that since the passing of the Ground Game Act hares have been cheaper in the market than before, and, therefore, the food of the people is not the question at all. It is said that if we do not pass this Bill farmers will kill hares wantonly and inhumanly. I do not believe it. No such calumny can be hurled against the farming classes. What we want to get at is the poacher, who cares nothing about cruelty or anything else if he can make money out of killing these creatures. If you will not accept this reasonable Amendment, and not allow the farmers to have the proprietary interest in hares that they have now, you will only defeat your Bill. In its present shape the Bill is purely reactionary. It amounts to a breach of the agreement which is working so well between farmers and the proprietors with regard to ground game, and I protest against any one attributing to me any motive other than the most humane in the Amendment I have proposed.

(4.55.) COLONEL DAWNAY: I beg to move that the Question be now put.

THE CHAIRMAN: I think this particular question has been fully discussed, and, therefore, I should have no hesitation in putting the Motion if necessary, but it seems to me undesirable to resort to that procedure when it can be avoided, and I therefore hope the Committee will now agree to divide on the Amendment.

DR. TANNER: The argument advanced—

THE CHAIRMAN: I have pointed out that, if necessary, I would not decline to put the Motion. I think the subject has been adequately discussed, and if hon. Gentlemen continue the discussion, I shall have no option but to put the Motion.

DR. TANNER: I merely rose for the purpose of moving that you report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

(4.56.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I think we may now fairly go to a Division upon the Amendment. We ought to avoid the use of the Closure as much as we can. Gentlemen opposite would gain nothing by it, because we should have two divisions instead of one.

DR. TANNER: I certainly must protest—

Mr. LAMBERT rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

(5.0.) The Committee divided:—
Ayes 231; Noes 101.—(Div. List, No. 157.)

Question put accordingly.

Ayes 239; Noes 130.—(Div. List, No. 158.)

*(5.25.) MR. BARCLAY: The object of the Amendment I have on the Paper is to except from punishment under the Act cases in which hares and leverets are killed by accident. We know how the existing Game Laws have been interpreted by a good many Justices, and I am afraid that as the Act now stands, a farmer might be held responsible if a hare were killed by an agricultural implement such as a mowing machine when at work. I have no fault to find with the administration of the Game Act in Scotland by the Sheriffs' substitutes, but I should like to provide against possibilities such as I have indicated. I hope my hon. Friend will accept the Amendment, and thus save the time of the House.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 2, page 1, line 12, after the word "kill" to insert the word "or."

Question proposed, "That the word 'or' be there inserted."

COLONEL DAWNAY: I accept that Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to.

It being half an hour after Five of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Wednesday next.

On the Motion that the Bill be considered as amended this day—

MR. T. M. HEALY: I think it should not be taken until July 2nd. The Bill requires to be reprinted, and I appeal to the Attorney General for Ireland whether it is not a reasonable request, seeing that we have not had an opportunity of considering some of the Amendments?

MR. JOHNSTON: I will put it down for to-morrow, and consult in the meantime with the hon. Member.

MR. MADDEN: I think the request of the hon. and learned Member is reasonable.

MR. CHANCE: My name is on the back of the Bill, and I suggest that it be taken on July 2nd.

*MR. JOHNSTON: Under the circumstances I accept that.

BARRACKS (CONSOLIDATED FUND)
(24th JUNE).

Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question (24th June),

"That this House doth agree with the Committee in the Resolution, 'That it is expedient to authorise the charge on, and issue out of, the Consolidated Fund of any deficiency which there may be in the moneys provided by Parliament for the payment of the principal and interest of any sums borrowed by the Treasury, under the provisions of any Act of the present Session for building and enlarging barracks and camps in the United Kingdom and in certain Colonies.'"

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolution agreed to.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON KITCHEN AND REFRESHMENT ROOMS.

Ordered, That Mr. Sheil be discharged from the Committee.—(Mr. Richard Power.)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

On the Motion for Adjournment—

(5.54.) SIR W. HARCOURT: It would be convenient to the House if the Chancellor of the Exchequer will state what will be the first two or three Bills, and their order, on the Paper to-morrow. I presume we are not to take the order as it stands on the Order Book.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): Without stating exactly the order in which they will be taken, we shall take the Allotments Bill, the Barracks Bill, the Western Australia Bill, and the Education Code Bill to-morrow. I think the Allotments Bill will probably be taken first. I may add that we propose to take the Police Superannuation Bill on Friday.

(5.55.) SIR W. HARCOURT: Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman to mean that the Local Taxation Bill will not be on the Paper to-morrow?

MR. GOSCHEN: No, Sir; it will not, I think, be on the Paper to-morrow. At all events, if it is on the Paper, we do not propose to proceed with it to-morrow.

House adjourned at Five minutes before Six o'clock.

COMMITTEES

If there are no other Instructions down besides those which are out of order, and,
therefore, no Question before the House, the Speaker technically would have to leave the Chair, without Question put,
and allow the proceedings to be completed, as they originated before 12 o'clock June 5, 136, 137, 138; June 6, 162

Instructions which might be carried out by Amendments or clauses in Committee are irregular. There is a difference between an Instruction to a Committee and an Amendment on the Second Reading, which traverses the principle of the Bill. When a Bill has been read a second time the House has assented to the principle of the Bill.

[cont.]

When the House is ready to go into Committee the Standing Order allows the Speaker to leave the Chair without Question put; but there is a reservation with regard to Instructions to the Committee. If an Instruction moved on that occasion were to traverse the principle of the Bill, that would virtually be a Second Reading Debate. It would be an Amendment to the principle of the Bill, and would therefore reduce to a minimum and nullify altogether the provisions of the Standing Order, that the Speaker leave the Chair without Question put. The precedents have no Instructions which go beyond the machinery necessary to carry out the general purpose and scope of a Bill June 9, 347, 348, 350

It is not necessary to move an Instruction when the Committee have power to do what the Instruction requires June 10, 527

Amendment which cannot be connected with certain clauses of a Bill in Committee cannot be brought in as an Instruction, as there would be no opportunity of putting down notice of the Instruction.
The other Instructions being out of order, a Member cannot move an Instruction without notice, and the present Instructions being disposed of the Speaker leaves the Chair June 24, 1874

RULES AND ORDER OF DEBATE

It is unusual to ask a question upon an Order before the Order is reached June 9, 435

It is usual to observe the Instruction of the Member in charge of the Bill as to the date of postponement June 9, 436

A single objection is sufficient to arrest the progress of a Bill after 12 o'clock June 10, 580

A Motion for Adjournment to discuss the arrangement of Public Business, a Notice having been given, is not a "definite subject of public importance," and cannot be moved June 12, 738

An Amendment temporarily withdrawn to permit another Amendment to be moved, can be renewed if the latter Amendment is withdrawn June 18, 1261

An Amendment declaring that the operations of an Act shall be from the date of its

passing, after it has been agreed that it shall come into operation at a later date, cannot be moved at the advanced stage of the consideration of the Bill June 25, 1906

The question of a tax being raised, and the proceeds appropriated to no particular authority and to no specific object, it is for the House to consider, as a matter of policy and interpretation, whether the words of an Amendment can constitute a sufficient appropriation of the sum raised and granted by the Budget Act, so as to come within the general principle underlying the whole Law, namely, the appropriation of money to a specific use within the then existing Session of Parliament. If no Act is passed within this Session appropriating the sum allotted under the Budget Act, the Treasury might incur responsibility and liabilities. From a Constitutional point of view there is no precedent for such an accumulation. Members can raise it as a question of policy or of principle, both in Committee and on the Third Reading of the Bill June 24, 1901, 1905
